Mr. McCool jumped right away to the conclusion that such matter had no business to be sent through the mails. He did not say anything to the letter-carrier as to what he had found inside the big envelope, but merely asked him if he carried any similar envelopes along his route. The letter-carrier said he had not, but added that some of the other men had been pretty well loaded down with them. The envelope had the post-office stamp on the back, showing it had been received here at 6 a. m. Monday morning.

Assistant Postmaster Drake was seen later in the day and asked if he could explain how it was that a Congressman's frank should be used to save patent-medicine advertisements from having to pay postage. He said that such an act was in direct violation of the law. With a copy of the Post-Office Laws and Regulations in his hand he explained that the franking privilege granted to members of Congress was restricted by law to three articles. These were public documents, CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS, and seeds for agricultural purposes. A violation of the law was punishable as a misdemeanor under the act of March 3, 1879, and the guilty party was liable to a fine not exceeding $100 for each offense.

HOW IT MIGHT HAVE HAPPENED.

Members of Congress, he said, are allowed to send matter which is covered by their franks in bulk, the separate packets being undirected. This, he said, was where violations of the law were apt to happen. A person might send to a Congressman for a number of copies of a certain speech, saying that he wanted to mail them to different people. The Congressman would send the speeches in a bundle, each copy in its separate envelope, not directed, but with the legislator's frank up in the corner. If the person receiving the bundle was so disposed the speeches could be extracted, anything else substituted and sent through the mails free of postage.

As these particular envelopes had been sealed and so treated as first-class matter, Mr. Drake was unable to say just how many had gone through the Philadelphia post-office. He promised, however, to have inquiries made among the carriers, who would be apt to remember on account of the large size of the envelopes.

The only J. M. ALLEN at present in Congress is JOHN M. ALLEN, who represents the First Mississippi district in the House of Representatives. This is his second term. He served in the Confederate army during the late war, and was at one time district attorney for the first judicial district of Mississippi. He is a Democrat.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I now ask the Clerk to read the editorial comment, found on the other side.

The Clerk read as follows:

RISE UP, JOHN ALLEN, AND EXPLAIN.

The franking privilege, whose abuse has so often stirred up public indignation, still survives in the right of Congressmen to send free through the mails CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS, public documents, and seeds, the same to be attested by the signature of the sender on the envelope or wrapper. An enterprising patent-medicine firm is at the present time defrauding the mails and enriching themselves by sending circulars over the country lauding the virtues of their drug under the frank of Hon. JOHN M. ALLEN, a Democratic Representative from the First Mississippi district.

The very enterprising patent medicine proprietors are liable to a fine of $100 for each envelope so used, but without waiting for the imposition of that fine it is in order for Congressman ALLEN to rise and explain. Is he selling his frank, or has he affixed his signature in an idle moment to thousands of envelopes on a chance of their being useful, and has his young man found them a negotiable commodity? No doubt the blame will be laid on the young man—it always is—but the evidence is cumulative that it is impossible for Congressmen to enjoy the franking privilege, even to a limited extent, without the privilege being grossly abused.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago this paper was shown me. I feel that it is due this House and myself that I should make the only explanation I can make, and that is that I know absolutely nothing about the matter except what I see in this paper, and to further say that if any such use has been made of what purports to be my frank, it has been done without any knowledge on my part or authority from me. I never heard of "Dam's patent medicines" or "Dam's Herald" before in my life. [Laughter.] I have not "in idle moments affixed my signature to thousands of envelopes" and left them lying around where anybody could use them. The truth is I am exceedingly cautious about affixing my signature, having had some trouble in my life growing out of affixing my signature to papers. [Laughter.]

I can not understand how the "patent-medicine" men came to select my frank for the purpose of perpetrating a fraud on the Government and on me, unless it was because of the great demand for my tariff speeches throughout the whole country. They thought my name might be used with less cause of suspicion than that of any one else. [Laughter.]

I shall call the attention of the Post-Office Department to this matter, and ask them to investigate fully and let us know how it occurred. I would also be obliged if the Post-Office Committee of the House would make a thorough investigation of the whole subject. It is evident that a fraud is being perpetrated upon the Government, as well as upon myself, and I hope the facts will be thoroughly ascertained.

I have been accused of a good many things in my life; but this is the first time I was ever accused of being a partner in crime with a "Dam" patent-medicine man. This paper says I was a Confederate soldier; that I am a Democrat, and a member of Congress. These are certainly charges enough to bring against one man in the same article. [Laughter.]

Mr. PETERS. Have you used any of these patent medicines?

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Never any of Dam's [laughter], and the insinuation contained in this editorial that I had sold or authorized my frank to be used in this way, and that I would "lay it on the young man" is a "Dam" vegetable remedy lie. [Laughter and applause.] I will not put it on any one, young or old, until it is investigated, and then I hope the guilty party may be discovered, and until then I ask the House to release me on my own recognizance.

WITHDRAWAL OF A MOTION.

Mr. DOCKERY. Pending the motion of the gentleman from Missouri, I ask unanimous consent of the House to withdraw a motion entered by me, and found on page 7849 of the RECORD, to reconsider the action of the House touching the conference report on Senate bill 182.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the motion will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MILWAUKEE.

Mr. DIBBLE. I rise to make a privileged report on the conference of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 154) for the erection of a public building at Milwaukee, Wis.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 154) for the erection of a public building at Milwaukee, Wis., having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendments to the said bill, and agree to the same with the following amendments:

1. In second line, first page, before the word "purchase," insert the words "acquire by;" and after the word "purchase," in same line, insert the words "condemnation or otherwise."

2. In eleventh line, first page, before the word "and," insert the words "and the cost of said site shall not exceed the sum of $400,000."

3. In fifteenth line, second page, after the word "city," insert the words "at a cost, however, not exceeding $300,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

SAMUEL DIBBLE,
C. NEWTON,
P. S. POST,
Managers on the part of the House.
JOHN C. SPOONER,
W. B. ALLISON,
G. G. VEST,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

We, managers on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the House amendment to the bill (S. 154) for the erection of a public building at Milwaukee, Wis., respectfully submit, with the conference report, the following statement:

The Senate bill provided for an expenditure of $1,200,000 for site and building complete, or $1,100,000 if the present site was enlarged by purchase of adjoining ground. The House amended by substituting simply a provision for purchasing a site at a cost not exceeding $300,000. The effect of the adoption of the conference report is to provide for site and building at a cost not exceeding $1,200,000, of which sum not more than $400,000 may be expended for the site; and in case the present site is enlarged by purchase of adjoining ground, then the entire cost shall not exceed $1,100,000, and the cost of the additional ground shall not exceed $300,000.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

SAMUEL DIBBLE,
C. NEWTON,
P. S. POST,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DIBBLE. I have the floor.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman did not call for the floor.

Mr. DIBBLE. I called for the floor before the motion was put.

Mr. CRISP. I ask if I have the right to be recognized?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman who has charge of the bill [Mr. DIBBLE] will be recognized.

Mr. DIBBLE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to discuss this amendment. It is a report similar to the report which was made before. If the gentleman from Georgia desires to discuss the report I will yield him a portion of my time. Otherwise, I will ask the previous question on the adoption of the report.

Mr. CRISP. I prefer, as there are several gentlemen who desire to be recognized on this question, that I should be recognized in my own right.

Mr. DIBBLE. Well, I do not purpose taking up the time of the House to-day with this question, and unless the gentleman desires to accept my decision, I will move the previous question on the adoption of the report.

Mr. CRISP. As this is an important matter, involving $1,200,000, an increase of $800,000 over the House bill, I will ask the House to vote down the previous question until we can have the matter fully discussed.

Mr. LONG. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONG. In case the previous question is ordered, will there not be fifteen minutes' debate on either side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question has been debated already to some extent, and the Chair does not think that there would be debate.

Mr. DIBBLE. I ask leave to withdraw the conference report to-day, in order that the other business may go on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the report? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10896) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. WARNER. Before proceeding with the consideration of that bill I desire to make a request, and I shall preface that by a word or two. It is this. We have had under consideration and partially finished a bill of considerable interest to the country, and it certainly is important, if it is to be considered at all this session, to get it into the Senate in order that it may be acted upon. The measure to which I refer is the bill to establish the Territory of Oklahoma. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the bill now before the committee be laid aside for the present. Certain it is that no one will suffer from any delay in the consideration of that bill. There is ample time for it, and this other bill is of great importance to the people of this country; therefore I ask that the deficiency bill be laid aside.

Mr. HOOKER. If I may be permitted to say a word, I think that the bill for the establishment of the Territory of Oklahoma is a very important bill, and I do not think it is thoroughly understood by the House. It needs, in my judgment, a most elaborate investigation before the House comes to any conclusion, and I object to the request of the gentleman. Whenever that bill passes it will have to be passed by a quorum of this House.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] that the deficiency bill be laid aside.

Mr. HOOKER. I object.

Mr. WARNER. Would it be in order to move that it be laid aside?

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules the committee will now rise and report this objection to the House.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. Cox having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the general deficiency bill, and a request having been made to pass over this bill for the present, the committee had instructed him to report that objection to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is, Will the House instruct the committee to consider the general deficiency bill?

Mr. DIBBLE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DIBBLE. What is the bill on which the House is asked for instructions?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The general deficiency bill.

Mr. DIBBLE. The general deficiency bill with the French spoliation claims under debate?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. LONG. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONG. Do I understand that a vote "ay" is in favor of taking up the general deficiency bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Shall the House instruct the committee to pass over that bill?

Mr. LONG. And a vote "ay" is in favor of passing over the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can infer that.

Mr. HOOKER. Before that question is put I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. Suppose the House should vote not to lay aside that bill. Of course that will be an instruction of the Committee of the Whole to take up another bill; and the question I desire to ask is, whether or not the next bill would be that suggested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] or the next appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would be the next appropriation bill on the Calendar.

Mr. LONG. Which is the fortification bill.

The question was put; and the House refused to instruct the committee to lay aside the deficiency bill.

Mr. BURNES. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the deficiency bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10896) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for prior years, and for other purposes, and the pending question is on the fourth section of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire how much time is left for general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The clerk who keeps the time is not at the desk at this moment, but the Chair understands that seven hours still remain.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with the discussion, I ask unanimous consent to offer certain amendments to preceding portions of the bill. The first amendment which I desire to offer is merely a verbal correction. I offer this amendment at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Page 3, lines 17 and 18, strike out "a reasonable time, say one year," and insert in lieu thereof "the period of one year after landing or entry."

There being no objection, the amendment was received and was agreed to.

Mr. BURNES. I now ask unanimous consent to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, after line 8, insert "Salaries of foreign ministers: To pay J. R. Young, late minister to China, salary from July 1 to September 4, 1885, $2,152.17."

There being no objection, the amendment was received and was agreed to.

Mr. BURNES. I ask unanimous consent to offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Page 27, after line 21, insert: "For an additional clerk in the office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, for duty in the free-delivery division during the fiscal year 1889, $1,000."

There being no objection, the amendment was received and was agreed to.

Mr. BURNES. I ask consent also to offer an amendment on page 36.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Page 36, after line 24, insert: "For horse and buggy for Department messenger, House of Representatives, for the fiscal year 1889, $250."

There being no objection, the amendment was received and was agreed to.

Mr. BURNES. I desire also to offer another amendment to come in on page 34.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Page 31, after line 20, insert: "To pay W. O. Arnold in addition to the sum of $750 allowed him in the sundry civil appropriation act for expenses incurred in his election contest, $1,000."

There being no objection, the amendment was received and was agreed to.

Mr. CRISP. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to come in after the amendment just adopted.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After the amendment just adopted insert: "To pay C. N. Felton and Frank J. Sullivan in full for expenses of election contest in the Fiftieth Congress $2,000 each; in all, $4,000."

There being no objection, the amendment was received and was agreed to.

Mr. BURNES. I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD correspondence with the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster-General concerning the amendments which have just been adopted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The correspondence is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., August 4, 1888.

SIR: Referring to page 3, lines 17 and 18, of the general deficiency bill I beg leave to suggest a change of phraseology, by striking out the words "within a reasonable time, say one year," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "within the period of one year after landing or entry."

The language now employed in the bill might be regarded as so ambiguous and indefinite as to embarrass the Department in the enforcement of the proposed amendment of the law.

Respectfully yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD, Secretary.

Hon. JAMES N. BURNES,
Chairman Subcommittee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., August 7, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose a letter from the Superintendent of the Free-Delivery System of the Post-Office Department requesting that an appropriation of $1,000 be recommended for an additional clerk to be assigned to his division, the necessity for which being the large increase of work on account of the enactment of the eight-hour law for letter-carriers and the general increase of the free-delivery business.

The application of the superintendent meets with my approval, and I respectfully recommend that the appropriation asked for be made.

Very respectfully,

DON M. DICKINSON,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. JAMES N. BURNES,
Chairman of the committee having in charge the deficiency bill,
Washington D. C.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., August 7, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to request that you recommend to Congress that an appropriation of $1,000 be made at this session for an additional clerk, to be permanently assigned to the Free-Delivery Division of the Post-Office Department. This appropriation is imperatively necessary on account of the immense addition to the work of the division, connected with the eight-hour law for letter-carriers and the constant increase in the free-delivery business generally.

Very respectfully,

J. F. BATES,
Superintendent Free-Delivery System.

Hon. DON M. DICKINSON,
Postmaster-General.

On motion of Mr. CANNON unanimous consent was given to members to print remarks on the pending bill.

Mr. BURNES. Resuming the debate, I will yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. THOMPSON].

[Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. LONG. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SHAW.]

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Chairman, the consideration and discussion of the French spoliation claims, beginning in 1802, have continued almost without intermission from that time to the present day. The original claimants, their children, and many of their grandchildren have passed away, but the claims live on with the vigor and strength of youth, which neither time nor neglect have abated or destroyed. Having survived the vetoes of two Presidents, these claims to-day find favor in the popular mind as to their justness and equity, and their extraordinary vitality can only be accounted for in their remarkable character and history.

Based upon the treaty with France of 1778, which treaty made our independence possible, they are indissolubly linked with the names and events which make our early history illustrious and grand. Yet, notwithstanding these claims were the first in point of time, the most interesting in matter of history, and the greatest in amount of all the spoliations by foreign nations on our commerce, they are the last to be recognized and satisfied.

From Great Britain, from Spain, Naples, Denmark, Mexico, South America, and again from Great Britain our merchants have recovered their claims for spoliation of their ships and cargoes. Every foreign power has been made to do justice and render indemnification in this behalf, and France too was called to account and permitted to set off her claims against the United States for these individual claims, yet the sufferers are still without compensation, although the duty of indemnity was transferred from France to the United States.

The story of these claims is a chapter in our national history of which we have no cause to be proud. Originating in an alleged mistake, which confounded American with British ships, on account of the same language of the sailors which manned them, the outrages by the French to flag and ship and persons multiplied until they involved our citizens in the loss of many millions of dollars. But a few years anterior to these occurrences France had, at an enormous outlay, contributed largely of the treasure and blood of her people to the success of American independence. In the dark days of Valley Forge, France espoused our cause, and from that day until the sun of Yorktown rose on the victorious armies of America her zeal and help knew neither abatement nor cessation.

While the American Army at Valley Forge stood on the very verge of dissolution, "barefooted and otherwise naked," with their hunger threatening to "break through a stone wall," and Washington presenting to Congress the dread alternative of the Army "to starve, dissolve or disappear," the plenipotentiaries of France and the United States executed the treaties of guaranty and of alliance and commerce of February, 1778. The treaty of guaranty was one of mutual guaranty—France guarantying our independence and conquests, and the United States guarantying the colonial possessions of France—and the pledge of guaranty was forever. The terms of the guaranty it is well to state in its own words:

The two parties guaranty mutually for the present time and forever, against all other powers, to wit, the United States to His Most Christian Majesty the present possessions of the crown of France in America, as well as those it may acquire by the future treaty of peace. And His Most Christian Majesty guaranties, on his part, to the United States their liberty, sovereignty, and independence, as well in matters of government as commerce, and the additions and conquests that their confederation may obtain during the war from any of the domains now or heretofore possessed by Great Britain in North America.

And it was further stipulated that—

In case of rupture between France and England the reciprocal guaranty shall have full force and effect the moment such war shall break out; or if no rupture take place then the guaranty shall not take place until the moment of the cessation of the present war between the United States and England shall have ascertained their possessions.

The possessions of France in America at that day were the Islands of Saint Domingo, Martinique, Guadaloupe, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent, Tobago, Désirade, Mariegalante, Saint Pierre, Miquelon, Grenada, and, on the mainland, Cayenne. All of these the United States guarantied to France forever by a continuing guaranty. All these possessions, the historian Alison says, were swept from France in thirty days without material loss to England, and, he might have added, without any effort on our part to make good the guaranty of the treaties.

This treaty of amity and commerce was a mutual stipulation by which the United States solemnly pledged itself, first, to protect and defend the ships and cargoes of French subjects "against all attacks, force, and violence" in the same manner as they ought to protect and defend "the vessels of citizens of the United States." We undertook and bound ourselves to know no difference between the commerce of France and that of the United States. Second, the United States stipulated—

To open their ports to French ships of war and privateers with their prizes and to close them against any power at war with France, except when such power should be driven by stress of weather into our ports, and then "all proper means shall be vigorously used so that they go out and retire as soon as possible."

And third, the United States stipulated to allow French privateers "to fit their ships, to sell what they had taken, or in any manner whatsoever to exchange their ships, merchandise, or any other lading," and to forbid privateers in enmity to France even to victual in ports of the United States; and later in the same year the United States entered into a consular convention with France, that French consuls and vice-consuls in the United States should have and exercise power and jurisdiction on board French vessels in civil matters.

These treaties were the voluntary stipulations by the United States with France for her aid and assistance in securing and maintaining our national life, independence, and liberty.

What was the actual cost to France of these treaties? Omitting from the calculation all consideration of life and suffering which our war of independence cost France, and confining the estimate to dollars and cents, France expended in our behalf $280,000,000. This sum measures the counter-claim which France in after years justly set up as an offset to the claims of our citizens now under consideration.

I have heretofore stated what the United States pledged to France in 1778. Six years after, on November 17, 1794, by the Jay treaty with Great Britain, every pledge and promise theretofore made to France was willfully and deliberately nullified. By that treaty we consented to receive British ships into our ports at a time when Great Britain was at war with France, and thus extended to our ancient enemy the hospitality and privileges we had pledged solely to our first friend.

The United States was then at peace and prospering, but not so with her ally and friend. All Europe banded together, surrounded France with their armies, and girdled her people with the fires of war and devastation. The navies of England blockaded her ports and to the horrors of war added the danger of starvation to a whole nation. In this extremity of her people we abandoned our former ally, and in violation of our treaty pledges, on the 22d of May, 1793, proclaimed our neutrality.

The first unfriendly acts committed by the French had been apologized for and indemnity promised, but the fitful, passionate, and excited national convention responded to President Washington's "proclamation of neutrality" with a decree retaliatory on England's effort to starve France, arresting all neutral vessels laden with provisions and destined to an enemy's port. The decree avowed its violation of neutral rights, but justified itself by a promise of "indemnity to neutrals who might suffer by its operation." American commerce, frightened by this decree, hesitated to take the sea and encounter the dangers that crowned every wave and lurked in every breeze. To reassure our people and revive our commerce, the Secretary of State, Mr. Jefferson, came forward voluntarily with the assurance of protection and redress in his circular of 27th August, 1793, and the President, in his message of December 5, 1793, iterated the promise that—

Due measures should be taken to obtain redress of the past and more effectual provision against the future.

Thus at the very beginning of these spoliations France promised indemnity and the United States pledged its honor that "proper proceedings should be adopted for the relief of her citizens," and thus before the Jay treaty was signed the ancient friendship between France and the United States stood guarantor for indemnification for unintentional and unavoidable outrages upon our commerce. But the bad faith on our part, which France recognized in our treaty with our ancient foe and her adversary, and the deliberate abandonment of all our pledges and promises to her by the "condescension of the American Government to the wishes of its ancient tyrant," caused her to unleash her cruisers to prey upon our commerce, and the declaration went forth that—

The French Republic will treat neutral vessels, either as to confiscation, searches, or captures, in the same manner as they shall suffer the English to treat them.

Edict followed edict in rapid succession, while the protestations of diplomacy failed to effect either relief or remedy. Our relations thus continued until a more imposing diplomatic effort was made in 1797 by the special mission of Mr. Pinckney, Mr. Marshall, and Mr. Gerry—principal object of which was to agree on an equitable mode of examining and deciding the claims of our citizens and the manner and period of making compensation.

In respect to the depredations on our commerce—

And the plenipotentiaries were instructed—

Not to renounce these claims of our citizens nor to stipulate that they be assumed by the United States Government.

Thus again were all these claims recognized by our Government and placed under the protection of our diplomacy.

That mission of eminent citizens in its efforts for indemnification encountered the masterly ability of Talleyrand, who, in reply to the statement of the claims of American citizens, brought forward the "national" counter-claims of France, and against the value of despoiled commerce and confiscated vessels, valued at $50,000,000, proffered the $280,000,000 which our war of independence had cost France. But while thus putting forward the counter-claims of France, Mr. Talleyrand admitted the justice of our claims, and inquired "whether, if they were acknowledged by France, we could not give a credit as to payment, say, for two years?"

That diplomatic commission returned home without satisfaction, and the Congress set on foot preparations for war to vindicate our commercial rights and to protect our people against like spoliations. Washington was made Lieutenant-General, and by act of May 28, 1798, defensive naval measures were authorized to prevent depredations on vessels belonging to our merchants. In a further effort to stop "depredations on American commerce," the act of June 13, 1798, suspended commercial relations with France, and by act of June 25, 1798, American merchant vessels were authorized to resist search or seizure by any French vessel, and finally, by act of July 7, 1798, the treaties of 1778 with France were declared annulled because "the just claim of the United States for reparation of injuries had been refused."

These were some of the vigorous measures set on foot by this Government to assert and maintain the rights of these claimants, and they had the effect of inducing the French Directory to invite the reopening of negotiations. President Adams, availing himself of the overture, appointed Chief-Justice Ellsworth, Mr. Davis, and Mr. Van Murray plenipotentiaries to France, and instructed them that—

The principal points, indeed all the points, were, first, indemnity for spoliations of American commerce; second, the unquestionable wrong of seizing American vessels for want of a rôle d'équipage, or descriptive-list of the crew; third, the refusal to renew the treaty guaranty of the French West Indies.

These were the ultimata intrusted to our negotiators, who were instructed to open negotiations with the positive and emphatic announcement that the "indispensable condition of the treaty" was to be "full compensation for all our losses and damages" sustained by illegal captures and condemnation, and the instructions end as they began, with the injunction to bind "France to pay or secure payment of the sums which shall be awarded."

Thus, under the mission of Mr. Morris and of Mr. Monroe, under the triumvirate plenipotentiaries headed by Pinckney and Ellsworth, the purpose and object was the indemnification of American citizens for spoliations by the French.

The last diplomatic mission found Napoleon First Consul, who appointed his brother Joseph Bonaparte at the head of the French commission. At the very first meeting, April 7, the American envoys proposed—

An arrangement to ascertain and discharge the equitable claims of citizens of either nation upon the other, whether founded in contract, treaty, or the law of nations.

Thus again, at the very threshold of negotiations these claims were brought forward by the representatives of the United States. The reply of the French plenipotentiaries was that—

The first object of the negotiations ought to be the determination of the regulations and the steps to be followed for the estimation and indemnification of injuries for which either nation may make claim for itself or for any of its citizens.

Thus not only "individual" but "national" claims, not only the twenty million losses of American citizens, but the $280,000,000 of counter claims of France met in this last diplomatic effort. The issue presented was the set-off of "individual" with "national" claims. The American envoys had no authority to recognize the "national" claims of France; the French envoys would not consider the individual claims of American citizens without the "national" claims of France were also recognized. The failure of negotiations was imminent and the danger of war threatening.

The divergence widened when the American envoys proposed to recognize the treaties of 1778 as existing only to July 7, 1798; and the reply of the French envoys was prompt and emphatic, that those treaties were the only foundation for their negotiation, and that upon those treaties only could union and friendship be re-established.

Napoleon promptly declared, August 11, 1800, that—

The treaties which united France and the United States are not broken, and that the first proposition for negotiation must be to stipulate a full and entire recognition of those treaties, with their reciprocal engagements of compensation for damages resulting on both sides from their infractions.

Again, "national" claims were confronted with "individual" claims, and the alternative presented "either ancient treaties, with the privileges resulting from priority and the stipulations of reciprocal indemnities, or a new treaty without indemnity." France said, in other words: Live up to and carry out your promises of 1778 or pay the $280,000,000 which France expended in her performance of those treaties; or if that is impossible without war with your new-found friend, England, then execute a new treaty and pay the losses of your citizens.

Such, in brief, is the history of these claims. Let us now examine the "views" presented with the deficiency bill.

These "views," submitted by a portion of the Committee on Appropriations in the French spoliation cases reported in the deficiency bill, are so directly opposed to the conclusions arrived at in the forty-five reports of committees of previous Congresses, and so variant with the findings of the Court of Claims after twice hearing arguments in these cases, that only new evidence since discovered could justify and sustain this radical departure from the accepted history of these claims.

But a close examination of these "views" discloses no new evidence against the justice of these claims, nor do they present any reasoning upon their history and evidence which was not presented to the Court of Claims by the attorneys who so ably represented the United States before that court.

The voluminous history of these claims and of the negotiations between France and the United States for their settlement has been so often and so fully reviewed by committees of Congress, and has been so exhaustively investigated in the three opinions of the Court of Claims, that it would seem useless to consume more time in an effort to make more clear their justice and equity.

But the "views" presented by a majority of the committee are entitled to consideration, more from respect due to the members who sign them than for the reasons and arguments presented therein. The résumé embodies conclusions unfavorable to the payment of these claims, and though unaccompanied with recommendation they can not be understood in any other way than as arguments for striking these appropriations from the bill.

The very large interests held by citizens of Maryland in the present findings of the court, as well as in those which are yet pending in the Court of Claims, make it my duty to state the reasons which induce me to differ with the majority of the committee, for whose opinions I entertain the greatest respect. The conclusions of the "views" may be condensed as follows:

First. That the claimants under the most favorable argument would be entitled only to the pecuniary value of the claims at the date of the treaty in 1800, and that these claims had no appreciable value because France would not pay them and the United States could not compel her to do so.

It is doing a manifest injustice to the great statesmen of that period of the history of our country to suppose that extraordinary diplomatic missions composed of Pinckney, Marshall and Gerry, and afterwards of Ellsworth, Chief-Justice of the United States, Davis, and Murray, would have been superadded to the efforts of Minister Morris, as well as to those of Minister Monroe, to obtain a settlement of claims which had no appreciable value, or that the long negotiations, supplemented by extensive preparations for war, would have been permitted to widen the friendly relations existing between France and the United States about claims which France would not recognize nor could be made to pay. In the first part of the "views" an "appreciable value" in these claims is set down at the exaggerated estimate of $40,000,000, and throughout the argument $5,000,000 is assumed as the amount always heretofore recognized by committees of Congress.

For more than eighty years public sentiment has not only recognized an "appreciable value" in these claims, but unmistakably declared for their recognition and payment by the United States; and lastly the Court of Claims, the arbiter selected by Congress and governed by the rules of evidence, has found an "appreciable value" for a portion of these claims, which this House ordered last December to be put upon the deficiency bill for its consideration.

Second. The "views" further hold that the United States Senate, by striking the second clause from the treaty of 1800, abandoned the further prosecution of these claims without agreement, settlement, or acknowledgment of demands on either side, and that there was no valuable consideration to the United States in the abandonment by France of her pretensions as to the treaties of 1778, because those pretensions had been annulled by the unfriendly acts of France, by the abrogation act of Congress of July, 1798, and by the existence of actual war.

These are the very questions which have been at issue from 1800 to the present time, and with the weight and influence of the "views" the country will consider the forty-five reports of committees and the deliberate findings of the Court of Claims. It was to judicially determine these identical issues that the Court of Claims was empowered to consider these claims, and for their elucidation before that court the United States appeared by able attorneys, and the Congress authorized the appointment of the distinguished commission, composed of Mr. Broadhead and Mr. Tuck, to visit France and her ancient colonies and collect evidence to be used by the Court of Claims in judicially determining the very questions which the "views" again invoke to cloud our judgment. After the fullest argument and the most careful consideration the Court of Claims has rendered its judgment against each and every position taken in the "views."

The second clause of the proposed treaty of 1800 was in these words:

The ministers plenipotentiary of the two parties not being able to agree at present respecting the treaty of alliance of the 6th February, 1778, the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date, and the convention of the 14th November, 1788, nor upon the indemnities mutually due or claimed, the parties will negotiate further on these subjects at a convenient time, and until they may have agreed upon these points the said treaties and convention shall have no operation and the relations of the two countries shall be regulated as follows.

This the court holds to have been a "compromise" forced by the French Government and accepted by our ministers, but admitting all that was claimed under the old treaties as open to discussion and not providing for the indemnities. The Senate in advising the ratification of the treaty, expunged this second article and in its place provided that—

It is agreed that the present convention shall be in force for the term of eight years from the time of exchange of negotiations.

The First Consul of France consented to "accept, ratify, and confirm" the convention, adding to the Senate's retrenchment of the second article as follows:

Provided, That by this retrenchment the two states renounce the respective pretensions which are the object of the said article.

This treaty, ratified with the Senate's retrenchment and Napoleon's proviso, was a practical adoption by the United States of the second branch of the French proposition, namely:

Either the ancient treaties, with the privileges resulting from priority, and the stipulations of reciprocal indemnities, or a new treaty, assuming equality without indemnity.

The United States accepted the alternative of "a new treaty, assuming equality without indemnity," because by doing so we avoided war with England.

By the treaties of 1778 the United States had "forever" bound herself to maintain France in her colonial possessions and to grant her exclusive privileges as to ports and privateers; but by the Jay treaty England had been admitted to the same privileges which had been granted exclusively to France. It was impossible for the United States to fulfill the obligations of these conflicting treaties, and her ministers were instructed to so negotiate with France that, while escaping from the embarrassments of conflicting privileges to both France and England, full indemnity from France for these claims should be insisted upon and obtained.

The Senate and Napoleon, by the retrenchment and proviso gave a quietus to the treaties of 1778, and with them all the obligations arising under them passed from the arena of international contention, France relinquishing her rights in exchange for release from her obligations, and the United States, escaping from the embarrassments of conflicting treaties, by every principle of right and justice incurred the pecuniary obligations of France to our citizens, namely, the French spoliation claims.

The Court of Claims holds that this was the "bargain" to which Mr. Madison referred in his letter to Mr. Pinckney, from which the United States derived a practical and important benefit and advantage at the supreme cost to her citizens of their great pecuniary claims. The court quotes Mr. Pinckney, Secretary of State to two Presidents, Mr. Madison, Mr. Clay, Chief-Justice Marshall, and the reports of forty-five committees in favor of the payment of these claims as against three reports made prior to 1826, when the diplomatic correspondence was made public, since the publication of which no committee of Congress has reported unfavorably on these claims.

The "views" hold further that the abrogation act of July, 1798, recognized the treaties of 1778 as having been violated by France, and that the act of Congress of that date was a rightful and valid exercise of power by the United States which removed all validity and force of the old treaties after that date. In other words, that the act of July 7, 1798, established a date after which war existed which obliterated all claims, either upon France or the United States, and left these claimants, after that date, without equitable right to remuneration.

The Court of Claims has fully examined the law, the facts, and the evidence as to the state of war, and arrived at a different conclusion from that expressed in the "views," while finding the Attorney-General, Mr. Lee, in 1798, writing to the Secretary of State that "not only an actual maritime war," but "a maritime war authorized by both nations" existed with France; and Edward Livingston saying in debate—

Let no man flatter himself that the vote which has been given is not a declaration of war. Gentlemen know that this is the case.

But notwithstanding these and many like expressions of opinion made at a period of great excitement and partisan bitterness, the court calmly and judicially inquires into the facts of the times, and from the expressions of the political department of the Government, as well as from the more solemn and important judicial findings of the courts; from the language of the acts of Congress; from the expressions of our diplomatists, and from the averments and protestations of France, the Court of Claims holds that there was no declaration of war; that the tribunals of each country were open to the other, an impossibility were war in progress; that diplomatic and commercial intercourse was admittedly suspended; that retaliation and reprisal were made, and that though there was a near "approach to war" there was no time at which one of the nations was turned into an enemy of the other, and finally—

That there was not that kind of war which abrogated treaties and wiped out, at least temporarily, all pending rights and contracts, individual and national.

And the court adds:

In cases like this the "judicial is bound to follow the action of the political department of the Government, and is concluded by it."

And we do not find an act of Congress or of the Executive between the years 1793 and 1801 which recognizes an existing state of solemn war, although we find statutory provisions authorizing a certain course "in the event of a declaration of war," or "whenever there shall be a declared war," or during the existing "differences," and one act provides for an increase of the Army "in case war shall break out," while another restrains this increase "unless war should break out;" hence the court concludes:

We are, therefore, of opinion that no such war existed as operated to abrogate treaties, suspend private rights, or authorize indiscriminate seizures and condemnations; that, in short, there was no public general war, but limited war in its nature, similar to a prolonged series of reprisals.

Whatever regard this House may entertain for the opinions of those members of the Committee on Appropriations whose names are appended to these "views," the judicial conclusions of the court selected by Congress to investigate the law and the facts relating to these claims should have more weight in influencing the judgment of this House than should attach to "views" which, while reviving the old arguments prior to 1826, present no new evidence, but draw their inspiration rather from the arguments of attorneys representing the United States than from the facts of history and the justice of the claims.

In the present Congress, at its very opening, as early as December 19, 1887, these claims were brought fairly and squarely before this House by the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] which ordered the Committee on Appropriations—

To report to this House all such claims as have been decided favorably to the claimants and so reported by the Court of Claims in the general deficiency bill for the consideration of the House.

The object and purpose of the friends and supporters of that resolution was avowed and accepted to be to bring this House to a vote on the proposition to pay these claims as found by the Court of Claims.

The issue was distinctly drawn. Mr. RANDALL, Mr. BLOUNT, Mr. MILLS, Mr. HOLMAN, and others opposed the passage of the resolution and endeavored to have it referred to the Committee on Claims, or to a special committee, but all efforts to defeat or turn aside the purpose of the House to have a direct vote upon the proposition were unavailing, and by a yea-and-nay vote of 163 to 81, more than a majority of the whole House, the resolution was adopted, in obedience to which these claims are now before the House for its final action.

After eighty years of discussion these "views" revamp the thoughts and arguments which prevailed prior to 1826, and seek to defeat the judgment of the court of arbitration selected by the United States and to which these claimants were compelled to submit their claims. These "views" ask this House not to abide by the award of its own arbitrators, but to repudiate the finding and refuse to pay the award.

Such conduct between individuals would be denounced as dishonest and dishonorable, and I know of no code of morals which draws distinctions in its application to the United States and to individuals. If the Congress will not abide by the findings and pay the judgments or awards of the Court of Claims, does it not set an example of disregard for its own courts and laws hurtful and harmful to the very spirit of popular government? For one, I shall vote for the payment of these adjudicated claims, and thus aid in righting a wrong and putting an end to a controversy that should have been terminated long ago.

Mr. BURNES. I now yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS].

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, the question before us is one of unusual importance. It is the legacy of another century, and carries us back to a period only a little short of the Revolutionary war. Administrations have come and gone; political parties have risen, flourished, and passed away; and generations have been born, have lived, and have died since the scenes, in which these claims had their origin, were enacted.

Expenditure is asked as compensation for losses which occurred nearly an hundred years ago. At first these losses were supposed to amount, in value, to a sum not exceeding $5,000,000, but during the past fifty years they have so increased that, according to high official authority, they will, if allowed, aggregate near thirty-five millions, exclusive of interest. Like wine, they have improved with age.

Within two years from the 20th day of January, 1885, 5,569 suits were instituted in the court upon which jurisdiction was conferred to hear them, and now a bill is pending to allow a further extension of time within which to submit to the same tribunal additional claims for adjudication. One hundred and twenty-three cases have been decided, of which one hundred and six have been adverse to the Government and only seventeen in its favor. The sum total of the awards which we are called upon to pay in this bill is $741,606.63.

Questions not only involving facts peculiar to each case, but also the truth of history as to great and notable events, and the proper application of important principles of municipal, maritime, and international law have been considered, and, I regret to say, have been almost uniformly resolved in favor of the claimants, and this, too, by a court of inferior jurisdiction and without the right of an appeal to the highest tribunal in the land.

Why the act of 1885, passed during the Forty-eighth Congress, and under which these suits were brought, should not have allowed an appeal to the Supreme Court, but should have limited litigation of such moment to the Court of Claims, it is difficult to conjecture.

Certainly a desire to reach the right conclusion, such a conclusion as would challenge the approval of the popular conscience, would have dictated a more liberal law than that of January 20, 1885.

These claims stood before the Forty-eighth Congress as ancient demands, whose payment during the long years of their existence had not been recommended by a single President. If they do in fact and in truth rest upon those equitable and constitutional principles which have been invoked in their behalf by gentlemen upon this floor, then from their very beginning to this hour the failure of the Presidents and of the Congresses to recommend and to take action has been reprehensible indeed, and there can be no justification for the neglect.

Congress, however, has acted upon two occasions, and has passed bills covering five millions of dollars for the payment of these claims. Both of them were vetoed, the one by Mr. Polk and the other by Mr. Pierce.

Under all the circumstances surrounding them they are—to use no harsher phrase—of a suspicious character and should have been subjected to the highest judicial investigation and criticism before reaching Congress for payments.

But the antiquity, amount, and general character of the claims invited the lobby. The field was rich and promising of an abundant harvest, and the Treasury was already full. The prospect was bright. For many years there had not appeared so fair an opportunity for public plunder.

In saying this, I would not be understood as at all questioning the integrity or candor of any gentleman upon this floor. It is of others I speak—of those upon the outside and not of any member of this House. No sooner had the law of 1885 been enacted than letters of administration upon the estates of men who had been dead for more than half a century were applied for and were received in very many places throughout the country, and all the necessary preliminary preparations were made for a vigorous and determined assault, through the methods of judicial procedure, upon the Treasury.

Who are the heirs of those men who have been so long dead and whose estates have been thus sought to be administered upon? Where are these heirs? In many instances are there any heirs at all? Were the decedents, when dying, solvent or insolvent? If insolvent, who were their creditors, and where are they, and who represent them? These are pertinent questions. Many more equally as pertinent might be asked, but these are sufficient as suggestions as to the final lodgment of the greater portion of these claims should they be paid. And insurance companies and banking institutions, long since dead, were, through processes known to the law, rehabilitated with the power to sue and to receive whatever they, in the general scramble, might chance to recover.

Just think of it, Mr. Chairman. Only two years—not six hundred working days—were allowed for the institution of these suits, and yet during that short time 5,569 claims were filed.

When and where and in what court has such rapid work ever before been done? The industry and energy of these men have been indeed marvelous.

But the organization was complete before the bill became a law, and it was ready for immediate action, and it did act energetically and enthusiastically, vigorously and continuously, when the command was given.

With what success, the very favorable condition of these claims at the present time fully demonstrates. The present Congress had scarcely convened when the consideration of those claims, which had been adjudicated, was enforced in a manner that has no precedent in the proceedings of this House. Before the committees had been appointed the work was done which made it the duty of the Committee on Appropriations to report them on this bill, on which they ought not to have been placed. I refer to the resolution adopted by the House during the first week, I believe, of its present session.

The policy of this course was obvious at the time of the presentation and adoption of this resolution. The purpose evidently was not only to force immediate action, but also to avoid the necessity of presenting the question to Congress and to the President disconnected from all other matters.

Hence their arbitrary enforcement upon the deficiency bill.

It would be utterly impossible for me, Mr. Chairman, to present to this committee—within the time allotted me—all of the objections which might be properly urged against the payment of these claims. I shall have to content myself with replying only to what has been said by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] and by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] in the course of this debate.

I very much regret that the gentleman from Maryland is not here to-day. He is a most earnest advocate of their payment, and his ability in presenting his views is no less marked than his zeal.

He speaks from the standpoint of his profession and states the question quite fairly.

Says the gentleman—

> Now, I leave that proposition and proceed to discuss as rapidly as I can the inherent merits of this case. The fundamental proposition that underlies this controversy, in my opinion, is this: Was there a war? I do not go quite so far as my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] does upon that subject, who says that even if there was a war it would not prevent these claimants from recovering.
> The question in my opinion is, was there a war between the years 1794 and 1801 between the United States and France? If there was a war, I think that is an end of these claims. If there was no war, then the United States, as trustee for its citizens, was bound to prosecute these claims in the recognized tribunals of the French Government, and if it failed to do so, whether it received any consideration or not, it is responsible to its citizens for all the damages resulting from its default. Now, I say there was no war. I say there was not anything like a war.
> I say that any school boy acquainted with the history of that time knows that between 1794 and 1801 there was no war between the United States and France. There was a transient misunderstanding, as Napoleon called it; there was a limited condition of hostilities, as Chief-Justice Chase and Justice Patterson said; but according to the definition of war given by the highest authorities on international law there was no war.

I accept the legal portion of the proposition, as stated, to be correct, but I join issue with him as to the fact upon which he relies. Between us there is only a question of fact, and I am glad that it is so. Upon the issue thus made I beg leave to introduce as a witness before this committee the then Attorney-General of the United States, Charles Lee.

Among the opinions of the Attorneys-General is to be found the following official communication to the Secretary of State:

> BUCK TAVERN, August 21, 1798.
> SIR: Having taken into consideration the acts of the French Republic relative to the United States, and the laws of Congress passed at the last session, it is my opinion that there exists not only an actual maritime war between France and the United States, but a maritime war authorized by both nations. Consequently France is our enemy; and to aid, assist, and abet that nation in her maritime warfare will be treason in a citizen or any other person within the United States not commissioned under France. But in a French subject, commissioned by France, acting openly according to his commission, such assistance will be hostility. The former may be tried and punished according to our laws; the latter must be treated according to the laws of war.
> I have thought it my duty to make this communication in consequence of the information you received from Rhode Island of the intentions of a Frenchman, whose name I do not now call to mind, who is said to be somewhere in this country on the business of buying ships and supplies of a military kind for the West Indies. He should be apprehended and tried as a traitor, unless he has a commission and acts according to it, in which case he should be treated as an enemy and confined as a prisoner of war.
> I have the honor, etc.,
> To the SECRETARY OF STATE.

Here, sir, we have the deliberate and carefully expressed opinion and advice of the highest law officer of the Government, given in the discharge of an official duty and at the very time when the troubles, out of which these claims grew, were occurring. He is upon the ground. He is in close and intimate connection with every department of the Government, and holds confidential relations with the President himself.

Can a more reputable or a more competent witness be produced to countervail his testimony as to the true relations then existing between the United States and France? If so, let him be produced, and we will hear him and give due weight to what he may say.

But it is not upon the testimony of this distinguished citizen of our earlier days—strong and convincing as it is, and delivered, as it has been, in his official character and under the sanction of a public duty—that the opponents to the payment of these claims solely rely.

There is another source, perhaps more authoritative and more impartial, to which we very confidently appeal for information upon this interesting point.

Let us go to the highest tribunal in the land, the Supreme Court of the United States, and search for evidence as to whether war did or did not actually exist between the two countries during the years in which these claims had their origin.

I have before me the celebrated case of Bas vs. Tingy, argued and decided at the August term, A. D. 1800, of that court. The question as to the existence of a war during those years was before the court. An opinion was delivered by each of the judges present, a portion of one of which I will now ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The decision of this question must depend upon another; which is, whether at the time of passing the act of Congress of the 2d of March, 1799, there subsisted a state of war between the two nations? It may, I believe, be safely laid down that every contention by force between two nations, in external matters, under the authority of their respective governments, is not only war but public war. If it be declared in form, it is called solemn, and is of the perfect kind; because one whole nation is at war with another whole nation; and all the members of the nation declaring war are authorized to commit hostilities against all the members of the other, in every place and under every circumstance. In such a war all the members act under a general authority and all the rights and consequences of war attach to their condition.

But hostilities may subsist between two nations more confined in its nature and extent, being limited as to places, persons and things; and this is more properly termed imperfect war; because not solemn, and because those who are authorized to commit hostilities act under special authority, and can go no further than to the extent of their commission. Still, however, it is public war, because it is an external contention by force between some of the members of the two nations, authorized by the legitimate powers.

It is a war between the two nations, though all the members are not authorized to commit hostilities, such as in a solemn war, where the governments restrain the general power.

Now, if this be the true definition of war, let us see what was the situation of the United States in relation to France. In March, 1799, Congress had raised an army, stopped all intercourse with France, dissolved our treaty, built and equipped ships of war, and commissioned private-armed ships, enjoining the former and authorizing the latter to defend themselves against the armed ships of France, to attack them on the high seas, to subdue and take them as prize, and to recapture armed vessels found in their possession.

Here, then, let me ask, what were the technical characters of an American and French armed vessel, combating on the high seas, with a view, the one to subdue the other, and to make prize of his property? They certainly were not friends, because there was a contention by force; nor were they private enemies, because the contention was external, and authorized by the legitimate authority of the two governments. If they were not our enemies, I know not what constitutes an enemy.

Second. But, secondly, it is said that a war of the imperfect kind is more properly called acts of hostility or reprisal, and that Congress did not mean to consider the hostility subsisting between France and the United States as constituting a state of war. In support of this position, it has been observed that in no law prior to March, 1799, is France styled our enemy, nor are we said to be at war. This is true; but neither of these things were necessary to be done; because as to France, she was sufficiently described by the title of the French Republic; and as to America, the degree of hostility meant to be carried on, was sufficiently described, without declaring war or declaring that we were at war. Such a declaration by Congress might have constituted a perfect state of war, which was not intended by the Government.

Mr. SHAW. I do not like to interrupt the gentleman, but if he will permit I would like to call his attention to the instructions given to Ellsworth, October 22, 1799——

Mr. SAYERS. I will refer to them should I have time.

Mr. SHAW. Where the Government says the conduct of France was such as to have justified a declaration of war, but have contented themselves with preparations for defense and measures calculated to defend their commerce.

Mr. SAYERS. What has been stated by the gentleman from Maryland may be true, and yet does not at all conflict with the opinion of the Attorney-General, or with the one just read. It but gives additional strength to the proposition that there was an actual war. The very measures which were calculated to protect our commerce, though of a defensive character, were such as directly precede and always accompany naval warfare.

But before I forget it, Mr. Chairman, let me suggest that perhaps in the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Bas vs. Tingy, and in other cases involving the same and kindred questions, may be found the true and the only reason why the advocates of the payment of these claims have always been and are now opposed to their consideration by this court. They very well know that when they shall have reached the Supreme Court they will be confronted with propositions of law and with conclusions as to facts which they can not hope to evade or to overcome.

What they desired was a favorable decision from some court of authorized jurisdiction, however limited, but of all the courts the most undesirable to them would be the Supreme Court of the United States.

So far they have accomplished their wishes, and their pathway to the Treasury has been very smooth indeed. Two gateways are yet to be removed—the Congress and the Chief Executive.

Now, sir, in all candor I submit to the committee that the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] has been answered, and so fully and so successfully that there is not a particle of ground left upon which the claimants may stand. The opinions which I have read and caused to be read constitute history, and while they may not be familiar to the school-boys of the country, yet they are parts of the history of those troublous times, and as such are entitled to especial confidence.

If they may not be so regarded, then I am strangely ignorant of the proper sources to which to go for reliable information upon this particular subject. I am quite sure that the gentleman [Mr. RAYNER] if he were sitting as a judge upon the trial of these claims would follow and adhere to the opinions which I have laid before this committee as decisive of a great historical fact rather than the uncertain and oftentimes untrue declarations of the ordinary historian.

But, Mr. Chairman, while discussing this feature of the case permit me to call the attention of the committee for a moment to only one of the findings of the Court of Claims in the cases which have been before it. I would very much like to discuss some other of the findings, but time will not permit.

This court says, in one of its opinions:

Following in the path marked out by the Supreme Court in the prize cases which came before them during this period, and of which Bass vs. Tingey is a fair example, we are led to the conclusion that where a private vessel was fitted for the purpose of attacking armed French vessels, and of recapturing American vessels seized, she fell within the rules of war, and if captured, became legitimate prize. The relations of the two nations being strained to hostilities within certain distinctly defined bounds, within those bounds the active agents of either Government were subject to the rules of war, and vessels intending to seize must submit to seizure.

Here is a proposition to be easily understood by any one, whether a lawyer or not. It is plain common sense. Its meaning is evident, and there is not the slightest room for misconstruction. It reads well, and, to my mind, appears to be the law. But let us see how it is applied in a given case. Turning to page 75, Miscellaneous Document No. 5, we find the following reported case:

COURT OF CLAIMS.—FRENCH SPOLIATIONS.

(Act of January 20, 1885, Stat. L., 243.)

Ship John, Levi Putnam, master. No. 4. William Gray, administrator de bonis non of William Gray, jr., deceased, claimant. No. 12. Fisher Ames, administrator de bonis non of Fisher Ames, deceased, claimant. No. 778. Fisher Ames, administrator de bonis non of John Worthington, deceased, claimant.

CONCLUSIONS OF FACT.

These cases were tried before the Court of Claims on the 30th day of November, 1886.

The claimants were represented by William Gray, esq., and the United States, defendants, by the Attorney-General, through his assistant in the Department of Justice, Benjamin Wilson, esq., with whom was Assistant Attorney-General Robert A. Howard.

The court, upon the evidence and after hearing the arguments and considering the same with the briefs of counsel on each side, determine the facts to be as follows:

I.

William Gray, jr., deceased, was a citizen of Boston, Mass., and in 1799 was the owner of a ship called the John, a duly registered merchant vessel of the United States, of 175 tons burden, and built at Salisbury, Mass., 1794.

The John sailed from Salem, Mass., under the command of Levi Putnam, master, in March, 1799, with a cargo of provisions, bound for Cadiz and Gibraltar. Having arrived and discharged her cargo at these ports, and shipped a new cargo at Gibraltar, she again set sail, on June 28, 1799, for the East Indies on a trading voyage.

The new cargo consisted of 17 pipes of oil-proof brandy (1,971 gallons), 33,000 Spanish milled dollars and $1,000 in gold, owned by and shipped on account of said William Gray, jr.; 3,500 Spanish milled dollars, owned by and shipped on account of Fisher Ames, as a citizen of the United States, and 1,893 Spanish milled dollars, owned by and shipped on account of John Worthington, a citizen of the United States. The money, in each case, was to be laid out in purchasing a return cargo in the East Indies.

In prosecuting her voyage the John touched at St. Jago, Cape Verde Islands, and while lying there at anchor was captured, July 12, 1799, by the boats of a French squadron under the command of Commodore Landolphe. The cargo was taken out and retained by the captors and the ship carried out to sea. What became of the John does not clearly appear, but it was never restored to the owner nor taken to a prize court.

According to one report, she was burned by the captors, and according to another she was recaptured by an English man-of-war.

II.

At the time of the capture the John was armed with seventeen 4-pound guns and her crew consisted of twenty-six men.

She carried a commission or letter of authority from the President of the United States; but whether this commission was given under the provisions of the act of Congress of June 25, 1798 (1 Stat., 572), or under the act of July 9, 1798 (1 Stat., 578), does not appear.

Although so armed and commissioned the John was bound on a commercial voyage.

III.

The value of the ship	$6,000.00
The invoice value of 17 pipes of brandy	2,402.00
Thirty-three thousand Spanish milled dollars	33,000.00
One thousand dollars in gold	1,000.00
The freight earned at the time of the capture, amounting to two-thirds of $4,375	2,916.65
Total value of ship, cargo, and freight belonging to said William Gray, jr., deceased	45,318.65

The value of 3,500 Spanish milled dollars, the part of the cargo belonging to said Fisher Ames, deceased, the claimant in case No. 12, $3,500.

The value of 1,993 Spanish milled dollars, the part of the cargo belonging to said John Worthington, deceased, the claimant in case No. 778, $1,993.

Said claims were not embraced in the convention between the United States and the Republic of France, concluded on the 30th of April, 1803. They were not claims growing out of the acts of France allowed and paid in whole or in part under the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Spain, concluded on the 22d of February, 1819, and were not allowed in whole or in part under the provisions of the treaty between the United States and France on the 4th of July, 1831.

The claimants, in their respective capacity, were the owners of said claims which have never been assigned.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW.

The court decides as conclusions of law that said seizure and condemnation were illegal, and the owners and insurers had valid claims of indemnity therefor upon the French Government prior to the ratification of the convention between the United States and the French Republic, concluded on the 30th day of September, 1800; that said claims were relinquished to France by the Government of the United States by said treaty in part consideration of the relinquishment of certain national claims of France against the United States, and that the claimants are entitled to the following sums from the United States:

William Gray, administrator in case No. 4, to the value of the ship	$6,000.00
Invoice value of cargo belonging to William Gray, jr	36,402.00
Freight earned	2,916.66
Total for said Gray	45,318.66
Fisher Ames, claimant in case No. 12, to the value of the cargo belonging to Fisher Ames, deceased	3,500.00
Fisher Ames, administrator for John Worthington, claimant in case No. 778, to the value of the cargo belonging to said Worthington	1,993.00

JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

Can any one believe for a moment that this finding would be sustained by the Supreme Court had an appeal been allowed? How manifestly clear does the wisdom of the authors and promoters of the act of 1885 appear in the light of these findings?

Here is a vessel, having sought and obtained a commission as a privateer and fully armed, ready to fight the enemy if he should be the weaker, but to trade if the enemy should appear the stronger.

The story of Dr. Jekyl and Mr. Hyde well illustrates the double character of this vessel. To-day a friend, to-morrow a foe; here a peaceable trader, there an active belligerent; strong and full of bluster with the weaker, but as gentle as a lamb with the more powerful; full of patriotism where the exercise of patriotism is not dangerous, but always ready to turn an honest penny when the opportunity offers. The inducements to privateering were many and great. In addition to the facilities for traffic and trade, if the vessel of an enemy should be captured, one-half of it and of its cargo fell to the officers and men and the other half to the owner of the victorious vessel; and if an American vessel should be recaptured from the enemy, an amount not less than one-eighth nor greater than one-half of the value of the recaptured vessel and of its cargo would be allowed as salvage to the owner and officers and crew of the vessel recapturing.

It will not be necessary for me, Mr. Chairman, to dwell longer upon this case. It is but one of several of the same character, and is an evidence of the unwisdom—speaking from the standpoint of the Government and of the people—of the act of 1885 in not permitting an appeal to the Supreme Court.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] says:

But, Mr. Chairman, the fact is, it is a matter of no consequence whether there had been war or not. Suppose there had been a general war, which there was not; here were claims on one side for indemnity for spoliations, and on the other for violation of treaty. That these claims were not extinguished by the war, even if there had been war, is conclusively and absolutely proven by the fact that when the treaty was made and signed in 1800 both parties recognized in the original Article II the claims as still existing and not extinguished, but as a matter for future negotiation and settlement; and both parties, in afterward withdrawing said article and substituting for it another provision, expressly agreed to offset these claims one against the other.

And again:

In other words, taking advantage of the well-settled principle that private property may be taken for the public use, the United States deliberately and by solemn act of its President and Senate took the property of its citizens, which consisted of clear claims against France for utterly unwarranted and outrageous spoliation of their vessels, and with this property bought off the valid claim which France had against us for the guaranties we had given her.

Here, Mr. Chairman, is presented another issue of fact, to determine which we must necessarily review not only the treaties and conventions themselves, but to some extent the instructions to our envoys to France and the communications between them and the representatives of that Government.

But before doing so it will be well to note the fact that for depredations committed on our commerce up to and including the year 1795 France had discharged such claims therefor as had been presented.

I hold in my hand an official statement containing a list of some of these claims, and for the information of the committee I will incorporate it with my remarks.

It will be remembered that the United States did on the 7th day of July, 1798, through an act of Congress of that date abrogate all the treaties and conventions which had been formed with the French Government, so that there was, until the treaty and convention of 1800, no agreement of any kind whatever between ourselves and that people.

That we had the right under the principles of international law to take such action is beyond all question.

The breaking out of hostilities between two contracting powers, unless specially provided for, will terminate an existing treaty, and the violation of any covenant by either party gives to the other the right to abrogate the entire treaty, if it should so desire.

It was in these circumstances and after repeated efforts that commissioners were appointed by both the United States and France to settle existing differences and to formulate a new treaty.

Instructions of a definite and positive character were given our representatives at the very threshold of the negotiations, the most important of which I will now read:

At the opening of the negotiation you will inform the French ministers that the United States expect from France, as an indispensable condition of the treaty, a stipulation to make to the citizens of the United States full compensation for all losses and damages which they shall have sustained by reason of irregular or illegal captures or condemnations of their vessels and other property, under color of authority or commissions from the French Republic or its agents, * * * when the vessels or other property captured shall have been sold, or otherwise disposed of, without a regular trial and condemnation.

The attention of the committee is earnestly invited to this clause, because in it is recognized the existence of a war in which France was involved. It was not to be supposed that each and every vessel seized by France was altogether blameless. Almost every European nation was, on the one side or the other, enlisted in the war which she was then waging with England. Supplies of all kinds were in the greatest and most active demand, and it was but probable that many of our merchantmen, allured by the prospect of great profits, often transgressed the border line of a strict neutrality. If in so doing they were seized, captured, and condemned, it was the just penalty for the violation of well-settled and long-established principles of international law, and they had no right to demand the interference of our Government in their behalf.

France could not be denied the right to establish her own prize courts, and all that could be expected of her would be that the trials should be regular and the condemnations be had in accordance with law.

To say that the Government of the United States was bound to interfere in every case or to demand redress for every condemnation would be preposterous. It was incumbent upon the owners and officers of our vessels to take notice of the war that was then existing in Europe, and to faithfully observe the rules, usages, and principles which govern the conduct of neutrals during such a time.

But to another class of instructions. Upon examination we find our envoys also charged as follows:

The claims of the United States, as distinguished from those of their citizens, for injuries received from the French Republic or its citizens, should be submitted to the same board; and whatever sums they award, France should stipulate to pay, in the manner before mentioned in the case of captures. * * * If, however, the French Government should desire to waive its national claims, you may do the like on the part of the United States. Doubtless the claims of the latter would exceed those of the former; but, to avoid multiplying subjects of dispute, and because national claims may probably be less definite than those of individuals, and consequently more difficult to adjust, national claims may on both sides be relinquished." (American State Papers, Foreign Relations, volume 2, page 303.)

These instructions become very important, not only because of their definite character, but also because they furnish the correct solution to the celebrated second article of the treaty of 1800, which was expunged by the Senate, and for which action the gentleman from Massachusetts so bitterly complains.

They are also important because, before negotiations had been begun, a broad and clear distinction was drawn between national and individual claims. And lastly—

That the treaties and consular convention, declared to be no longer obligatory by act of Congress, be not in whole or in part revived by the new treaty, but that all the engagements to which the United States are to become parties be specified in the new treaty.

Upon this point, Mr. Chairman, our Government was decided, and from the position it had assumed in consequence of the act of July 7, 1798, it did not intend to be moved. No inducement, however enticing, and no pressure, however severe, could persuade it to recall that declaration. As was well said by the American envoys, "the United States must abide by its effects, with respect to the priority of treaties, whatever inconveniences may result to themselves." These treaties and the consular convention did not, therefore, constitute live issues, upon which the representatives of the two Governments were to reach an agreement. They were dead, completely dead, and upon them the American envoys were directed not to deliberate. To this, however, the representatives of France would not assent.

After sitting many months, and after many propositions had been presented on both sides, an agreement was finally reached. This agreement is known as the treaty of 1800.

For the purpose of this discussion only two of the articles of the treaty need be considered—the second and the fifth.

The second article reads thus:

The ministers plenipotentiary of the two parties not being able to agree at present respecting the treaty of alliance of 6th February, 1778, the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date, and the convention of 14th November, 1788, nor upon the indemnities mutually due or claimed, the parties will negotiate further on these subjects at a convenient time, and until they may have agreed upon these points the said treaties and convention shall have no operation, and the relations of the two countries shall be regulated as follows:

And the fifth article:

The debts contracted by one of the two nations with individuals of the other, or by individuals of the one with the individuals of the other, shall be paid, or the payment may be prosecuted in the same manner as if there had been no misunderstanding between the two States. But this clause shall not extend to indemnities claimed on account of captures or confiscations.

The treaty, having been signed by the negotiators, was sent to the United States for approval, and was by the President transmitted to the Senate. That body, after some consideration, expunged the second article and inserted in its stead the following:

It is agreed that the present convention shall be in force for the term of eight years from the time of the exchange of the ratifications.

No other alteration was made in the treaty, which was returned to the President in its amended form, and by him returned to France.

Bonaparte, First Consul, consented, on the 31st of July, 1801—to accept, ratify, and confirm the above convention, with the addition importing that the convention shall be in force for the space of eight years, and with the retrenchment of the second article: Provided, that by this retrenchment the two States renounce the respective pretensions, which are the object of the said article.

These ratifications, having been exchanged at Paris, were again submitted by the President to the Senate, which declared, by resolution, that it regarded the convention as fully ratified.

Now, sir, we have before us the whole treaty of 1800, and it is upon the action of the Senate in expunging the original second article and in accepting the proviso, attached by Bonaparte, that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] founds his argument in support of the validity of these claims. Bear in mind that the spoliations, whose finding is within the scope of the act of 1885, were mostly committed during the years 1798–1800.

Before considering the language of the treaty, as well in its original as in its amended form, when promulgated, it would be well to note the proceedings of the Senate in its action expunging the second article and also when it was considering the treaty for the second time. We find that, upon the motion to expunge, thirty Senators voted in its favor and but one Senator (Mr. Marshall, of Kentucky) voted against it; and that upon the final ratification twenty-two Senators voted in the affirmative and only four voted in the negative. These latter were Mr. Chipman of Vermont, Mr. Foster of Rhode Island, Mr. Hillhouse of Connecticut, and Mr. Wells of Delaware.

It has been charged, Mr. Chairman, all through this debate, and elsewhere than in the Halls of Congress, that these Senators—many of them representing States whose citizens suffered most severely from these depredations upon our commerce—did wantonly, willfully, and deliberately sacrifice the interests of their own constituents for the public welfare.

Can this be so? Did they do it or did they intend to do it?

To suppose that it was their intention to take the property of the citizen for the public benefit, that is to say, to use the individual claims against France in the purchase of a release from the treaties and convention which we had abrogated in 1798, would be to hold them strangely unmindful of their obligation to support and to maintain the Constitution, and utterly disregardful not only of their duty to their immediate constituencies, but also extremely indifferent to that line of policy so essentially necessary to the preservation of themselves in the estimation of a people, upon whom they were to depend for future preferment.

These Senators have been long since dead. They did not live to behold the expansion of the few States which then constituted the Federal Union into a vast commonwealth of local sovereignties, stretching from ocean to ocean and from the Great Lakes to the Rio Grande; nor was it permitted them to see the marvelous development which has wrought so wonderful a change upon this continent during the past fifty years; but be it said for them that they did not live in vain. They were brave; they were great; they were just; they were patriotic; they were faithful to every public trust; and I protest against such an imputation against their memories. The thought that these men should have been so heedless of the rights of their countrymen is not to be entertained.

That they did not do it is clearly manifest, not only from the language of the treaty in its every form, but also in the subsequent proceedings of both Governments.

But what, sir, is the fair construction of the rejected article? Do the indemnities mentioned refer to national or to private claims? The representatives of the United States were especially charged to bring them both to the attention of the French Government, and if possible to secure a settlement. Was there a binding promise to consider these claims at any particular time? On the contrary, it was to be at the convenience of both Governments. When was to be the convenient day and year? Perhaps soon, perhaps late, perhaps never.

It is quite sure that the United States would not reconsider her action in respect to the treaties and convention, which had been abrogated, and our envoys had been so informed in the instructions given them. What, then, did the second article amount to? Was there anything of a substantial character in it? Certainly, the advocates of the payment of these claims will not have the hardihood to affirm that the United States should have returned to the treaties and convention in order to secure their payment, nor will they have the courage to contend that for refusing to revive the treaties and convention our Government became liable for the French spoliations. But of what possible benefit could the provisions of the second article be to the claimants? None whatever, will be the certain answer of every fair-minded man.

Now, let us briefly consider the proviso attached by Bonaparte and also properly interpret, if we can, the action of the Senate in reference thereto. The language used by the First Consul is:

Provided, The two states renounce the respective pretensions which are the bject of said article.

The Senate was in possession of the treaty, and we are warranted in obelieving that the proviso was criticised and considered in every possible phase. The Senators knew what value to put upon the expunged article. By the reference of the treaty to them they had become in a measure diplomatists, and without committing themselves in the one way or the other, they merely returned the treaty by a vote of 22 to 4 to the President, with a declaration that the convention had been fully ratified. Upon the proviso hangs the whole case of these claimants.

If the position assumed by the claimants be correct, then there should have been no further effort by our Government toward obtaining remuneration for them from the French Government.

But we do not find such to be the case. A misunderstanding soon arose between the two countries as to the second (expunged) and the fifth articles of the treaty. Mr. Jefferson, in his first annual message, expresses the hope—

That wrongs committed on unoffending friends under a pressure of circumstances will now be reviewed with candor, and will be considered as founding just claims of retribution for the past and new assurances for the future.

Does this indicate an abandonment of the claims of our citizens against France? Many, very many communications passed between the two countries upon the subject. Much ill-feeling was germinated, and it increased so much that we were again almost upon the verge of hostilities. After the lapse of considerable time, in order to secure harmonious action under the treaty, and also the recognition and payment by France of both national and individual claims, another treaty and convention was entered into—the treaty and convention of 1803.

I will read certain portions of this treaty and convention for the purpose of demonstrating to this committee the entire falsity of the position assumed by these claimants.

Here is a portion of the preamble. It runs in this wise:

TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE FRENCH REPUBLIC, CONCLUDED APRIL 30, 1803.

The President of the United States of America, and the First Consul of the French Republic, in the name of the French people, desiring to remove all sources of misunderstanding relative to objects of discussion mentioned in the second and fifth articles of the convention of the 8th Vendemiaire, an 9 (30th September, 1800). * * *

And again:

CONVENTION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE FRENCH REPUBLIC, CONCLUDED APRIL 30, 1803.

The President of the United States of America, and the First Consul of the French Republic, in the name of the French people, having by a treaty of this date terminated all difficulties relative to Louisiana, and established on a solid foundation the friendship which unites the two nations, and being desirous, in compliance with the second and fifth articles of the convention of the 8th Vendémiaire, ninth year of the French Republic (30th September, 1800), to secure the payment of the sums due by France to the citizens of the United States, have respectively nominated as plenipotentiaries, etc.

And, again:

ART. III. The principal and interest of the said debts shall be discharged by the United States by orders drawn by their minister plenipotentiary on their Treasury. These orders shall be payable sixty days after the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty and the conventions signed this day, and after possession shall be given of Louisiana by the commissaries of France to those of the United States.

And, again:

ART. IV. It is expressly agreed that the preceding articles shall comprehend no debts but such as are due to citizens of the United States who have been and are yet creditors of France for supplies, for embargoes, and prizes made at sea in which the appeal has been properly lodged within the time mentioned in the said convention, 8th Vendémiaire, ninth year (30th September, 1800).

Can it be said, Mr. Chairman, in the face of this evidence, made indisputable by the solemn action of both governments, that the United States has been derelict in a single duty to these claimants? Were their rights bartered away under the treaty of 1800? For answer, I submit not only the action of the President and of our representatives at the French court, repeated again, and again, and again; but I also submit the portions of the treaty and convention of 1803, which I have just read. Is not the refutation complete?

But, sir, if there still remains in the mind of any member not wholly and irrevocably committed to the payment of these claims a single doubt as to the continued and earnest effort of this Government, during almost an half century, in behalf of these claims, let me now have the attention of such member to two articles, which I read from the treaty of 1831:

ARTICLE I. The French Government, in order to liberate itself completely from all the reclamations preferred against it by citizens of the United States, for unlawful seizures, captures, sequestrations, confiscations, or destructions of their vessels, cargoes, or other property, engages to pay a sum of 25,000,000 francs to the Government of the United States, who shall distribute it among those entitled, in the manner and according to the rules which it shall determine.

* * * * * * *

ART. III. The Government of the United States, on its part, for the purpose of being liberated completely from all reclamations presented by France on behalf of its citizens, or of the royal treasury (either for ancient supplies or accounts, the liquidation of which had been reserved, or for unlawful seizures, captures, detentions, arrests, or destructions of French vessels, cargoes, or other property) engages to pay to the Government of His Majesty (which shall make distribution of the same in the manner and according to the rules to be determined by it) the sum of 1,500,000 francs.

Mr. Chairman, I now submit to this committee that the proposition enunciated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] can not be sustained.

Official utterances, diplomatic correspondence, treaties, and conventions—all condemn it as without foundation in fact.

The treaty of 1831—made so long after the spoliations were committed—did not, as has been seen, overlook them.

How full and complete are the articles quoted. There is no limitation as to time.

Every character of claim that could be urged against France—with the faintest hope of success—has been provided for by treaty or convention.

Mr. DIBBLE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DIBBLE. Does not the gentleman know that when the commissioners met under the convention of 1803, some of these very claims were brought forward and rejected because they did not come under that convention?

Mr. SAYERS. That may have been so; some may have been rejected; but at the same time others were paid. Several claims, which had accrued before the year 1800, were paid.

Mr. DIBBLE. Were they not those provided for in the fourth section, wherein condemnation had not been definitively concluded? That is the only class of claims which were paid under the convention of 1803; and not this class of claims.

Mr. SAYERS. I suppose all claims except war claims have been paid.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that these claims originated while war, actual war, was pending between the United States and France. I believe that our Government has done its full duty to the claimants. I believe that many, very many, of the claims are fraudulent, and that it is now impossible to distinguish the genuine from the bad. I believe that it was exceeding bad policy to commit the consideration of these claims solely and exclusively to a court of limited jurisdiction, without the privilege of an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

So believing, Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against the item in the pending bill which provides for the payment of such of these claims as have been reported by the Court of Claims to Congress.

Mr. LONG. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE].

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I desire to argue this question, as nearly as it may be done in this House, as a lawyer would argue a similar question before a court. I have no other interest in this matter than a public interest. I do not know that there is in my district any one who will obtain any benefit from our action. I approached the study of these questions with my prejudices against the payment of these claims. All my investigations since I have been in Congress have inclined my mind against the payment of money out of the Treasury, and so far as I have taken any part in the public service it has been in the direction of keeping money in the Treasury, except for the payment of the public debt, while seeking to reduce the future surplus in an entirely different way from the payment of money. Therefore my prejudices in every form were against the payment of this debt. My conclusion that it ought to be paid has been reached by the irresistible force of the facts in the case, and I desire to submit those facts, rather than any argument adduced from them, to this committee.

These claims, in the judgment of the United States of America, whose Government we represent to-day, and in whose name we speak, were valid, honest, and just claims in the years 1798, 1799, and 1800. They were then just claims in our judgment, for being in a real sense a corporation the United States is immortal and the same to-day that it was then—these were claims which we believed were so just and so honest that their settlement was to be one of the points in the ultimata which our Government itself submitted to the French Government. No change has come over those claims. They were then past transactions. No possible alteration of their validity, their justice, or their honesty could have occurred. As a matter of philosophy it is impossible for the nature of these claims to be different to-day from what they were when the President of the United States directed the plenipotentiaries of the United States to submit, as one of the ultimata to the French Government, the settlement of these just, these honest, and these valid claims.

What has occurred to justify gentlemen in repudiating, not the claims, but our judgment that they were honest? Nothing in the claims has changed. So we start with the admitted fact that in 1799 and 1800 the Government of the United States made as one of its ultimata to the French Government the adjustment of these claims.

The next fact about which there is no dispute is, those plenipotentiaries, unable to agree with the French Government about these claims, put into the convention of November, 1800, as its second article, an agreement that the adjustment of these claims, together with the adjustment of the claims which the French Government used as a set-off to these, were to be postponed. So on that day the plenipotentiaries of the United States, in the name of the United States, declared these were subsisting claims.

Now, mind you, all we could know of a pre-existing war was known to these plenipotentiaries and to the Government. Every argument made by my friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], every argument made by the committee in their paper—not their report, but the paper filed with this bill—or any argument which can be made on this floor was as well known to these plenipotentiaries as it can be to us. We declared as between the United States and France as honest and just claims these were subsisting claims to be set off against claims made against us. There is no escape from the conclusion that our forefathers when they made the claims did it with knowledge of all the facts, and it is to be presumed they were honest in the claims; but whether they were honest or not we are estopped on the simplest principle of law and equity from asserting that the claims which we said were just as against France were unjust, dishonest, invalid as against us when made by our own citizens.

We can not after November, 1800, the day on which we agreed with France that these subsisting claims should be postponed for adjustment, turn upon our own citizens and declare that prior to that day they were invalid, dishonest, or unjust. The alleged war had been ended; the transactions were of the past; we gave these claims our indorsement; we sanctified them with our imprimatur. So that the second fact in this chain of facts is that these claims by our averment were subsisting claims subsequently to every alleged fact produced on this floor to show that they are invalid.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. May I ask a question?

Mr. LONG. I would remind the gentleman from Minnesota that the time of the gentleman from Kentucky is quite limited.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. If it does not interrupt the course of his argument——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. It is altogether a question of time; but if the gentleman desires to ask a question, although I may not answer it immediately, I will endeavor to do so in the course of the argument as I proceed.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Do you mean to say that our Government ever admitted that these were valid claims as you now present them, to wit, as claims against this Government?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. If the gentleman will do me the favor to observe the course of my argument, I will endeavor to give him an affirmative answer to his question further on.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. And, further, do you mean to say as a lawyer or as an intelligent layman that because our Government suggested that France should settle claims—certain alleged claims of certain citizens—that therefore we are estopped from ascertaining the very truth of the allegations on which these claims are based?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I will answer both questions of the gentleman as I proceed, or else I will fail altogether in my argument, because that is distinctively what I propose to show.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, the first fact admitted is that we averred that these were good claims against France; second, that on the 30th day of November, 1800, we declared that they were subsisting claims, to which we adhered with such tenacity that, as we could not agree as to the claims of France, we postponed the day of their settlement and adjustment. That is the second fact.

Now, as to the conclusions—and I do not want to be diverted from this line of thought until I have put in some further facts; but I think when I have done so that no honest man, be he a lawyer or a layman, will differ with me in the conclusions I shall draw from the several admitted facts in the case—that they justify the payment of the claims, if they do not absolutely demand their payment.

The third fact is that the convention was submitted to the Senate of the United States, the treaty-making power of the Government, and the second article, agreeing that the adjustment of the conflicting claims should be postponed, was stricken out and the new clause inserted limiting the convention to eight years.

The fourth fact is that the treaty thus amended, being a new one, was ratified by the Government of France, not as stated in what I will not charge is a disingenuous manner by the report of the Committee on Appropriations, as an explanatory note by Napoleon, but as the act of the French Government itself; and that convention was ratified upon the condition and with the understanding that this new convention made by the Senate of the United States by the expunging of the second article and the insertion of the limit of eight years should be the renunciation of all mutual and conflicting claims of the two parties. This was the distinct condition of the ratification by the French Government. That act of ratification including, as it did, a new term, to wit, the distinct renunciation of all conflicting claims, had to be submitted by our President to the Senate, and was by it accepted. The mode of acceptance is not essential; the fact of acceptance is proven by the promulgation of the treaty with that ratifying clause.

Now, what is the connecting fact that links these four facts together to raise a liability on the part of the American Government to its own citizens? These claims, which were first averred by us to be just; which were, secondly, averred to be existing and subsisting claims in November, 1800; which were, thirdly, agreed by us to be the price we gave for peace from the claims set up by France, were claims which citizens of the United States held against the sovereignty of France for outrages committed upon the high seas, and uncollectible save through our sovereign authority; claims which our citizens had put into the hands of the Government of the United States to collect, and were in the hands of the United States as a part of what it was negotiating about.

Against the United States, and not against these citizens, the Government of France had claims growing out of the treaty of 1778, which claims were important and of great value, or of great harm, it might be, to us, according to the mode of settlement. Now, we used these claims which we averred were honest, which we claimed were subsisting, to purchase our release from the claims of the French Government. In other words, the Government of the United States, holding for collection certain claims of its citizens, surrendered them for the release of certain claims held by the French Government against the United States. We did it by virtue of the sovereignty resting in the American Government holding the claims for the benefit of its own citizens. We did it receiving compensation for the act. We did receive that compensation; and now I submit, under these circumstances, what is the just and fair liability of this Government who has thus acted towards its own citizens?

Mr. Chairman, I have not argued this question with any of the technical language used by the lawyer, nor have I gone into the minutiæ of the developments of these historical facts. I have simply tried to look at it from the standpoint of the Government itself. I represent the Government. The citizen comes to me with his claim saying, "I put this into your hands, a claim which I can not collect; you represent the Government and can collect it." I accept that claim; but in place of collecting the claim for the benefit of the citizen, I take his claim and use it for the purpose of purchasing peace at a time subsequent to all the things which might have taken life and validity out of it.

This citizen now asks, "What will you do now that you have purchased your peace with my claim in a controversy in which the Government was interested with a foreign nation?" What answer should the Government of the United States make to the citizen whose claim had been used in that manner. He says: "The committee in 1802 reported in my favor, and that report was not excepted to—the report made by Mr. Giles, who said it was understood between the French Government and our envoy at that time that that was the result of the treaty, the one claim extinguishing the other."

In 1807 Mr. Marion, of South Carolina, reported in favor of these claims, and I quote that report:

The committee to whom was referred the memorial of sundry merchants residing in Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, complaining of spoliations committed on their lawful commerce by the cruisers and other armed vessels of France during the late European war, and praying compensation therefor, report:

That during the first session of the Seventh Congress memorials were presented to this House by the present memorialists and from the merchants in most of the commercial towns in the United States complaining of the spoliations and depredations which their lawful commerce in the late European war had sustained from the French armed vessels, and praying for compensation from this Government. These memorials were referred to a select committee, who on 22d April, 1802, made a long and full report of the public acts of the French Republic, and of this Government, and of the facts relative to this case, to which report your committee beg leave to refer, and requ st that it may be taken and considered as part of their present report.

"From a mature consideration of the subject, and from the best judgment your committee have been able to form on the case, they are of opinion that this Government, by expunging the second article of our convention with France of the 30th September, 1800, became bound to indemnify the memorialists for those just claims which they otherwise would rightfully have had on the Government of France for the spoliations committed on their commerce by the illegal captures made by the cruisers and other armed vessels of that power in violation of the law of nations and in breach of treaties then existing between the two nations; which claims they were, y the rejection of the said article of the convention, forever barred from preferring to the Government of France for compensation."

In 1826, as Secretary of State, Henry Clay submitted the history of the case, substantially confirming all the claims, to the Congress of the United States.

A short but accurate general view of the history and character of these claims is presented in the report of the Secretary of State, on the 20th of May, 1826, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate. Allow me, sir, to read the paragraphs:

"The Secretary can hardly suppose it to have been the intention of there solution to require the expression of an argumentative opinion as to the degree of responsibility to the American sufferers from French spoliations, which the convention of 1800 extinguished on the part of France, or devolved on the United States, the Senate itself being most competent to decide that question. Under this impression, he hopes that he will have sufficiently conformed to the purposes of the Senate by a brief statement, prepared in a hurried moment, of what he understands to be the question."

The second article of the convention of 1800 was in the following words: "The ministers plenipotentiary of the two parties not being able to agree at present respecting the treaty of alliance of the 6th of February, 1778, the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date, and the convention of the 14th of November, 1788, nor upon the indemnities mutually due or claimed, the parties will negotiate further on these subjects at a convenient time; and, until they may have agreed upon these points, the said treaties and convention shall have no operation, and the relations of the two countries shall be regulated as follows."

When that convention was laid before the Senate, it gave its consent and advice that it should be ratified, provided that the second article be expunged and that the following article be added or inserted: "It is agreed that the present convention shall be in force for the term of eight years from the time of the exchange of the ratifications." And it was accordingly so ratified by the President of the United States on the 18th day of February, 1801. On the 31st of July of the same year it was ratified by Bonaparte, First Consul of the French Republic, who incorporated in the instrument of his ratification the following clause as part of it: "The Government of the United States having added to its ratification that the convention should be in force for the space of eight years, and having omitted the second article, the Government of the French Republic consents to accept, ratify, and confirm the above convention, with the addition, importing that the convention shall be in force for the space of eight years, and with the retrenchment of the second article: Provided, That by this retrenchment the two states renounce the respective pretensions which are the object of the said article."

The French ratification being thus conditional, was nevertheless exchanged against that of the United States, at Paris, on the same 31st of July. The President of the United States considering it necessary again to submit the convention in this state to the Senate, on the 19th day of December, 1801, it was resolved by the Senate that they considered the said convention as fully ratified and returned it to the President for the usual promulgation. It was accordingly promulgated, and thereafter regarded as a valid and binding compact. The two contracting parties thus agreed, by the retrenchment of the second article, mutually to renounce the respective pretensions which were the object of that article. The pretensions of the United States, to which allusion is thus made, arose out of the spoliations under color of French authority, in contravention of law and existing treaties. Those of France sprung from the treaty of alliance of the 6th of February, 1778, the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date, and the convention of the 14th of November, 1788. Whatever obligations or indemnities from these sources either party had a right to demand were respectively waived and abandoned, and the consideration which induced one party to renounce his pretensions was that of renunciation by the other party of his pretensions.

What was the value of the obligations and indemnities so reciprocally renounced can only be matter of speculation. The amount of the indemnities due to the citizens of the United States was very large; and on the other hand the obligation was great (to specify no other French pretensions) under which the United States were placed in the eleventh article of the treaty of alliance of the 6th of February, 1778, by which they were bound forever to guaranty from that time the then possessions of the Crown of France in America, as well as those which it might acquire by the future treaty of peace with Great Britain, all these possessions havin : been, it is believed, conquered at or not long after the exchange of the ratifications of the convention of September, 1800, by the arms of Great Britain from France.

The fifth article of the amendment to the Constitution provides: "Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation." If the indemnities to which citizens of the United States were entitled for French spoliation prior to the 30th of September, 1800, have been appropriated to absolve the United States from the fulfillment of an obligation which they had contracted, or from the payment of indemnities which they had contracted, or from the payment of indemnities which they were bound to make to France, the Senate is most competent to determine how far such an appropriation is a public use of private property within the spirit of the Constitution, and whether equitable considerations do not require some compensation to be made to the claimants. The Senate is also best able to estimate the probability which existed of an ultimate recovery from France of the amount due for those indemnities, if they had not been renounced, in making which estimates it will, no doubt, give just weight to the painful consideration that repeated and urgent appeals have been in vain made to the justice of France for satisfaction of flagrant wrongs committed upon property of other citizens of the United States subsequent to the period of the 30th of September, 1800.

In 1834, in debate in the Senate of the United States, Mr. Webster read this report which I now use; and I ask leave to read the following comment made by him upon it. We can not much err on such matter if we follow Clay and Webster:

Before the interference of our Government with these claims, they constituted just demands against the Government of France. They were not vague expectations of possible future indemnity for injuries received, too uncertain to be regarded as valuable or be esteemed property. They were just demands, and as such they were property. The courts of law took notice of them as property. They were capable of being devised, of being distributed among heirs and next of kin, and of being transferred and assigned, like other legal and just debts. A claim or demand for a ship unjustly seized and confiscated is property as clearly as the ship itself.

It may not be so valuable or so certain, but it is as clear a right, and has been uniformly so regarded by the courts of law. The papers show that American citizens had claims against the French Government for 615 vessels unlawfully seized and confiscated. If this were so, it is difficult to see how the Government of the United States can release these claims for its own benefit with any more propriety than it could have applied the money to its own use if the French Government had been ready to make compensation in money for the property thus illegally seized and confiscated, or how the Government could appropriate to itself the just claims which the owners of these 615 vessels held against the wrong-doers without making compensation any more than it could appropriate to itself without making compensation 615 ships which had not been seized. I do not mean to say that the rate of compensation should be the same in both cases; I do not mean to say that a claim for a ship is of as much value as a ship; but I mean to say that both the one and the other are property, and that Government can not with justice deprive a man of either for its own benefit without making a fair compensation.

It will be perceived at once, sir, that these claims do not rest on the ground of any neglect or omission on the part of the Government of the United States, in demanding satisfaction from France. That is not the ground. The Government of the United States in that respect performed its full duty. It remonstrated against these illegal seizures; it insisted on redress; it sent two special missions to France, charged expressly, among other duties, with the duty of demanding indemnity. But France had her subjects of complaint, also, against the Government of the United States, which she pressed with equal earnestness and confidence, and which she would neither postpone nor relinquish except on the condition that the United States would postpone or relinquish these claims. And to meet this condition, and to restore harmony between the two nations, the United States did agree, first to postpone, and afterwards to relinquish, these claims of its own citizens. In other words, the Government of the United States bought off the claims of France against itself by discharging claims of our own citizens against France.

This, sir, is the ground on which these citizens think they have a claim for reasonable indemnity against their own Government.

And now, sir, before proceeding to the disputed part of the case, permit me to state what is admitted.

In the first place, then, it is universally admitted that these petitioners once had just claims against the Government of France on account of these illegal captures and condemnations.

In the next place, it is admitted that these claims no longer exist against France; that they have, in some way, been extinguished or released as to her, and that she is forever discharged from all duty of paying or satisfying them, in whole or in part.

These claimants have not slept on their claims, but have done all in their power. They have submitted proof, have protested against our injustice and delay, and we answer that this is an old claim and take advantage of our own wrong. Having delayed for three generations by our refusal to pay an honest debt, we now argue that we will not pay after so long a lapse of time. That is, the more a creditor demands payment and the oftener the debtor refuses payment the less is the creditor entitled to be paid and the more just and decent does the action of the refusing debtor become. No lawyer will seriously claim that these are "stale" claims. Ancient claims are not "stale" claims. Laches—sleep—makes staleness; to the "sleeping" equity or law (æquitas vel jura) refuse aid. "Vigilantibus, non dormientibus æquitas subvenit" is the true principle; and in the light of this recital these claimants have been vigilant from 1802 to this very day.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. If the United States acted as a trustee, it would not be a stale claim.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I am not going into that, because it involves technical questions of trust. The ground I put it on is that the United States by virtue of its own action have swapped off these claims, not as trustee, but as a sovereign state with the power of eminent domain; it gave to itself the benefit of these claims, and the case stands substantially on the principle contained in the quotation in his report by the distinguished lawyer from Massachusetts, Mr. Collins, from the great case in 1796, which decided that a British debt owed by a Virginia citizen, confiscated by the State of Virginia, paid by the Virginia debtor to the Commonwealth of Virginia, could be yet recovered by the British creditor after the treaty of peace, that treaty having given to these British creditors the right to collect in spite of whatever impediment had existed to the collection of their debt. And the court laid down this principle, which is the principle upon which I base my conclusions on these claims:

That Congress had the power to sacrifice the rights and interests of private citizens to secure the safety or prosperity to the public I have no doubt, but the immutable principles of justice, the public faith of the States that confiscated and received the British debts, pledged to the debtors, and the rights of the debtors violated by the treaty, all combine to prove that ample compensation ought to be made to all the debtors who have been injured by the treaty for the benefit of the public. This principle is recognized by the Constitution, which declares "that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation."

The principle, not the facts in that case is exactly on all fours with the principle in this case. The Government had the power to make that treaty with the French under the treaty-making power. In other words, for the safety of the Government and by virtue of its sovereignty, these claims were used to purchase a release from the French of their claims, and it is estopped—in answer to the question by the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON]—from saying that what it said to France was a lie; that what it stated in the convention was a diplomatic falsehood, and that these claims were invalid and not just claims. That is the true answer that the political department of every government ought to make to its own citizens who ask for redress under such circumstances.

By the simplest principle of common fair dealing among men you would not permit a guardian to make such defense in a court of equity, and the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota, who has presided in a court of justice with ability, would not hear a defense where a guardian, with the claim of ward in his hand, went to a man and said to him, "My ward has a debt against you." He says, "It is not a just claim, but I have a claim against you;" and then the guardian says, "I will swap my ward's debts for these claims, though I deny them." I say there is no court that would allow the guardian afterwards to plead as against that ward that his were invalid claims against that debtor; that they were mere whetstones, chips, and shavings, and therefore invalid; and as the guardian may be made to do right by the verdict of the court, so the sovereign power can only be made to do right by its own sense of justice. The strong arm of the law, the sheriff or the marshal, can not enforce the claim of the private citizen against the Government, and therefore we ought to be the more generous, prompt, honest, and decorous in paying.

Now, one other matter, for I will not take up time in trying to read documents which I shall ask leave of the committee to print with my remarks in the RECORD. It is said that these claims ought to go to the Supreme Court of the United States. It is a tempting plea. It has the sound of justice. Eighty-eight years have passed away; those who owned these debts are dead; their children are dead; another generation has come upon the scene, and now it is proposed that we shall send these claims to the Supreme Court for the first time in the history of our Government! Sixteen or more commissions have we appointed for matters connected with our diplomatic relations. I hold in my hand a table which shows the mode adopted in all other matters of this sort. In sixteen cases we appointed commissions to distribute the money. But, say gentlemen, "This is not the same sort of a case, because in those cases you got the money." Indubitably there is a difference, but in whose favor is that difference? When the United States honestly goes ahead and collects my money am I to have a different rule in dealing with the United States from that which I should have when it goes ahead and does not collect my money in money, but does collect it in safety? What in law and in justice is the difference between the two cases?

Why should I be put off with a different mode of settlement of a diplomatic and political matter when the payment received by the United States was in the safety that it obtained by its set-off claim from that which should govern where it got its payment in so many ducats paid down? This question does not belong to the judicial department of the Government. Distinguished gentlemen have argued that it does, and that these claims should be sent to the Supreme Court for determination, but when you analyze their arguments the essence of them plainly is that this Congress is an imbecile body, that it is incapable of performing the duties put upon it by the Constitution. We are the political branch of the Government. It is our business to ascertain what wrong the political branch of the Government has done and what reparation is possible or proper for the occasion. That is not a judicial question. It does not belong under the Constitution to the courts of this country. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, there is no difficulty about this case. Able gentlemen may find difficulties, because able gentlemen can make mice tracks seem as if elephants had walked there, and, by the power of intellectual microscopes, can make mole-hills seem mountains. But, sir, this is as simple a case as was ever tried before a justice of the peace, and there would be no difficulty about it if one of the parties was not a sovereign power, but a citizen. There is no difficulty about the case and there is no reason for delay. We have not done what is proposed here in any of these other cases. We have not sent them to the Supreme Court, and if we were to send these cases there at all it ought to have been done years ago.

One other thought, Mr. Chairman. Do we stand in the same attitude as preceding Congresses to this question? I may be mistaken in all that I have said. I may err, but if I do I err in glorious company. I err in company with the committee of the first Congress that assembled after this question arose, the Congress of 1802; I err with the committee of the Congress of 1807; I err with Clay and Webster and John Marshall, with Everett and Cushing and Sumner; I err with the great lawyers whose names adorn the history of the bar, and the great statesmen whose names are the gems that we carry in our coronet of civic glory. But suppose I do err? There had been a contention of eighty-five years' duration, and now these claimants came and said, let us settle this matter.

The committee of the Forty-eighth Congress which considered this question under the leadership of its eminent men, said:

In the opinion of the committee the gravity of the case and the ends of justice alike demand a settlement of this vexed question where it can be dispassionately heard and impartially considered.

"Where it can be dispassionately heard and impartially considered." It has been dispassionately heard; it has been dispassionately and impartially considered. The old contention for which members of Congress for eighty-five years have fought in both Houses, which has been vetoed by Presidents, which has divided committees—that contention has been heard and considered by five gentlemen of ample learning, with large research and erudition, and after great debate those five gentlemen, not with any divided or dissenting voice, but unanimously have decided that these old reports by Giles, of Virginia; by Marion, of South Carolina; by Clay, of Kentucky; by Webster, of Massachusetts; by Clayton, of Delaware; by Cushing, and others—that these old reports as to what we owe to these claimants are just, and properly express what this Government ought to do. We stand here to-day, after having deliberately submitted this vexed contention to five impartial gentlemen, clothed with the judicial ermine, and, after they have dispassionately heard and dispassionately considered it, now when the grandchildren and great grandchildren of those whose claims were used to buy our peace come and plead not only all that I have pleaded, but, in addition, this judgment of this impartial, dispassionate tribunal, we turn them away with the technical plea that there was a war; a war of which there was no declaration and which ended with no treaty of peace; a war which closed no tribunals, a war in which no soldiers won glory and in which there were no victories on either side, or with some pretense as groundless and unsubstantial; or the tribunal mutually selected having decided for the claimants, we insist on another hearing before another tribunal. No, Mr. Chairman, let us not shirk our representative duty; here and now let us settle these claims and take on ourselves the responsibility therefor.

Here is the history of eighty-five years of vexed dispute, with the final adjudication of an unimpassioned and impartial tribunal. And we are asked, after all this, to refuse to pay what have been thus deliberately and impartially decided to be honest claims.

Mr. Chairman, having undertaken to study this subject and to go to the bottom of it so far as I could, having commenced at the very beginning, and traced it through these old and musty documents down to the very papers of to-day, I can not see how I, with a good conscience, representing the Government of the United States, whose acts are thus traced in this history, can say that those ancestors of ours lied when they said these were good claims against France; I can not see how I could pronounce them dishonest when they said these were subsisting claims in 1800, or how I could declare that this fair and impartial tribunal, in coming to its conclusion to-day, was either mistaken or imbecile.

Mr. LONG. Does the gentleman desire further time?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Only a moment or two.

Mr. LONG. Go on.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I have but a single thing to add. Sir, there was one man who knew all about this matter. Having been envoy to Paris, he was afterwards Secretary of State under the President who had sent him as envoy. He was thirty-seven years Chief-Justice of the United States—the judge who decided the case to which the gentleman from Texas has referred. Of all the names in our judicial history his is the brightest and the greatest. Speaking of him, Hon. John M. Clayton testified to this effect:

It was my fortune on one occasion, during the year 1835, to hear Judge Marshall express his opinion in favor of the bill then before the Senate for the payment of these claims. A gentleman who has long been the agent of these claimants has kindly placed in my hands, at my request, the following letter from Mr. Preston stating the opinion of Judge Marshall (clarum et venerabile nomen) on the same subject, and, as I supposed, expressed about the same period to which I have referred.

That letter I ask leave to have read at the Clerk's desk. Surely we can not go far astray if in this summer month of 1888 we do what in 1835 John Marshall said ought to have been done in 1801 or 1802. That "deferred hope" which has made many a heart sick can not be a good excuse for the refusal longer to pay these honest claims which we, in our day of weakness and infancy, used as a means of buying peace from a great and puissant nation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to have read the letter sent to the desk?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Yes, sir; if the gentleman from Massachusetts will yield the time.

Mr. LONG. I yield for that purpose.

The Clerk read as follows:

COLUMBIA, January 29, 1844.

SIR: I have this moment received your letter of the 24th instant, inquiring of me concerning Judge Marshall's opinion on the claims for French spoliations anterior to 1800.

When that subject was under discussion in the Senate some years since, as a member of the committee to which it had been given in charge, I bestowed no little pains in the investigation of it, and as I believe it will happen to every one that does so, I became thoroughly satisfied of the justness of the claims.

While they were under discussion in the Senate, they happened to be the subject of conversation between Mr. Leigh, Mr. Calhoun, and myself, one evening in our mess parlor, when Judge Marshall stepped in, and having overheard or being informed of the subject of conversation, asked to share in it, saying that having been connected with the events of that period, and conversant with the circumstances under which the claims arose, he was, from his own knowledge, satisfied that there was the strongest obligation on the Government to compensate the sufferers by the French spoliations. He gave a succinct statement of the leading facts, and the principles of law applicable to them, in so precise and lucid a way, that it seemed to me a termination of the argument by a judicial decision. It was apparent from his manner that he felt an interest in the inculcation of his opinion, arising from deep conviction of its truth.

I most heartily desire that the long-delayed and very inadequate justice now proposed to these unfortunate claimants will be made this session.

I am, dear sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM C. PRESTON.

JAMES H. CAUSTEN, Esq.,
Washington.

[Extract from the report by Mr. Giles to the House of Representatives on April 20, 1802.]

On the 25th of February, 1799, the President of the United States nominated three other envoys extraordinary for the purpose of adjusting the differences between the United States and the French Republic, and on the 30th day of November, 1800, a convention for terminating certain differences which had arisen between the United States and the French Republic was concluded at Paris. On the 3d day of February, 1801, the Senate passed a resolution in the constitutional mode advising the ratification of the said convention, provided the second article be expunged, etc. The second article is in the following words:

"The ministers plenipotentiary of the two parties not being able to agree at present respecting the treaty of alliance of the 6th of February, 1778, the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date, and the convention of the 14th of November, 1788, nor upon the indemnities mutually due or claimed, the parties shall negotiate further on these subjects at a convenient time, and until they may have agreed upon these points the said treaties and convention have no operation, and the relations of the two countries shall be regulated as follows."

This article was introduced into the convention at the intimation of the American envoys, being, it is to be presumed, the best stipulation it was in their power at that time to make for negotiating hereafter upon the indemnities mutually due or claimed by the citizens of the two countries. On the 18th of February, 1801, the President of the United States, in conformity with the advice of the Senate, did ratify the said convention, excluding therefrom the aforesaid second article.

The Senate not having accompanied their advice for expunging the second article with any explanation of their motive for the measure, it was understood, both by the chief consul and the American envoy then at Paris that the object of expunging the said second article was "the retrenchment of the respective pretensions of the two Governments, which were the objects of the second article," and with an explanation to that effect, on the 31st of July, 1801, the chief consul ratified the said convention. The convention thus ratified was laid before the Senate by the President of the United States, on its return from Paris; and on the 19th day of December, 1801, the Senate resolved "that they considered the said convention as fully ratified," and, in pursuance thereof, on the 21st of the same month, the President caused the said convention to be promulgated as it was originally ratified.

From these circumstances and a recurrence to the fifth article of said convention in the following words: "The debts contracted by one of the two nations with individuals of the other, or by the individuals of one with the individuals of the other, shall be paid, or the payment may be prosecuted in the same manner as if there had been no misunderstanding between the two states. But this clause shall not extend to indemnities claimed on account of captures or confiscations." It appears that the exclusion of the second article of the convention was considered as a renunciation of the indemnities claimed by the citizens of the United States for spoliations and depredations upon their commerce, so far as the Government might otherwise have been instrumental in obtaining such indemnities.

[Extracts from the opinion of the Court of Claims.]

The Americans were instructed to inform the French ministers at the opening that we expected, "as an indispensable condition of the treaty," a stipulation to make to our citizens "full compensation for all losses and damage which they shall have sustained by reason of irregular or illegal captures or condemnations of their vessels and other property, under color of authority or commissions from the French Republic or its agents." Other points were urged upon them, but for the purpose of this case it is necessary only to note that they were to obtain a claims commission, to refuse recognition of the treaties of 1778, to refuse a guaranty, to refuse any aid or loan, and to make no engagement contrary to the Jay treaty. (2 Foreign Relations, page 306.)

The Secretary of State said in his instructions:

"Instead of relief, instead of justice, instead of indemnity for past wrongs, our very moderate demands have been immediately followed by new aggressions and more extended depredations, while our ministers, seeking redress and reconciliation, have been refused a reception, treated with indignities, and finally driven from its territories. This conduct * * * would well have justified an immediate declaration of war, but * * * the United States contented themselves with preparations for defense and measures calculated to protect their commerce."

At the close of his instruction the Secretary sets out certain points to be considered as ultimata, of which the following only is now important:

"1. That there be established a board to determine the claims of our citizens, which France should bind herself to pay."

Having carried the history of the claims down to this point let us look back upon it and see what rights we had at that time as against France, laying aside for the moment certain defenses set up by the defendants, such as the existence of war and the abrogation of the old treaties. Apart from these points, which have been urged upon us with great ability by the learned counsel for the Government, were the claims at the opening of the negotiations in 1800 valid international obligations against France?

That nation had seized upon the high seas neutral vessels laden with neutral cargo. In the case at bar, for example, the American schooner Sally, owned by citizens of the United States, commanded by a citizen of the United States, duly registered under the laws of the United States, bound from Massachusetts to Spain, laden with cargo belonging to American citizens, was seized upon the high seas, taken into a French port, condemned, and confiscated for the benefit of the privateer which seized her; and all this, not upon the ground that she had violated the law of nations, but because she had violated the French regulations "concerning the navigation of neutrals." It seems hardly necessary to discuss the proposition that such a proceeding was unwarranted; the French themselves admitted it in their decrees and correspondence; the Russian Czar, in ordering his admiral to pursue a similar course, said it was not "strictly conformable to the natural laws of war." England paid for damages thus committed, as did Spain, which had countenanced the acts of French consuls in condemning American vessels brought into Spanish ports. (Treaty of 1819.)

Senator Livingston, in the Twenty-first Congress, first session, said in the report made by him:

"The committee does not recollect that the justice of the claims has ever been denied. * * * To deny [it] would be assertion of a right on the part of France to indiscriminate plunder of neutral property. * * * But the justice of the claims was not denied, and the necessity of providing indemnity was expressly acknowledged."

This is true as a matter of pure international law; how much more true is it in the face of a treaty which guarantied the protection to our vessels (Article VI) of French ships of war; which made free ships free goods (Article XXIII); which prohibited opening hatches or disturbing packages when the vessel had a passport (Article XII and XIII); which directed the commanders of French ships to do no "injury or damage" to vessels of the United States (Article XV), and which contained other provisions insuring an exceptional amount of protection to our commerce and guardianship of our commercial rights?

Mr. Jefferson thought this class of claims valid when he issued his circular of August, 1793, assuring the mercantile community that due attention would be paid to these injuries and proper proceedings adopted for their relief. The President thought them valid when later in the same year he wrote to Congress that due measures would be taken to "obtain redress of the past and more effective provisions against the future." Pickering thought them valid when he made their settlement an ultimatum, and the French Government thought them worthy of consideration when they proposed a commission to decide upon them, coupled with the counter proposition that the United States indemnify American creditors then existing, or to be created through the agency of this commission, by way of a loan to France, which that country was to be pledged to repay. (Doc. 102, p. 467.)

* * * * * * *

We have already referred to the instructions of the Executive, which show that branch of the Government in thorough accord with the legislative on this subject, and the negotiations of our representatives hereinafter referred to were marked by the same views, while the treaty itself—a treaty of amity and commerce of limited duration—is strong proof that what were called "differences" did not amount to war. We are therefore of opinion that no such war existed as operated to abrogate treaties, to suspend private rights, or to authorize indiscriminate seizures and condemnations; that, in short, there was no public general war, but limited war, in its nature similar to a prolonged series of reprisals.

Table of treaties between the United States and foreign countries for the settlement of claims.

Countries.	Date.	Purpose.	How settled.	Amounts.
Great Britain (Jay treaty.)	Nov. 19, 1794	Article 7. For losses or damages by reason of irregular or illegal captures or condemnations of vessels or other property, under color of authority or commissions of His Majesty. And upon losses and damages by His Majesty's subjects and others, by reason of the capture of their vessels and merchandise within the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, and brought into the ports of the same, or taken by vessels originally owned in the ports of said States.	By five commissioners, the award of any three to be final. No appeal.	$10,345,000.
Spain	Oct. 20, 1795	Article 21. To decide according to the merits of the several cases and to justice and equity, and the law of nations upon claims for losses sustained by the taking of vessels and cargoes by the subjects of His Catholic Majesty during the late war between Spain and France.	By three commissioners, the award of any two to be final. No appeal.	$325,000.

Countries.	Date.	Purpose.	How settled.	Amounts.
France	April 30, 1803	For the payment of debts due by France to American citizens	By three commissioners. No appeal.	20,000,000 livres reserved by treaty. $3,738,268.98 paid.
Great Britain	July 12, 1822	For the payment by Great Britain for slaves and other property removed from places surrendered under treaty of Ghent.	By two commissioners, who, in case of disagreement, were to select a third, and the decisions of the commissioners or a majority of them to be final and conclusive. No appeal.	$1,204,960.
Spain (Florida treaty).	Feb. 22, 1819	For the payment of French spoliation claims prior to July 31, 1801, which were condemned in Spanish ports.	Five commissioners; the award of a majority to be final. No appeal.	$5,000,000 reserved by treaty. $4,997,572.69 paid.
France	July 4, 1831	For all reclamations of American citizens after July 31, 1801, for unlawful seizures, captures, detentions, and destruction of vessels, cargoes, or other property.	By three commissioners. No appeal.	France paid the United States $5,000,000.
Denmark	Mar. 28, 1830	For seizures, detentions, condemnations, or confiscations of their (American citizens) vessels, cargoes, or property.	By a board of commissioners appointed by the President. 4 S. L., 446. No appeal.	650,000 Spanish dollars.
The Two Sicilies	Oct. 14, 1832	To satisfy reclamations for depredations, sequestrations, confiscations, and destruction of vessels and cargoes of American merchants.	By three commissioners, 4 S. L., 666. No appeal.	2,115,000 ducats were paid.
Great Britain	Feb. 2, 1853	To examine and decide, according to justice and equity, all claims of citizens and subjects of both countries upon the other, arising after the treaty of Ghent, December 14, 1814.	By a commission. No appeal. 10 S. L., 988.	$606,837.04.
Great Britain	July 1, 1863	For settlement of all questions between the United States and the Hudson Bay and Puget Sound Companies.	By a commission. No appeal. R. S. D. C., pp. 346–347.	$650,000 were awarded and paid.
Venezuela	Apr. 25, 1866	For adjustment of claims of corporations, companies, and individuals, citizens of the United States, upon the Government of Venezuela.	By two commissioners and an umpire. No appeal. R. S. D. C., 807, 808.	$1,253,310.30.
Mexico	July 4, 1868	To examine and decide, according to public law, justice, and equity, all claims of citizens of either Republic upon the other for injuries to their persons or property by the authorities of the other after February 2, 1848.	By two commissioners and an umpire. No appeal.	$4,276,120.61.
Peru	Dec. 4, 1868	For the adjustment of claims of citizens of either country upon the government of the other.	By two commissioners and an umpire. No appeal.	271,971.15 soles.
Spain	Feb. 12, 1871	For settlement of certain claims of citizens of the United States on account of wrongs and injuries committed by authorities of Spain in the Island of Cuba.	By two arbitrators and an umpire. No appeal.	$1,293,450.55.
Great Britain (Alabama treaty).	May 8, 1871	For claims arising from the acts of certain cruisers on property of American citizens.	By act of June 3, 1876, a court of five judges was established. By act of June 5, 1882, a court of three judges was established. No appeal in either case.	$15,500,000 was paid by Great Britain.
France	Jan. 15, 1880	For the settlement of certain claims of the citizens of either country against the other growing out of war and insurrection.	By three commissioners the decision of two to be final. No appeal.	$639,225.49.

Mr. BURNES. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB].

Mr. COBB. Mr. Chairman, the "French spoliation claims" are historical. They rest on the occurrences of the past century. The years in their flight have borne to the silent land the original claimants; the claims are immortal. They are with us to-day, and are pressed on our attention with a vigor, and even intemperance of language, indicative of their possessing the peculiar youthful essense effective to inspire imaginative fervor if not calm and convincing argument. Gentlemen learned and scholarly, impatient of contradiction, and carried along by ardent enthusiasm of advocacy, would have the people's representatives vote away thirty millions of the people's money, or be consigned to the limbo of repudiators and defaulting trustees.

The alternative is a hard one. The American people are manifesting, day by day, strong and still stronger condemnation of the governmental policy, which takes of their scant earnings millions of money not needed for governmental purposes, to be wasted in extravagant, and dangerous expenditure; and yet the mortgage—oppressed farmer, the wage-workers, the patient toiling masses must bend to their burdens, with never a word of remonstrance, while schemes for appropriations are devised resting on no juster foundation than sentiment. If one of their representatives presumes to raise his voice in protest, he is scowled at as unappreciative of the nation's honor. Regardless of the reproach threatened to all who oppose the pending measure, I purpose to make such analysis of it as I may be able, and, following the line of logical reasoning, to abide the conclusion to which it leads me.

I propose to sustain the following propositions of law and fact:

1. War between two independent states, followed by a treaty of peace, extinguishes all claims and demands of each of the states against the other, or of the citizens of each state against the other state, which produced the war, or which grew out of or were involved in it, the payment for which are not arranged in the treaty.

2. A condition of war existed between France and the United States, produced by certain trespasses of the French Government on the persons and property of the citizens of the United States, from which trespasses the claims under consideration originated. Hence, these claims were involved in the war.

3. Pending this war a treaty, in all essentials a treaty of peace, was concluded between the two contending powers, and in this treaty no provision was made for payment of these claims, either directly or indirectly. In this proposition a denial is intended that the United States assumed, in any way, the payment of the claims.

If these propositions are established, it follows that the claims in controversy under the provisions of the pending bill, have no substantial existence. In advancing the argument based on the propositions, I do not admit that, if it fails, the claims are just against the Government of the United States.

On the contrary, I hope to reach the conclusion of their invalidity from another and different course of reasoning; or to be more accurate in statement, I propose to urge that, conceding the non-existence of war between the Governments of the United States and France, the evidence is wanting to show a transfer to the United States of the obligation to pay them.

The first proposition asserted is so well recognized by writers on international law that argument or citation of authority to establish it is not necessary; especially in view of the fact that in the discussion of the merits of the claims from time to time, through three-quarters of a century, it has not been seriously disputed. I make a single quotation from Wheaton:

> The peace extinguishes all claim for damages done in war, or arising from the operations of war.

In presenting the second proposition it is to be observed there is no pretense that between the two countries the status existed called by publicists perfect or solemn war; but that there was public war, although of the imperfect kind, can be abundantly shown. The causes which led to war need only to be slightly adverted to. They are matters of history not essential to my argument. I am more directly concerned with the facts which made the hostilities between the countries, when tested by legal rules, a condition of war. Suffice it to say, the French Government assumed the prerogative of interfering with American commerce on the high seas, of seizing and condemning American vessels and other property of American citizens.

Remonstrance, oft repeated, proving of no avail, the Congress of the United States authorized sterner measures. By several acts, authority was given to issue letters of marque and reprisal; merchant vessels were permitted to arm and to resist by force any attempt to search them, and to recapture any vessel seized by the French. Our naval force was increased and sent to the protection of our mercantile marine, with instruction to drive French cruisers from our coast and to attack them wherever found. Finally was passed the act of July 7, 1798, annulling existing treaties with France. Prior to this last-mentioned date France had violated these treaties by the enactment and enforcement of laws inconsistent with their provisions.

One of these laws, enacted in January, 1798, which—subject to capture and condemnation neutral vessels and their cargoes, if any portion of the latter was of British fabric or produce, although the entire property belonged to neutrals—was characterized by President Adams, in his opening address to Congress in December, 1798, as an unequivocal act of war. Thus it was that collisions and conflicts between the vessels of the two countries, from which these claims originated, became of constant occurrence. In his History of the Navy of the United States, Cooper repeatedly speaks of the relations of France and the United States, during the period from 1793 to 1800, as a condition of war and of the French as "the enemy."

He says—

In the whole, eighty prizes were taken and brought into American ports. * * * Sixty-eight were condemned and sold. The loss of American shipping in this war was considerable, but fewer vessels were taken in proportion after hostilities had commenced on the side of this country than had previously been seized.

* * * * * * *

In the war with France very few privateers went to sea, that country having little trade to suffer by such enterprises, though scarcely a merchantman sailed without an armament and a crew at least double that she would have carried in a time of peace.

* * * * * * *

The enemy was very active, a fact that is proved by the circumstance that more French privateers were taken and destroyed by the vessels of the American Navy alone, in the West Indies, than the country sent cruisers to sea at any period of the war.

* * * * * * *

This war, like every maritime contest in which America has been engaged with any civilized nation, was also distinguished by many obstinate actions between letters of marque and cruisers of the enemy.

These quotations could be multiplied, but enough to show that there is a history having "a chapter on the war with France," a fact called in question by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I remark, in passing, that the "school-boy" of the gentleman from Maryland might change his opinion if he would consult the best naval history of this country extant.

Here, then, was a condition of things not usual, to say the least, in a state of peace; merchantmen armed, carrying double crews, and commissioned to do hostile acts; letters of marque granted; battles fought that gave imperishable renown to such captains as Bainbridge and Stewart and Truxtun and Hull and Decatur, and to our infant Navy; men captured and exchanged; prizes seized and regularly condemned in prize courts; salvage for the retaking of vessels from the French, as the enemy of the United States, allowed by our own Supreme Court—surely this must have been war.

In this connection I read the following extract from a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, delivered pending the hostilities—others might be given:

Now, if this be the true definition of war let us see what was the situation of the United States in relation to France. In March, 1799, Congress had raised an army, stopped all intercourse with France, dissolved our treaty, built and equipped ships of war, and commissioned private armed ships, enjoining the former and authorizing the latter to defend themselves against the armed ships of France, to attack them on the high seas, to subdue and take them as prize, and recapture armed vessels found in their possession. Here, then, let me ask, what were the technical characters of an American and French armed vessel, combatting on the high seas with a view the one to subdue the other, and to make prize of his property? They certainly were not friends, because there was a contention by force, nor were they private enemies, because the contention was external, and authorized by the legitimate authority of the two governments. If they were not enemies I know not what constitutes an enemy. * * * What then is the evidence of the legislative will? In fact and in law we are at war.

Is it necessary for me to say that war may exist without formal declaration?

It is certain—

that a condition of war can be raised without an authoritative declaration of war, and, on the other hand, the situation of peace may be restored * * * without a treaty of peace being made. History is full of such occurrences. The United States may be engaged in war, and have all the rights of a belligerent, without any declaration by Congress.

Such a war is of the imperfect kind, but in this kind of war the consequences, so far as they concern the matters involved and the claims arising, are the same as in solemn war.

In this condition of affairs between the United States and France a convention between them was had to adjust existing difficulties.

It is true that the ministers plenipotentiary, sent by the United States to that convention, were instructed to insist, and they did insist, on payment of damages by France by way of indemnity to the citizens of the United States who had suffered losses by reason of French spoliations.

This fact, and the further fact that, when the ministers of the respective parties to the convention agreed on and signed articles of treaty, they inserted therein a provision that certain matters of contention—including the claims now under consideration—should be deferred to "a more convenient season," are seized on by the advocates of the validity of the claims to prove that they were not extinguished by war. Says the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG]:

Could they offset claims unless they existed? Could anything be more supremely absurd than to argue that after difficulties, whether amounting to war or lawsuit or negotiation, between two nations or two individuals have come to a settlement, the very claims existing between them and for the future negotiation of which that settlement distinctly provided, have been extinguished? In other words, that to provide for the future settlement of claims is to admit that no claims exist? It is a reductio ad absurdum.

I hope full answer to the gentleman's reductio ad absurdum will be developed in the further prosecution of this argument.

With reference to the transactions between the ministers pending negotiations, in what, I inquire, were they engaged? It was diplomacy. If it was true that diplomatists were expected to be, and were, at all times, entirely frank and truthful with their antagonists; that they only advanced claims they knew to be well founded; that pretensions of more than doubtful legality were never put forward in the diplomatic intercourse of nations; or, if nations, in such intercourse, never masked their true designs by such pretensions, then, indeed, the gentleman's reductio ad absurdum might have something of plausibility in it. But diplomacy is recognized as a species of contention approximating in its characteristics, if not in its mode of conduct, war itself.

What was the situation? Here were two governments met to adjust differences—call them what you will—serious in character and involving serious consequences in their settlement. They had been produced by the antagonisms of years past, and were growing more complicated every day.

It was known that France would insist that the United States had, to her great damage, violated wantonly the treaties of 1778. Several gentlemen preceding me say, with great emphasis, that this claim was just. But whether just or not, it was certain to be advanced, and if entertained it involved large pecuniary considerations. The United States did not believe she had violated these treaties; she would resist steadily such insistence by France; not, however, by invoking in the first instance the doctrine that war had extinguished damage claims, for reasons that will more fully appear hereafter.

Certainly, the claims now under discussion were, to say the least, as just as the claim of France for violated treaties. Other claims than these were held by our citizens against France, being those afterwards recognized and paid. In this condition of affairs, what a spectacle "to make all the world wonder" would have been presented if the ministers of the United States had, with frankness hitherto unknown in the history of the diplomatic intercourse of nations, approached the ministers of France with the declaration, "you have damaged our people greatly; you have destroyed their ships, seized and condemned their property, but we are too candid and honest to demand reparation, because we know that war has extinguished the right to make such demand?"

Such may be the course in like cases pursued when—the millennium has more nearly arrived.

But let us look a little more closely into this matter, and consider the attitude of the respective parties as affected by their interests.

The United States had entered into treaties with France in 1778 in terms highly beneficial to the latter, but burdensome and embarrassing to the former.

It would be more tedious than profitable, at this time, to recount the circumstances which led to these treaties, or the condition of affairs in this country which justified the concessions made in them to France, to the exclusion of other powers. It is sufficient to say they were unusual in character and in the privileges and advantages they conferred, and threatened to involve us in foreign complications.

Notwithstanding all this, it was the desire and purpose of the Government of the United States to adhere faithfully to the stipulations of the treaties, properly construed, and did not relinquish this desire and purpose until France, by arrogant wrong-doing, extending through years, had rendered their further observance incompatible with our national honor. When, however, these treaties were justifiably revoked by the act of Congress, the thought of their restoration in their original form was not to be entertained. An accommodation was necessary to our interests, but as American citizens had suffered so heavily by French spoliations, it was not only proper but highly desirable to secure, in the terms of a new treaty, recognition of obligation on the part of France to indemnify the sufferers from her arrogant and unjustifiable course.

The fact that, under the principles of international law, all claim for such indemnity was extinguished, afforded in itself no justification for her wrongful acts; and, more than all, it was for France to invoke as her shield the laws of war, and not for the United States to proffer such protection.

Until France had so sheltered herself it was the duty of the American Government to urge, to the extent short of solemn war, payment for the injuries she had inflicted.

On the other hand, France realized to the utmost her advantages over other powers conferred by the treaties of 1778. She desired their full restoration. This was to her matter of first importance; all things else were secondary. She was prepared to resist, with persistent energy, the idea that the treaties had been annulled; to deny the right of the Congress of the United States to revoke them; and to refuse to recognize any fact or circumstance or even law which would weaken their binding force on the Government of the United States. Thus it will be seen that, when the ministers of France and the United States met, their interests were alike in one respect—to ignore the fact of the existence of war between the two countries.

If the unpleasantness or "transient misunderstanding" or hostilities between the countries was war, then the treaties of 1778 were beyond question annulled; and this view would not suit France, because, as I have shown, her first and highest interest was to have these treaties recognized with all their binding obligations. It would as little suit the United States, because the recognition of war would completely destroy the validity of many claims which she desired to urge against France. If gentlemen would give consideration to these views—and if they are not sound I have failed, after most diligent effort, to read correctly the history of the times—they would be less inclined to rest their arguments on the pretensions of the acute diplomatists who assembled at Paris in the year 1800.

I turn now to the history of this diplomatic "passage at arms" between these distinguished ministers, and out of their own mouths I propose to establish the correctness of the views just presented, and to further show that each party, after steady but patient and cautious resistance to the pretensions of the other and insistance on their own, became at last convinced that their interests and purposes were irreconcilable; and that, when so convinced, each charged the other with having carried on war in violation of solemn treaty stipulations. In the prosecution of this examination it will appear that at no time did France acknowledge an obligation to pay indemnity to American citizens for spoliations; and that at no time did the United States recognize an obligation to pay damages for the violation of the treaties of 1778. France asserted, as an offer, that she would pay indemnity, if the United States would acknowledge the treaties to have been of uninterrupted binding force and still subsisting.

Indemnities with the treaties was her persistent demand; or a new treaty—a treaty of peace—without indemnity. The United States, in the like spirit of offer, proposed to pay a certain sum because of the pretension by France that she had violated the treaties, provided other objects, highly desirable to her, could be secured. It is on this unsubstantial foundation that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] asserts:

France gave us, I undertake to say, an ample quid pro quo. We had already offered 8,000,000 francs for what she gave us, and she had refused it.

No such offer was made to France unconnected with other propositions, which if accepted, would have given us advantages, in themselves an ample quid pro quo for the expenditure proposed.

France never refused the offer of 8,000,000 francs, unless the failure of the contracting parties to agree on the terms involving their payment, constitutes such refusal. I will endeavor to establish these assertions further on.

On the 2d April, 1800, the ministers of France and the United States met and exchanged their respective commissions, and thenceforward the negotiations proceeded, with interruptions, until the 30th day of September, at which date the convention was signed.

At the beginning of negotiations our ministers proposed—

1. The adjustment of equitable claims of the—citizens of either nation upon the other, whether founded on contract, treaty, or the law of nations.

2. The negotiation of a new treaty.

Not a word was said in this opening proposition about claims of the one nation against the other, growing out of violation of treaties, for the reason, clearly, that our ministers did not believe such claims had rightful existence. The answer by the French ministers to this proposition was to the effect that their view was, the course of negotiation should be, valuation and indemnification of those injuries for which the two nations respectively may have demands against each other, whether these demands are founded on national injuries or individual claims.

1. The—

2. The exection of the treaties of friendship and commerce now existing between the two nations, and the accomplishment of those views of reciprocal advantage which first dictated them.

What can be clearer than this as evincing the differences of the views and purposes of the two contracting parties?

On the part of the United States the purpose was, settlement for injuries to citizens and the formation of a new treaty; on the part of France, settlement for injuries of one nation against the other and the recognition of the existence of the old treaties, and the devising of means to insure their enforcement so as to secure to each nation the "reciprocal advantages which first dictated them." The objects held by both parties led them away from the recognition of war. Immediately following this first interchange of views by the ministers, the French, "to prevent the interruption of negotiation," demanded assurance that the United States Government—

Will terminate without delay the hostile condition which it now maintains in relation to France.

The French are informed, in answer to this demand, that such assurances can not be given otherwise than by incorporating them in a treaty.

Cease your hostilities, urge the French, because by them you are violating existing treaties. The hostilities are defensive on our part, and are violative of no existing treaty, reply the Americans, because there is no treaty.

Further to show the divergence in the views of the parties as to the existence of the old treaties, and their determination respectively to maintain the attitudes assumed, I call attention to the correspondence in regard to the selection of arbitrators.

The American ministers proposed arbitration, and laid down the basis on which the arbitrators were to proceed in the liquidation of damages.

They shall decide the claims * * * existing prior to the 7th July, 1798, according to the treaties and consular convention then existing between France and the United States, and claims arising subsequent to that date, according to the law of nations.

In reply to this proposition the French ministers say they have—been struck with an interpretation of which they can conceive neither the cause nor the object.

And after quoting the terms on which it was proposed the arbitration should proceed, continue:

The ministers of the French Republic are not aware of any reason which can authorize a distinction between the time prior to 7th of July, 1798, and the time subsequent to that date, in order to apply the stipulations of treaties to the damages which have arisen during the first period, and only the principles of the laws of nations to those which have occurred during the second.

The proposition of the Americans rested on the acknowledgment that, the old treaties had been repealed by the act of Congress of the date mentioned. This acknowledgment the French would not make. To follow the course of these negotiations, step by step, would be more tedious than is at present permissible. The purposes of the two governments, as heretofore stated in my argument, are too clearly shown through the whole of the contention to admit of doubt; and the reasons operating to induce both parties to avoid the recognition of a state of war are equally apparent.

Time and time again the French ministers insist on the recognition of the old treaties and the enforcement of their terms; with equal firmness and pertinacity the Americans resist and refuse this demand.

Thus it was that the negotiations were interrupted, and the interruption threatened to become final.

That the Americans desired to secure a new treaty and at the same time to provide for payment of indemnities is clearly shown, for as they say—

It was clearly perceived that unless the indemnities were secured by some means under the present negotiation they would be forever lost.

This statement is significant, not only as showing why the Americans would avoid the recognition of a state of war, but as explaining the inducement to a slight modification of their propositions in order to avoid the failure of their mission.

It now became necessary to decide whether the negotiation should be broken off or the instructions departed from; whether the treaties should be revived or the indemnities sacrificed.

Such is their language. If the treaties were revived by the admission desired, and pressed by the French, that their operation had not been interrupted, either by the existing difficulties or the act of Congress, then the recognition of claim for indemnities might be secured.

If the view was adhered to that the treaties had been abrogated, then no such claim would lie, either because they had been extinguished by war, sufficient in effect for that purpose, or because the French would refuse to recognize them, and a resort to solemn war would not be justified in their enforcement.

Such was the attitude of affairs; but I have shown that the restoration of the treaties without change was to be strenuously avoided.

About the 1st of September began a modification of terms, urged up to this time by the parties respectively.

The French now propose—a commission to regulate indemnities due by each of the two nations to the citizens of the other—

And—

the indemnities found due by France to the citizens of the United States shall be discharged by the United States—

And as an equivalent France—makes an abandonment of the exclusive privileges—

Resulting to her from the old treaties.

At the time this proposition was made the French ministers assure the Americans that they—have never intended to pay indemnities unless France is restored to her privileges under the old treaties.

This proposition that the United States assume the payment of indemnities to her citizens, the American ministers assure the French is "altogether inadmissible." Here we have a positive negative of the idea that the payment of indemnities to citizens of the United States would be assumed by our Government. At this point of the negotiation occurs what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] calls an offer on our part to pay 8,000,000 francs for damages resulting to France from the violation of the old treaties.

I have asserted that no such unconditional offer was made. Here is the proof. It is to be found in the "Annals of Congress," on page 1182 and pages following.

On the 11th August the French had submitted propositions, first for recognition of old treaties; if that was refused, then they indicate a willingness to treat with reference to their abrogation. But they say in this connection:

Whilst, however, the ministers of France acquiesce in the nullity of the treaties, they can not conceal from themselves that the act of the United States by which their abrogation has been declared, has been an unequivocal provocation to war; that the hostile acts by which this provocation has been followed, increasing in number and publicity, even after France had removed every just cause of complaint, was nothing less than war. * * *

If the correctness of these observations be admitted, it would seem that the two Governments ought to be occupied no longer with their respective losses; the rights of war acknowledge no obligation to repair its ravages; their consideration even is prohibited by national honor, since the state inflicting the greatest injury would, by making compensation, acknowledge a victor and purchase peace.

This is strong language, indicating the mind of the French in regard to the true nature of the hostilities pending; and indicating, further, that they only waited the time when their hope for restoration of the old treaties should be destroyed, to invoke the benefit of the law of nations in their favor against any claim for indemnities.

This was the period to which I have alluded when it appeared that negotiations would be broken off.

After a personal interview between the ministers without result, the Americans were compelled to answer the note from which the foregoing extracts are taken; and now comes the first intimation of a willingness on their part to treat with reference to the renewal of the old treaties. It was suggested by the American ministers that the former treaties be revived and confirmed, with the stipulation that the guaranties contained in them might be released by the payment of a certain sum of money.

These propositions do not seem to have been thoroughly understood, and, after further exchange of diplomatic courtesies, they were more definitely formulated in a note from the American ministers of date August 29. In that note it is said:

The principle—

referring to the propositions just alluded to—

if reduced to form proper to give it effect, it is conceived, would be expressed as follows, namely: If the United States shall, at any time within seven years from the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, offer to the French Republic an article of the tenor following, namely: "It is agreed that the United States shall pay to the French Republic, within seven years from the day of exchanging the ratifications of the treaty of ——, eight millions of francs, * * * and that as a consideration of such engagement the United States shall forever be exonerated, etc.; and the rights of the French Republic * * * shall be forever limited to such as the most favored nations shall in these respects enjoy," the French Republic shall accept the same, etc.

This, and this only, was the offer of the 8,000,000 francs. The suggestion—it was nothing more—was not entertained by the French. Since stress seems to be laid on this offer, and since gentlemen would make the impression that it was unconditional, I will, in addition to the quotations from the note of the American ministers, read from their final report to the Secretary of State:

The American ministers, however, after a deliberation of some days, the progress of events in Europe continuing in the mean time to grow more unfavorable to their success, made an ulterior advance, going the whole length of what had been last insisted on. They offered an unlimited recognition of the former treaties, though accompanied with a provision to extinguish such privileges claimed under them as were detrimental to the United States by a pecuniary equivalent, to be made out of the indemnities which should be awarded to American citizens—a compensation which, though it might have canceled but a small portion of the indemnities, was, nevertheless, a liberal one for privileges which the French ministers often admitted to be of little use to France under the construction which the American Government had given to the treaties.

This offer, though it covered the avowed objects of the French Government, secured an engagement to pay indemnities, as well as the power to extinguish the obnoxious parts of the treaties.

To avoid any engagement of this kind, the French ministers now made an entire departure from the principles upon which the negotiation had proceeded for some time, and resumed the simple, unqualified ground of their overture of the twenty-third Thermidor, declaring that it was indispensible to the granting of indemnities, not only that the treaties should have an unqualified recognition, but that their future operations should not be varied in any particular, for any consideration or compensation whatever. In short, they thought proper to add, what was quite unnecessay, that their real object was to avoid indemnities, and that it was not in the power of France to pay them.

After further exchange of notes the ministers met on the 12th day of September, and conversation between them closed by a declaration of the President of the French commission—to which the others assented—that—

If the Government should think proper to instruct them to make a treaty on the basis of indemnities and a modified renewal of the old treaties, he would resign sooner than sign such a treaty.

Adding that—

If the question could be determined by an indifferent nation, he was satisfied such a tribunal would say that the present state of things was war on the side of America, and that no indemnities could be claimed.

It now became apparent that further controversy on the line thus far pursued was useless.

Through the whole controversy France insisted on a full restoration of the old treaties as a condition precedent to recognition of indemnities to American citizens; or a modification of the old treaties with recognition of her right to damages for their violation by the United States and indemnities, or a new treaty without indemnities. The United States insisted on a new treaty with full indemnities to her citizens; or the old treaties with their most burdensome provisions to be eliminated by a small sum of money to be paid to France in consideration of her consent to relinquish them, and indemnities.

Say the American ministers in their report to the Secretary of State—

for the undersigned to quit France, leaving the United States involved in a contest, and, according to appearances, soon alone in a contest which it might be as difficult for them to relinquish with honor as to pursue with a prospect of advantage; or else to propose a temporary arrangement, reserving for a definite adjustment points which could not then be satisfactorily settled, and providing, in the mean time, against a state of things of which neither party could profit. They elected the latter, and the result has been the signature of a convention.

I have given this lengthy consideration to the negotiations between the ministers plenipotentiary because, in the light of a plain statement of facts, the assumptions repeatedly made in this debate on which eloquent arguments in behalf of the claimants are based vanish into airy nothingness.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] makes a singular statement. He says we are "estopped" to deny these claims because, forsooth, our ministers urged their payment on France! That is to say, a government is "estopped" to deny any assertion made by its ministers in the course of diplomatic controversy! I venture the assertion that the distinguished gentleman is alone in the discovery of such application of the well-understood principle of estoppel.

The gentleman's ingenuity in the application of law in a manner hitherto unthought of, is only equaled by his liberality in the assumption of facts, when he asserts that—

The Government of the United States, holding for collection certain claims of its citizens, surrendered them for the release of certain claims held by the French Government against the United States.

Such surrender was not made by our ministers—it is not so pretended—and I undertake to show it was not done afterwards in the sense, as averred by the gentleman, of using the claims as a purchasing agency.

I proceed to the consideration of the treaty and the circumstances of its ratification to show that no provision was therein made, directly or indirectly, for the payment of the claims.

As signed by the ministers it contained as its second article this provision:

ART. 2. The ministers plenipotentiary of the two parties not being able to agree at present respecting the treaty of alliance of 6th February, 1778, the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date, and the convention of the 14th November, 1788, nor upon the indemnities mutually due or claimed, the parties will negotiate further on these subjects at a convenient time, and until they have agreed on these points the said treaties and conventions shall have no operation, and the relations of the two countries shall be regulated as follows:

The meaning of this article can not be doubtful. It was a postponement, simply, for further consideration of certain matters of controversy; and was inserted really as a means of escape from an embarrassing difficulty. It was no admission of the validity or binding obligation of any claims. And here I remark that had the ministers, finding themselves unable to agree, abandoned forever contention by the two Governments of the claims in question, and had inserted this abandonment in the treaty, no obligation would have been imposed thereby on the Government of the United States.

Of much less significance than such article would have been, was the action of the Senate of the United States when it struck article 2 from the treaty.

I will recur to this point. The Senate of the United States ratified the treaty, having first expunged the second article and substituted therefor a provision limiting the operation of the treaty to eight years.

It was then transmitted to France. Napoleon, being in power as First Consul, ratified it after adding these words:

Provided, That by this retrenchment the two states renounce the respective pretensions which are the objects of the said article.

The retrenchment referred to was the expunging of the second article. In this form the treaty was returned to the President of the United States. Mr. Jefferson referred it to the Senate with a message, in which he says that Napoleon's—ratification not being pure and simple, in the ordinary form, I have thought it my duty, in order to avoid all misconception, to ask a second advice and consent of the Senate before I give it the last sanction by proclaiming it to be the law of the land.

I read this to show that Mr. Jefferson in re-referring the treaty to the Senate acted only out of abundant caution. Thereupon the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That the Senate (two-thirds of the members present concurring therein) consider the convention between the United States and the French Republic as fully ratified.

On these facts several important questions arise.

First. Did Napoleon intend by his proviso to change the treaty in meaning, or merely to express his desire that a certain construction should be given to the action of the Senate?

Second. Was the resolution of the Senate a distinct ratification of a treaty different in meaning from the instrument submitted to Napoleon?

Third. Did the proviso, in any proper sense, become a part of the treaty?

Fourth. If the proviso was ratified and did change the meaning of the treaty, does a fair and proper construction of it impose any liability or obligation on the United States to pay the claims which its citizens held against France?

It will be observed, in regard to the first question, that the proviso alludes to the action of the Senate of the United States, and not to anything contained in the treaty. It is not said, it is understood, that this treaty, with the proviso added, contains in its provisions a renunciation, but that "by this retrenchment"—by the act of the Senate in annulling the second article—"the two states renounce," etc.

Had the purpose been to clearly provide in the treaty for mutual renunciation, is it not likely that the form of the proviso would have been to the effect that, the two parties do now, by this convention, renounce their respective claims?

Strange, indeed, that, in an instrument so solemn, a change of such grave character as the one it is contended was effected, should be attempted in a manner so careless and ambiguous. It must not be forgotten that six months of patient and weary endeavor to adjust the respective pretensions, alluded to in the proviso, had been consumed in vain by the ministers; that, considering the temper and views of the two parties, future consideration of the matters waived was scarcely to be expected; that, in a word, the second article as agreed on by the ministers was well-nigh meaningless.

It can not be, Mr. Chairman, that Napoleon had other thought in annexing the proviso to the treaty, than to craftily take advantage o the situation to express again what he had already expressed through his ministers—a determination under no circumstances to pay the indemnities claimed by the United States.

He knew that, over and over again, his ministers had proposed in effect to set off against each other the respective claims of the two countries, and that this offer had been persistently refused by the United States, and that, as a consequence of such refusal, no article adjusting the claims could be inserted in the treaty. How, then, could he expect to accomplish in an indirect way what could not be done directly? Doubtless the Senate of the United States fully understood the intent and object of the First Consul, as will be seen by consideration of its action when the treaty was a second time before them.

Its action on the treaty when first presented was a distinct ratification. "Advice and consent" were given in form contemplated by the Constitution. Not so on the second reference. I have already read the resolution adopted when the treaty was a second time before the Senate; here is the first resolution:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That they do consent and advise the ratification of the convention between the French Republic and the United States of America made at Paris on the eighth Vendemaire, in the ninth year of the French Republic, 30th of September, A. D. 1800.

Compare them and mark the difference in language; and can any one say this difference is without significance?

The second, instead of being a ratification—a giving of present "advice and consent"—is a mere expression of opinion that the treaty had been ratified. Ratified when? At the time clearly when it was in solemn form signed by Napoleon. Had the treaty been in any respect changed in its meaning by the added proviso, what would have been the duty of the Senate?

The President, by the terms of our Constitution, has power to make treaties, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and not otherwise. After a treaty has been ratified by the Senate, if it is changed in its meaning by the other contracting power, it becomes, to all intent and purpose, a different treaty, and can not be proclaimed, so as to become the "law of the land," until duly ratified. This is too plain for argument.

Hence, the duty of the Senate was to ratify the treaty when again considering it if it was found to be changed since the first ratification. In other words, the first ratification would, under such circumstances, have been a nullity. The only treaty, then, that can be considered as having become the law of the land, is the treaty as it was when first before the Senate and duly ratified. Nor did the Senate accept the proviso as a construction of the treaty made by Napoleon, for Napoleon did not construe nor attempt to construe it. The proviso, as already shown, refers not to the treaty, but to something extraneous to it—the act of expunging the second article.

The intention of the President, if it be conceded that he had such intention, to commit the United States to the payment of the claims by publishing the treaty, was entirely ineffectual for that purpose without the concurrent intention of the Senate. It can not be contended that the ratification of the treaty without the proviso, operated to charge the United States with the payment of any claims not mentioned in it. Here, then, we have a treaty, following a state of war, in which no provision is made for the settlement of claims growing out of and involved in the war. To urge that they were embraced in other articles of the treaty than the second, or that they were the subject of controversy in other conventions than the one we have been considering, is to negative the idea of their assumption by the Government.

If I am mistaken in all the inferences and conclusions I have endeavored to draw from the facts stated; if it be conceded there was no extinguishment of the claims by war; if the proviso was duly ratified and became a part of the treaty, I still insist that a plain, commonsense reading and interpretation of the treaty, the proviso included, fail to disclose a liability assumed by the United States to its citizens. Read in the light, especially, of the diplomacy preceding its ratification, its meaning is that, negotiation having failed to adjust certain claims, their further consideration is abandoned.

There is no element of contract—no release of claims in consideration of the release of other claims. The language of the proviso will bear no such construction, as I think I have abundantly shown.

Nothing less than an absolute promise to pay, for a consideration, or the appropriation of private property to public use in exercise of the right of eminent domain, which would raise a promise to pay by implication, would impose a liability on our Government to pay these claims.

It will hardly be contended—certainly not by close students of international law—that the mere failure of the Government to force France to the recognition and settlement of the demands of its citizens, was sufficient to charge it with their payment. The rule on this point is that, while it is the duty of a government to prevent, as far as it reasonably can, the infliction of damage on its citizens, and that it may become responsible to them for a neglect to use reasonable means of prevention, yet, when the damage is done, without the fault of the government, it shall use its discretion as to the extent it should go in securing reclamation; and this discretion is always to be exercised in view of the interests of the people at large.

If reclamation can not be secured without war, further effort to obtain it may be abandoned, or, even, if war is undertaken, peace may be declared without the attainment of the objects of its prosecution. And although negotiation or war may be undertaken to secure private claims, the abandonment of either imposes no obligation on the government to satisfy the claims. I waive discussion, further than already indulged, of the consideration supposed to support the demands of these claimants, growing out of the damages claimed by France for violation by our Government of the old treaties, with the remark that Washington and his patriotic compeers thought there was no such consideration—that we had not violated the old treaties—and by their judgment I am content to abide, only further remarking that these claims of France, if pressed for payment on their merits, and disconnected from the spoliations, would have little chance of recognition. There would be, in such case, none bold enough to press them.

But the claimants have an equity, it is said. Whence and how derived? Their grandfathers and great grandfathers engaged in mercantile ventures on the high seas at a dangerous period, putting the dangers to be encountered against the prospect of great gain. Some of their ships were captured by a public enemy—"hence these tears."

If our Government is a huge insurance corporation, let the bill pass unamended. I prefer to think otherwise. I adhere to the doctrine that to take from the people, under the taxing power, money not needed for legitimate Government expenditure is legalized robbery.

Mr. LONG. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL].

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Among the many denials made in the course of this debate there is one thing that has not been denied, and that is that the commerce of the United States from the year 1793 to 1800 suffered an enormous amount of spoliation at the hands of the French. Its amount has never been calculated at less than $20,000,000; although from the failure of proof on the part of the claimants it has now been reduced to something like $10,000,000 or less, it is nevertheless the fact that the infant commerce of this country suffered at the hands of French privateers or armed vessels of the French not less than $20,000,000. Now the claims are before this Congress for settlement, and it is not alleged by any one that one dollar of these claims has ever been paid.

It is not denied that France was the original debtor, and that being the case it was the duty of the Government of the United States to enforce the payment of the claims. In some way France has been discharged, and still the claimants are unsatisfied; the speeches of my colleague [Mr. LONG] and other gentlemen have clearly shown to the House that the United States assumed the claims as an offset to important advantages secured by our diplomacy from the French Government. My time will not allow me to repeat any of this part of the case.

I have stated the original losses of our merchants at about $20,000,000, an enormous sum at that period of our history. Suppose that any branch of our business should at this time be injured by foreign aggression to an equal amount, I would ask gentlemen on the other side if the sufferers would not have a just claim before Congress, and if that claim would not have to be settled?

There is no vessel afloat bearing the American flag in any sea but has a right to look to its Government for revenge or reparation in case of its spoliation by any people on earth, whether powerful or weak. No gentleman will dispute this; no administration has ever denied or shirked such a responsibility. Great Britain settled the claims of our merchants under the same circumstances at the same time. France settled similar subsequent claims. Spain was compelled to account for her violation of our rights in allowing our vessels to be condemned as prizes by the French in her ports. Indeed, without enlarging the list I may truly say that these present claims are the only similar losses that have not been collected and paid to the sufferers by our Government.

It may be asked how such great losses were incurred and why American commerce at that time exposed itself so boldly to this long-continued spoliation. This admits of full explanation. Gentlemen have claimed that war existed between the United States and France from 1793 to 1800. It does not so appear in history. Congress can only declare war. Where is that declaration? Where is the proclamation of the Executive? What armies were levied? What fleets sailed? What battles were fought by land or sea? And where is the final treaty of peace? All such things must have been. And, sir, if there had been such a war and we had ever made a treaty of peace a part of that treaty would have been an indemnity to the American merchants who had lost $20,000,000 worth of property upon the high seas; and this Government would never have made a treaty without full indemnity for the damage the commerce of the country had sustained. In the early days of the Republic commerce was the dearest object of our people. It was worth every risk; it was worthy of defense; it was the life-blood of the Government.

We were then, though "in the gristle of youth and not yet hardened into the bone of manhood," the most active commercial nation. The flag of the young Republic was seen in every sea wherever winds swept or waters rolled. The skill and daring of our sailors was the envy of the world. The success of the American marine at this period forms one of the most glowing pages of our history. Nearly the whole revenue of the Government was obtained from duties upon imported goods. Owing to the widespread wars of the time our imports could only arrive under our own flag. The support of the Government, the heavy claims of the public creditors for the debt of the Revolution was still unpaid, and the public defense required the revenue derived from imports.

In August, 1793, in the administration of General Washington, Thomas Jefferson being his Secretary of State, it became evident to the Government that if our commerce was to be restricted by danger of capture at sea for alleged violation of neutrality either by the French or English our revenues would be so reduced that the Government could not maintain itself, and in view of that contingency the hand which had penned the Declaration of Independence wrote to the merchants of the United States a circular letter, saying that—

Due attention will be paid to any injuries they may suffer on the high seas or in foreign countries contrary to the law of nations or to existing treaties, and on their forwarding hither well authenticated evidence of the same, proper proceedings will be had for their relief.

And in the December following President Washington in his message to Congress notified citizens suffering spoliations that on furnishing proofs to the Executive due measures would be taken to obtain redress for the past and effective provisions against the future. Mr. Chairman, it was under the promises of George Washington and Thomas Jefferson that our sailors went to sea and that underwriters insured their cargoes. Sir, the grave of George Washington has been a shrine of patriotism for nearly a century, and the dust of Thomas Jefferson long ago mingled with the sacred soil of his beloved Virginia. The little nation of that day, poor in everything but hope, courage, and patriotic endeavor, has become the greatest and most powerful of all the nations of the earth, but the promise made by George Washington and Thomas Jefferson to the merchants of this country is still unredeemed, and three generations of men have broken their hearts against the cruel stones of this Capitol asking for the justice that it is now in our power to give them.

Sir, I return to the point that it is claimed that there was war between the United States and France between 1793 and 1800. We have no record of it. Let us look to France and see what French proof there is of war. If France had considered that there was a state of war existing would not the captures of our vessels have been made as prizes of war? Undoubtedly they would. No other reason would have been necessary; no other reason would have been given.

Under the act of 1885, looking to the final settlement of these claims, our State Department sent to France and to the French West Indies for copies of the original papers made in these condemnations of our vessels.

I have before me copies of the papers in the original French of two of these condemnations. Here we have first the American schooner Peggy, taken as a prize by the French privateers Le Patriote and Les Trois Amis, and carried into the French port of Guadeloupe, and here are the grounds of her condemnation made by the prize court.

The House will notice that this was in 1800.

Spoliation had been going on for seven years, and if there had been war existing the French officers would surely have known it, but there is no allusion whatever in these papers to a condition of war existing between the French Government and the Government of the United States. The condemnation could have been made on the ground of war, if any war existed, and the American vessel would have been a good prize for her French captors, but instead of putting it upon that ground, they simply make the evasive and far-fetched declaration that the sealed letter which this vessel bore was not signed by the proper naval officers, and also that the captain, who acknowledged that he was originally a subject of Great Britain, but who had been naturalized for more than twenty years, did not happen to have his naturalization certificate about him!

The condemnation sets forth that she had not the crew list required according to the regulation established by the French Government as necessary for American ships, and also that there was not sufficient evidence on board that the cargo actually belonged to the men who had shipped it from Norfolk, Va., which was a clumsy attempt to establish a violation of neutrality.

Mr. LONG. In that case was not the condemnation made especially on the ground that the vessel was not a neutral one?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. The condemnation in this case was made mainly upon the ground of want of proof of neutrality, the papers not giving evidence to show whether she belonged to the shippers or the consignees. The real purpose was to obtain possession of her cargo. It was a case covered by the very word used in the act now in question, and so of the other cases. From end to end it was "spoliation"—a word that does not go with acts of legitimate war. If there is wanting proof to offset the circumstances already brought forward here to show a condition of war, you can not have a more strenuous one than this very case. Here is another case—a condemnation of the schooner Success at Guadaloupe under similer circumstances.

Mr. LONG. What is the date?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. September 28, 1800—the same year as the other, and within a few days before the time of the expiration of all claims against the French Government. That was a time certainly when France would have found out whether she was at war with the United States or not, if she was ever going to find it out. This vessel was condemned because her papers were signed by a notary public, and not by such an officer as the French would call a proper one. Not one word is said in either of those condemnations about those two vessels having been made prize because of war between the United States Government and France. France made no allegation of war, and could have made none.

At this late day these cases are sent to the Court of Claims, the act providing—

That the court shall cause notice of all petitions presented under this act to be served on the Attorney-General of the United States, who shall be authorized, by himself or his assistant, to examine witnesses, to cause testimony to be taken, to have access to all testimony taken under this act, and to be heard by the court. He shall resist all claims presented under this act by all proper legal defenses.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to procure, as soon as possible after the passage of this act, through the American minister at Paris or otherwise, all such evidence and documents relating to the claims above mentioned as can be obtained from abroad; which, together with the like evidence and documents on file in the Department of State, or which may be filed in the Department, may be used before the court by the claimants interested therein, or by the United States, but the same shall not be removed from the files of the court; and after the hearings are closed the record of the proceedings of the court and the documents produced before them shall be deposited in the Department of State.

SEC. 6. That on the first Monday of December in each year the court shall report to Congress, for final action, the facts found by it, and its conclusions in all cases which it has disposed of and not previously reported.

Many gentlemen here argue that these cases should still go to the Supreme Court for final adjudication. As a layman, for I am far from understanding the technicalities or subtleties of legal gentlemen discussing this matter, I must say such a proposition seems to me a mockery of justice. If the Court of Claims had found against these claimants, would it have been proposed that they should be enabled to go to the Supreme Court; or would that have been regarded as a final adjudication of the whole matter? Yet gentlemen come forward and propose that this matter should be prolonged through all the years that the Supreme Court may take to reach a conclusion of these questions. I hold, sir, that these matters must be decided by this House, and now. The time has certainly come to do justice in this case, and no good can result to any one by a further postponement of a determination.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DOCKERY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10896) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for prior years, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

OHIO CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I rise to make a privileged motion. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which yesterday the House adopted the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] to Senate bill 3182. I enter a similar motion with regard to the vote by which the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] to the same bill was adopted; and I enter a similar motion in reference to the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] to the same bill was adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motions will be entered under the rules.

PRINTING OF TARIFF LAW, MILLS BILL, ETC.

Mr. DIBBLE. I rise to present a conference report.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the amendments of the Senate to a resolution of the House providing for the printing of the tariff bill. This is a matter in which all members are interested, and it will occupy but a few moments.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, August 8, 1888.

Resolved, That the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives "to print 100,000 copies of a comparative statement embodying the present tariff law (act of March 3, 1883) with proposed amendments of (H. R. 9051) Mills bill," do pass with the following amendments:

Line 7, strike out "Mills bill" and insert "An act to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue."

Line 8, strike out "to."

Line 9, after "printed," insert "75,000."

Line 9, after "House," insert "and 25,000 for the use of the Senate."

Resolved, That the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the said concurrent resolution and amendments.

Ordered, That Mr. MANDERSON, Mr. HAWLEY, and Mr. GORMAN be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. McMILLIN. I wish to say that, in the opinion of those members of the Committee on Ways and Means who have examined these amendments, they are not improper to be adopted by the House; and therefore, instead of asking that the House agree to the conference requested by the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, that order will be made. The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

IMPROVEMENT OF GOVERNOR'S ISLAND.

Mr. DIBBLE. I rise to submit a conference report——

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman will yield to me to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. DIBBLE. I will yield for that purpose if it will not take long.

Mr. COX. It will take but a moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. COX. I ask, by unanimous consent, to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of joint resolution (H. Res. 176) granting permission to the park commissioners of New York City to improve and beautify Governor's Island in connection with a public park to be laid out on said island and on land adjoining and connecting therewith, and to bring it before the House for consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read, subject to objection.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc. (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That permission be, and is hereby, granted to the city of New York, in the State of New York, through its park commissioners, to improve and beautify Governor's Island, situated in or near said city, and belonging to the United States, in connection with a public park to be laid out on said island and on land adjoining and connecting with said island, with the right to said city of New York to make such excavations and fillings and erect and maintain such structures as the Secretary of War may from time to time approve: Provided, That this resolution shall not be construed to pass any title in said island, but that the ownership and control of the said grounds shall remain entirely in the United States, and shall be subject to such changes and uses for military or other purposes as the Secretary of War may direct.

Mr. BYNUM. Let the report be read.

Mr. COX. I can state it in a moment.

Mr. BYNUM. This joint resolution should not be passed in this way, but should have proper consideration.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the gentleman from New York make his statement until we can get some light to enable the clerks to read the report.

Mr. BYNUM. Is there no report accompanying the joint resolution?

Mr. COX. Yes, there is a report, a unanimous report from the Committee on Military Affairs, made by my colleague [Mr. SPINOLA].

Several MEMBERS. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. SPINOLA) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred House resolution 176, entitled "Joint resolution granting permission to the park commissioners of New York City to improve and beautify Governor's Island in connection with a public park to be laid out on said island, and on land adjoining and connecting therewith," beg leave to report that they have considered the subject-matter of the resolution, and have nothing but commendation for its kindly object.

The proximity of Governor's Island to a large city like New York, in the absence of any necessity for such an island for the protection of that city, naturally attracts the attention of those who desire to give such recreation to the overcrowded people of the lower part of that metropolis as such an island would afford. The island is very beautiful. It is 60 acres in extent, and within a minute's reach by steam. The old fort on the island is utterly useless for public defense.

The committee can see no reason why the advantages which nature has placed within view of the city of New York should not be utilized.

Governor's Island came into possession of the United States as a donation by an act of the Legislature of the State of New York, passed May 15, 1800. Prior to the American Revolution the island was a perquisite of the colonial governor, who was the representative of the King of England, but after the war became the property of the colony and then of the State of New York. It is therefore highly proper that the inhabitants of the city should now be allowed to ornament and beautify and enjoy it as a pleasure-ground without expense to the Government, until such time as it may be again required for war purposes.

The lower part of the city of New York is in sad need of a park.

Many encroachments have been made upon the grounds dedicated to the people. St. John's Park was absorbed by a railroad. The Federal public buildings have usurped the City Hall Park. The Battery, which was intended to be a safety vent—a lung—of the metropolis, is being ruined for such a purpose by railroads and by the immigration depot.

There is no real reason why the island should not be converted into a park to give health, comfort, and recreation to the many poor who are sadly in need of such a respite from the heats and discomforts of the city.

If it be said that the island is necessary as a defense in case of war, the answer is very plain and simple. The resolution is entirely consistent with military or defensive uses. There can be no possible emergency in which that island can not be used in case of need as a fortification. There is no stretch of the imagination, no scientific theory in connection with the defense of the city of New York, which would disallow the use of this island for the kindly and humanitarian purpose which the resolution proposes. The range of modern artillery, the use of modern explosives and naval armament, make it entirely useless as a point of defense for the city from an attack of the enemy. Other and more distant places have already been taken as the sites of forts and defensive stations around New York.

There is no reason why the proposition of the present resolution should not be utilized by the people for recreation and pleasure. Of course there will be a constant throng of visitors upon the island in case the joint resolution should become a law. In fact, that is the intention of the resolution. The thickly-populated parts of the city, in finding a solace and comfort in their summer pleasures, would not be at the risk of any gun or missile which might be fired for the destruction of New York City.

There can be no objection to the resolution, inasmuch as the history of the island shows incontestably that it should remain as it once was, a part of New York. But if it be in any way used for the benefit of the Federal Government in the defense of that city, the resolution reserves that privilege.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to discharging the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. McMILLIN. It would seem from the reading of the report that its whole tenor is toward a permanent surrender of the Government's title to these lands to the city of New York. I did not quite hear the conclusion of the report, and I want to know whether there is any provision in the joint resolution that the title to the property shall remain in the Government, and whenever necessary it shall be within the control of the Government.

Mr. COX. That is the intention and such is the express provision of the joint resolution. It is to be given for the purpose provided by the joint resolution, but the Government of the United States will still retain control of it whenever its possession may be demanded for defensive purposes.

Mr. McMILLIN. Not for defensive but for all purposes.

Mr. COX. Yes, for all purposes.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not want the Government to surrender its title to this property, but that it shall remain within control of the authorities, to be returned whenever necessary.

Mr. COX. That I understand to be the provision of the joint resolution, and if when it goes to the Senate it should be found that any additional provision is required, I will say to my friend from Tennessee we can make such amendment as shall be found to be necessary.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think the bill ought to provide that the Government should have the right to resume the control and absolute possession of the property without cost to the Government or payment of damages.

Mr. COX. That is absolutely embodied in the resolution.

The resolution was passed.

Mr. COX. Before moving to reconsider I will say that the proviso of the resolution itself says that this resolution shall not be construed to pass any title to the island, but that it shall remain in the Government of the United States.

I thank the House for its courtesy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman move to reconsider?

Mr. COX. I do. I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also move to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING, JACKSON, MICH.

Mr. DIBBLE. I now ask for the reading of the conference report which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8592) for the erection of a public building at Jackson, Mich., having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to each of the same with an amendment by way of a substitute as follows: Strike out the word "seventy-five" in lines 9 and 17 and insert in lieu thereof the word "sixty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

SAMUEL DIBBLE,
C. NEWTON,
P. S. POST,
Managers on the part of the House.

JOHN C. SPOONER,
T. W. PALMER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The managers on the part of the House submit the following statement in explanation of the report:

The managers on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 8592) for the erection of a public building at Jackson, Mich., respectfully submit the following statement for the information of the House: The House passed the bill for Jackson, Mich., limiting cost of site and building to $50,000. The Senate increased the limit to $75,000. The conferees recommend $60,000.

SAMUEL DIBBLE,
C. NEWTON,
P. S. POST,
Managers on the part of the House.

The conference report was adopted.

Mr. DIBBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7595) for the erection of a public building at Kalamazoo, Mich., and put it on its passage in the House.

I will state that this bill was read this morning and objection was then made which is now withdrawn. I ask consent to put it upon its passage now, as I am compelled to leave the city to-morrow on account of sickness in my family.

Mr. TARSNEY. I must object. I am disgusted with this method of doing business. The other side is constantly recognized and our side ignored.

Mr. BURROWS. Do I understand my colleague to make objection?

Mr. BYNUM. What is the request?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To put upon its passage the bill for the erection of a public building at Kalamazoo.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let the bill be read.

Mr. BURROWS. There is not time to read the bill now. It was read this morning. This is simply a method of defeating it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let us hear what it is about.

Mr. BURROWS. It appropriates the sum of $75,000 for a public building in a city of 25,000 people, in which the postal receipts last year were $41,000. If you want to reduce the amount to $50,000 I am content. I ask that the bill be taken up and passed.

Mr. BYNUM. Let us have the reading of the bill.

Mr. BURROWS. That will take up all the remaining time. I have promised to give way to other gentlemen, and therefore I am compelled to withdraw the bill if that is insisted upon.

Mr. LONG. The bill has already been read in the hearing of the House this morning.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill (H. R. 7924) for the relief of A. J. McCreary, administrator of the estate of J. M. Hyatt, deceased.

Mr. BYNUM. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 26, noes 27.

Mr. BYNUM. I demand tellers.

Mr. PERKINS. If tellers are to be insisted upon we might as well consent to the adjournment, as there is no time now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the result of the vote has been announced.

The gentleman from Indiana demands tellers.

Tellers were refused, 25 members only voting in favor thereof.

And then (the hour of 5 o'clock having arrived) the Speaker pro tempore declared the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below.

By Mr. J. R. BROWN: A bill (H. R. 11121) for the relief of Robert W. Whitlow—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CARUTH: A bill (H. R. 11122) for the relief of Charles D. Jacob—to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11123) for the relief of Francis A. Boyd—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11124) for the relief of Barbara Vogt—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11125) to pension Patrick Cody—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FRENCH: A bill (H. R. 11126) for the relief of Capt. William E. Morris—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. STONE, of Kentucky: A bill (H. R. 11127) for the relief of E. B. Carter—to the Committee on War Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. DALZELL: Petition of Welcome Council, No. 134, Junior Order United American Mechanics, for the passage of the bill to restrict immigration—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. HEARD: Two petitions of citizens of the Sixth district of Missouri, favoring the reduction of duties on dentists' goods, etc.—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HOGG: Petition of Mrs. Louisa Knight, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. McCOMAS: Petition of Deborah Martz, executrix of W. H. Martz, of Frederick County, Maryland, for payment of his war claim—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. MATSON: Petition of D. A. Johnson and 108 others, of Jackson County, Indiana, for the repeal of the arrears act—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MORRILL: Memorial of George W. McKenne, of Leavenworth, Kans., for the passage of the bill providing for settlement of accounts under the eight-hour law—to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. SPRINGER: Petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Indian Territory, for a prohibitory constitutional amendment—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. STONE, of Kentucky: Petition of citizens of Paducah, Ky., praying that a board of hull and boiler inspectors be established by law at Paducah, Ky.—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. VOORHEES: Petition of 14 members of the bar of Washington Territory, for the passage of an act providing two additional judges for Washington Territory—to the Committee on the Territories.

Also, resolutions of the Bar Association of Yakima County, Washington Territory, for the same—to the Committee on the Territories.

The following petition for the repeal or modification of the internal-revenue tax of $25 levied on druggists was received and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means:

By Mr. HARMER: Of citizens of Pennsylvania.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 9, 1888.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. VEST presented a petition of citizens of Missouri, praying for certain amendments to the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of W. T. Hukel and 9 other citizens of Sturgeon, Mo., praying for legislation prohibiting fraudulent importation of cattle and suggesting an amendment of certain import duties; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5516) for the relief of John H. Weeks, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 921) for the relief of John H. Weeks, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4765) for the relief of G. W. McAdams, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported adversely thereon, and they were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 3069) granting pay and allowances of a second lieutenant of infantry to Charles L. Jenny; and

A bill (S. 2870) to correct the military record of Capt. William Vincent.

Mr. BATE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas P. MacManus, praying that a vacancy in the United States Army be created by law, to which he may be appointed, for the purpose of being retired therefrom on pay, asked that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the petition lie on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. RANSOM. I am directed by the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7643) to establish a United States land court and to provide for a judicial investigation and settlement of private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico and in the State of Colorado, to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. The amendment is the bill (S. 2042) to establish a United States land court and to provide for the settlement of private land claims in certain States and Territories.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, with the amendment, will be placed on the Calendar.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. PALMER introduced a bill (S. 3430) providing for the purchase of the Portage Lake and River Improvement Company Canal and the Lake Superior Ship Canal, Railway and Iron Company Canal, Michigan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENT TO GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

THE GUILFORD MILLER CASE.

Mr. MITCHELL. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate a copy of his recent decision in the case commonly known as the Guilford Miller case, and affecting the title to lands claimed by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company as being, as it is alleged, within the indemnity limits of the grant to such company, together with copies of all evidence and accompanying papers in any manner connected therewith, or in any manner relating thereto.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is stated in the public press that the decision referred to affects the title to a great many lands in the Northwestern country in which the settlers there are very much interested. I have been requested by telegraph and otherwise to secure copies of the decision, and so I have offered the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, that order is closed, and the Calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

The joint resolution (S. R. 12) proposing an amendment of the Constitution of the United States in relation to the manufacture, importation, exportation, transportation, and sale of alcoholic liquors was announced as first in order on the Calendar.

ACCOUNTS WITH STATES.

Mr. PADDOCK. Yesterday Senate bill 2430, Order of Business 1725, was passed over temporarily without being displaced. I should like now to have it considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has the right to call up the bill if it was passed over without prejudice.

The bill (S. 2430) explanatory of an act entitled "An act to settle certain accounts between the United States and the State of Mississippi and other States, and for other purposes," was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move, in line 12, after the word "reservations," to insert:

As the same may be disposed of from time to time.

I move the amendment at the instance of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PADDOCK. There is no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported at the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 12, after the word "reservations," it is proposed to insert the words:

As the same may be disposed of from time to time.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to settle certain accounts between the United States and the State of Mississippi, and other States," approved March 3, 1857, shall, and is hereby, declared to be applicable to the States admitted into the Union since March 3, 1857, namely, Minnesota, Oregon, Kansas, Nebraska, Nevada, and Colorado, the same as it applied to States previously admitted. The said act shall be construed as embracing all lands in former and present Indian reservations, as the same may be disposed of from time to time, in each of said States, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall state an account between the United States and each of the said States, estimating all such lands and reservations at $1.25 per acre, and shall certify the same to the Secretary of the Treasury for settlement, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALCOHOLIC LIQUORS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next business on the Calendar is the joint resolution (S. R. 12) proposing an amendment of the Constitution of the United States in relation to the manufacture, importation, exportation, transportation, and sale of alcoholic liquors.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over under objection, without prejudice.

Mr. BLAIR. Let it be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over without prejudice.

HORACE A. W. TABOR.

The bill (S. 110) for the relief of Horace A. W. Tabor was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads with an amendment, in line 6, to strike out "$7,058.05" and insert "$3,869.94;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Horace A. W. Tabor, of Colorado, the sum of $3,869.94, or so much thereof as shall appear to the proper accounting officer of the Government to have been paid by said Horace A. W. Tabor for necessary expenses in the Leadville post-office over and above the allowances made for that purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROYAL M. HUBBARD.

The bill (S. 685) for the relief of Royal M. Hubbard was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 5, after the word "for," to strike out the words "clerk-hire necessarily expended by him from January 1, 1879, to June 30, 1883, the sum of $4,125, and for;" and in line 9, before the word "period" to strike out the word "same," and after the word "period" to insert "from April 1, 1881, to June 30, 1883, the sum of;" so as to read:

That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to allow to Royal M. Hubbard, postmaster at Longmont, Colo., for rent of post-office during the period from April 1, 1881, to June 30, 1883, the sum of $600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 12, after the word "said," to strike out "amounts" and insert "amount;" so as to read:

And a sum sufficient to pay said amount is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I should like to hear the report read. There are a good many objections to measures of that sort.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report, submitted by Mr. BOWEN July 9, 1888.

Mr. BECK. I do not ask for the further reading of the report. I have run over it myself. Let it be printed in the RECORD. The case is all right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 685) for the relief of Royal M. Hubbard, have had the same under consideration and make the following report:

Hubbard was appointed postmaster at Longmont, Colo., April 14, 1873, and served until July 30, 1886. The office was assigned to the second class under the regular biennial adjustment of 1882, and the salary of the office was fixed at $2,100 per annum from July 1, 1882. Subsequently, however, by a special order dated June 14, 1884 (there having been more than 50 per cent. increase of the business of the post-office between the biennial adjustment of 1880 and that of 1882), the Postmaster-General reviewed the adjustment of 1882 and fixed the salary at $2,100 from April 1, 1881, that being the first day of the period the returns for which were used in the adjustment taking effect July 1, 1882, and the office, therefore, under this special order, was properly in the second class from April 1, 1881.

Mr. Hubbard during the period from January 1, 1879, to June 30, 1883, expended $4,125 for clerk-hire necessary for the proper transaction of the business of his office in excess of the amount authorized by the Department, for which he furnished the receipts of the clerks employed.

The Department declined to allow for these expenditures, for reasons stated in the letter of the chief of the salary and allowance division, transmitted to your committee by the Postmaster-General under date of February 27, 1888, and your committee, in view of the unfavorable report of the Department as to the claim for clerk-hire, does not feel inclined to recommend the allowance of that portion of the claim.

Mr. Hubbard is, however, fairly entitled to an allowance for rent from the date when the office became second class (April 1, 1881) to June 30, 1883, and the Postmaster-General, in the letter of February 27, 1888, states that he regards the claim for rent during the period when Longmont was a second-class office as an equitable one.

The letters of the Postmaster-General, dated February 27, 1888, and April 21, 1888, are made part of this report.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill (S. 685) be so amended as to allow to Hubbard $600 for rent during the period from April 1, 1881, to June 30, 1883, and that the bill as so amended do pass.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., March 2, 1888.

SENATOR: I have the honor to return herewith Senate bill 685, for the relief of Royal M. Hubbard, formerly postmaster at Longmont, Colo., together with the report of the chief of the salary and allowance division called for by me, with such data bearing upon the subject from the records of this Department as will furnish the information requested by you.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

DON M. DICKINSON,
Postmaster-General.

Senator SAWYER,
Chairman Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, United States Senate.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
SALARY AND ALLOWANCE DIVISION,
Washington, D. C., February 27, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith as requested Senate bill 685, for the relief of Royal M. Hubbard, formerly postmaster at Longmont, Colo., which was referred to you by Hon. PHILETUS SAWYER, chairman Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, United States Senate, with the following information and remarks thereon:

The bill is for clerk-hire expended by Royal M. Hubbard as postmaster at Longmont from January 1, 1879, to June 30, 1883, in the sum of $4,125, and for rent of the post-office for the same period, in the sum of $600.

As per statement herewith, marked Exhibit A, it will be seen that Royal M. Hubbard was appointed postmaster at Longmont April 14, 1873, and that his successor was appointed July 30, 1886. A statement of the salary and allowances of the said office from October 1, 1878, to June 30, 1884, inclusive, is also furnished.

It will be observed that the said office was assigned to the third class, and the salary of the postmaster fixed at $1,300 a year, by special adjustment, which took effect October 1, 1878.

On the 1st of April, 1882, an allowance in the sum of $300 a year was authorized for clerical assistance in separating mails at Longmont, the said allowance being made from the supplemental appropriation for clerks in post-offices as authorized by Congress, and in accordance with law. (Act of July 12, 1876, 19 Stats., page 82.)

On the 1st of July, 1882, in the regular biennial adjustment of salaries of postmasters, the salary of the postmaster at Longmont was fixed at $2,100 a year, from July 1, 1882, and the office assigned to the second class. Prior to this date (July 1, 1882) no allowance for rent could have been made under existing law, as the office belonged to the third class, to which class no allowance could be made. The records show that no application nor claim was made by the postmaster for rent from January 1, 1879, to June 30, 1883, and no vouchers for rent during the said period have been filed with the Auditor.

On the 23d of October, 1884, Postmaster Hubbard made claim for $850 additional clerk-hire for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1884. This was examined, and, under date of October 29, 1884, the sum of $600 for additional clerk-hire was authorized and allowed for the said fiscal year, making the total allowance for that year $900.

In view of these facts, no additional amount should be allowed the late postmaster (Hubbard) for clerk-hire; but if he can submit proper vouchers for reasonable expenditure for rent of post-office for that part of the time covered by this bill (Senate 865), namely, from July 1, 1882, to June 30, 1883, when the post-office at Longmont belonged to the second class, it would appear that his claim would be an equitable one.

Very respectfully,

ALBERT H. SCOTT,
Chief Salary and Allowance Division.

Hon. DON M. DICKINSON,
Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.

EXHIBIT A.

LONGMONT, COLO.

The records in bond division show that Royal M. Hubbard was appointed postmaster at Longmont, Colo., April 14, 1873, and his successor was appointed July 30, 1886.

The following statement shows the allowance for clerk-hire (no allowances were made for rent, fuel, and light), salary of postmaster, total salary and allowances, box rents and commissions, and gross receipts from January 1, 1879, to June 30, 1883:

Date.	Allowance for clerk-hire.	Salary of postmaster.	Total salary and allowances.	Box rents and commissions.	Gross receipts.	Remarks.
October 1, 1878.....	.....	$1,300	$1,300	$1,330	$2,505	Presidential from October 1, 1878.
July 1, 1880.....	.....	1,400	1,400	1,412	2,635
April 1, 1882.....	$300	1,400	1,700	1,412	2,635
July 1, 1882.....	300	2,100	2,400	2,304	4,520
July 1, 1883.....	300	2,100	2,400	2,304	4,520
June 30, 1884.....	*900	2 100	3,000	2,304	4,520

*Special allowance of $600 for clerk-hire for fiscal year ended June 30, 1884, made upon application of postmaster.

NOTE.—By adjustment taking effect July 1, 1884, Longmont, Colo., was assigned to the third class and the salary fixed at $1,500 from July 1, 1884.

The quarterly returns in the office of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department show that no claim was made by Royal M. Hubbard as postmaster at Longmont, Colo., for any amount expended by him for either clerk-hire or rent from January 1, 1879, to March 31, 1882, nor are there any vouchers on file for either item during the period named; that from April 1, 1882, to June 30, 1883, he claimed and was allowed $75 per quarter or $300 a year for clerk-hire, and that no other amounts were claimed by him for clerk-hire. No claim for rent was made during the entire period from January 1, 1879, to June 30, 1883, nor were any vouchers filed showing any amount paid for rent.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
SALARY AND ALLOWANCE DIVISION,
Washington, D. C., April 21, 1888.

SIR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 17th instant, relative to the claim of Royal M. Hubbard, formerly postmaster at Longmont, Colo., and to state that the salary for the postmaster at Longmont was correctly stated in the report of the chief of the salary and allowance division, under date of February 27 last, at $2,100 a year, from July 1, 1882. This adjustment was made at the regular biennial adjustment, as required by the then existing law. By a special order dated June 4, 1884, the said postmaster was allowed salary at the rate of $2,100 a year, from the first day of the period the returns for which were used in the adjustment taking effect July 1, 1882. In other words, the late postmaster was allowed the increase of salary at the rate of $2,100 a year from April 1, 1881.

Very respectfully,

DON M. DICKINSON,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. THOMAS M. BOWEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SURETIES OF GEORGE W. HOOK.

The bill (S. 2783) for the relief of the sureties of George W. Hook, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was unable to concur with the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary in reporting this bill favorably. It is one of the class of bills for the relief of persons who were sureties for officers to whom the money of the United States was intrusted, and the sole ground of relief is, as in most of these cases, that a good deal of time has elapsed, although the statute of limitations under the existing law does not run; and therefore it is against moral equity that the sureties should be required to pay; that if the claim had been prosecuted in the time of it the money could have been got out of the sureties or perhaps out of the principal.

I do not believe in any such moral equity. I believe that it is just as much the duty of a surety on an official bond of an officer of the United States to see to it when the officer goes out of office that his obligation is performed as it is for a clerk in the Treasury Department to see to it and report and have the Solicitor bring an action.

Unhappily the people of the United States can not take care of their own affairs and look after them as private persons can do, but they have to intrust them to agents and servants; and to hold that owing to the neglect of the agents and servants to do what the law does not compel them to do, the surety, the person who has personally engaged to pay the money, is to be let off, who does not take any steps to inquire into it, and who might find out all about it if he chose, and very often does know all about it, but thinks he will take the chance of not paying until called upon, and shall be set now at large without any payment, is really to destroy the value of all this species of security. I do not believe it is right. I suppose the opposition is hopeless, but I feel bound to express my opinion.

Mr. BECK. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont how long it was after the defalcation, or whatever it was, of Mr. Hook that the sureties were sought to be held responsible by the United States?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am inclined to think that in this case it was thirteen or fourteen years. I do not remember; it was a good while.

Mr. BECK. They seem to have signed the bond in 1858. I always supposed that the Judiciary Committee of the Senate or of the House would endeavor in some way to fix some limit to the liability of sureties. It frequently happens that four or five men go on an official bond; they are thought good at the time; perhaps two or three may die or become insolvent in the course of fifteen or twenty years, and at last the burden falls upon one man, and ten, fifteen, or twenty-five years afterwards he is brought up and sought to be made accountable for the whole amount, when he could have saved himself if he had had a decent chance.

If the Treasury Department does not call attention to these things in the lifetime of an ordinary man, it seems to me the sureties ought not to be held liable, and some way ought to be devised to cover the case and fix some limit whereby a man can be released from such an obligation. I shall certainly vote to relieve the sureties in this case.

Mr. VEST. This bill was under the charge of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], but the facts are as stated, and indeed much stronger than embraced in the reply of the Senator from Vermont. Instead of thirteen or fourteen years, it was nearer twenty years after the execution of the bond before the sureties had any intimation that there was any default whatever upon their part.

Mr. STEWART. I can not hear the Senator from Missouri. I should like to hear how long the bond had been allowed to run.

Mr. VEST. Nearly twenty years. This is but one of a large class of cases that are constantly coming before the Congress of the United States in regard to sureties. If an individual goes upon a bond to a State or a municipality or to another individual, he is protected by the statute of limitations; but in the case of the Government of the United States, years, perhaps the third of a century or the half of a century, as in some cases, elapses. The surety receives no notice whatever of any default of the principal. The principal is dead, the witnesses are gone, the facts are not within the memory of any living man and not upon the record, and the first intimation he has that he or his estate is held liable upon the suretyship is a notice served upon him from Washington.

I had a case not long since of a constituent of mine who executed a bond thirty-two years ago and never had the slightest intimation that there was a dollar due upon it until notice was served upon him that unless he came here immediately and paid some $6,400 he would be sued in the United States court.

It is a great outrage that we have enacted no law to do away with this injustice, and I say for one emphatically that on such a case as is here presented (and this is but one of a hundred or a thousand other cases) I shall always vote to release the sureties. It is unjust to them, and presents the very highest equity in an appeal to the legislators of the whole country.

Mr. STEWART. I fully indorse what the Senator from Missouri has said. It seems to me that there is no greater hardship which can be perpetrated by any government than to pursue the heirs of deceased persons long after the transaction, when the evidence is all gone. I have known several such instances. I have just been subjected to a suit on a bond where everybody connected with it was dead except myself. I was one of the sureties, and I was put to a great deal of trouble. I had to go to the Supreme Court. There was nothing due on the bond, and I won the case finally; but it was a persecution, I think.

The Government ought to bring these suits within a reasonable time. There ought to be a statute of limitations. There is no reason why the Government should delay twenty-five years after default on a bond any more than a private individual. The Government waits twenty or thirty years and then pursues the heirs, who are entirely ignorant of the transaction. The sureties and the heirs of the sureties may be entirely ignorant of the transaction and they have no means of defense. It is a great injustice. On any bond that has been in default more than ten years I shall vote to relieve the sureties without making any inquiry whatever into the merits of the case.

Mr. PUGH. I have just come into the Senate, and as I reported the bill from the Judiciary Committee I desire to state that the report was unanimous with the single exception of the chairman [Mr. EDMUNDS]. Bills like this were passed at this and the last Congress, and one of much less merit was passed at the present session. The facts in the case are briefly and clearly set forth in the petition of the sureties. If the Senate desires to know anything more about the merits of the bill, it can have the information by having the petition of the sureties read.

Mr. BECK. I do not want to know anything about the merits of the bill, but I desire to ask the Senator from Alabama whether the Judiciary Committee can not devise some means whereby a general rule can be adopted in regard to the liability of sureties, so that suit shall not be brought against men twenty or thirty years afterwards, when all the facts perhaps are gone. Has that matter ever been considered by the committee?

Mr. PUGH. There has been a bill referred to that committee, and my information is that it has been reported favorably, limiting the liability of sureties to six years after the default has been ascertained.

Mr. BECK. That would reach the case.

Mr. PUGH. That is the law now in reference to the liability of sureties on bonds of postmasters and officials who are serving under other Departments.

This bill seems to be a case that is exceptional, for in every other liability like this there has been a limitation already fixed by the bill which has been passed by the Senate limiting the liability of sureties in all such cases to six years.

Here is a liability that has slept without any information being given by the officials charged with ascertaining it for twenty years, during which time nearly all the sureties were solvent, and in the beginning the principal was abundantly able to respond to the liability if there had been any diligence whatever employed to ascertain it.

As I say, there never has been a clearer case of merit before the Senate, and I know a bill has passed the Senate having less merit in it than the one now under consideration.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. There have been so many cases of this sort which have shocked the sense of fairness of Senators that this matter has been discussed to a very great extent in the committees of this body heretofore. On the 3d of March, 1887, a little over a year ago, the last Congress passed a law intended to remedy exactly this class of difficulties. A provision in section 3 of that act provides that any party conceiving himself indebted to the Government on any sort of claim, either as principal or surety, may go into the Court of Claims and present a petition stating that he has asked for a settlement at the hands of the Government and that three years have passed without a settlement being rendered to him. It becomes then the duty of the court to bring the Government, by notification to the Attorney-General, into the court and determine what the state of the account is between the individual and the Government, and this is by the act required to be a final settlement of the question.

The act of 1887 places it within the hands of anybody who chooses to do it to ask for the settlement of any claim existing between him, either as principal or surety, and the Government of the United States, so that this crying evil, this practice that has heretofore prevailed in the Treasury Department of the United States, of allowing an account to stand open without settlement for ten, fifteen, or twenty years, will not be allowed to continue hereafter.

Mr. BECK. That applies only to cases arising hereafter.

Mr. STEWART. That involves——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada has spoken once on this question.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to ask a question for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not recognize the Senator without unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. The act to which I refer of course does not relieve the present hardship, and the number of claimants of this class who are here now asking to be relieved is very great.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas has spoken five minutes.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. The Senator from Arkansas will of course yield to the opinion of the Chair, but his impression is that the Chair must have made some mistake in the clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair goes by the glass upon his desk. Is there amendment to the bill as in Committee of the Whole?

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives to print 100,000 copies of the present tariff law and amendments proposed by the Mills bill.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8592) for the erection of a public building at Jackson, Mich.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 11118) to authorize the construction and operation of a street-railway and wagon bridge across the Rio Grande, between the city of El Paso, Tex., and Paso del Norte, Mexico; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 176) granting permission to the park commissioners of New York City to improve and beautify Governor's Island and in connection with a public park to be laid out on said island and on land adjoining and connecting therewith.

JUDICIAL SALARIES.

The bill (S. 775) to regulate the compensation of the chief-justice and judges of the Court of Claims and of the justices of the supreme court of the District of Columbia was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. GEORGE. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will not object. Let us take the yeas and nays on it. I am opposed to it as he is.

Mr. GEORGE. Let it go over under Rule IX. I object to it in toto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has the right to object under the rule, and the bill passes over to the Calendar under Rule IX.

Mr. VEST. I wish to ask unanimous consent to call the attention of my friend from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] to the print of this bill, S. 775. There are some gross mistakes either in the printing or the draughting of the bill—I presume in the printing—as he will see if he will look at the bill, and I call his attention to it so that the bill may be corrected before it comes up again for consideration. It is ungrammatical and not the bill we reported from the committee at all. I call the attention of my friend to the point where, in the seventh line, the words occur "the same salary as that of a circuit judge of a," and it reads now "of the District of Columbia." Of course that is a gross error.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not the bill as amended in committee.

Mr. PUGH. There is manifestly an error in the printing.

Mr. VEST. There is no sense in the bill now at all.

Mr. PUGH. I trust the bill will be reprinted as reported by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been passed over. The printing will be attended to by the Secretary.

THE GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

The bill (S. 763) to promote the efficiency of the General Land Office was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. MORGAN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over to the Calendar under Rule IX.

Mr. BLAIR. Without prejudice, I suppose.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, let it go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

FUGITIVES FROM JUSTICE.

The bill (S. 3136) to amend section 1014 of the Revised Statutes of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments, in line 4, after the word "so," to strike out "amended" and insert "construed;" in line 5, after the word "arrest," to strike out "according to the provisions of" and insert "in the manner and by the authority mentioned in;" in line 10, after the word "if," to strike out "already" and insert "such offender shall have been;" in line 15, after the word "sentence," to strike out "and" and insert "or;" in the same line, after the word "until," to strike out "duly and legally" and insert "lawfully;" in line 16, after the word "discharged," to strike out "for which" and insert "and for the;" after the word "purposes," in the same line, to strike out "the district judge" and insert "hereinbefore, or in said section mentioned, any justice or judge of any court of the United States, or of a Territory, or the District of Columbia, having jurisdiction in the place where the offender may be found;" in line 21, after the word "as," to strike out "required" and insert "provided;" and in line 22, after the word "any," to strike out "district" and insert "place;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1014 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be so construed that it shall apply to and authorize the arrest, in the manner and by the authority mentioned in said section, of any offender against the laws of the United States, as well after as before trial, and his commitment to lawful custody, unless he shall give bail as required by law, if entitled thereto; and if such offender shall have been convicted and sentenced, the said offender shall be, by proper process, surrendered to the officials having authority to execute said sentence, or their agent, to be by them held and returned to any place required by the sentence of the court, or by law, for the due execution of said sentence or until lawfully discharged; and for the purposes hereinbefore, or in said section mentioned, any justice or judge of any court of the United States, or of a Territory, or the District of Columbia, having jurisdiction in the place where the offender may be found may also issue his warrant of removal as provided by said section if the said offender be arrested in any place other than that where the further proceedings are to be had after trial, or the sentence of the court is to be executed.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to amend the title by adding "in relation to fugitives from justice." I think that will cover it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The title as amended reads: "A bill to amend section 1014 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to fugitives from justice."

FUNERAL OF GENERAL SHERIDAN.

Mr. HAWLEY submitted the following concurrent resolutions, and asked for their immediate consideration:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the members of both Houses attend the funeral of General Sheridan on Saturday next at 10 a. m.

Resolved, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, That when the two Houses of Congress adjourn on Friday it be to meet on Monday next.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolutions.

Mr. HOAR. I would like to inquire of the Senator from Connecticut—he has probably considered the question—whether the adjournment, if we are to attend the funeral as a Senate, should not be to 10 o'clock on Saturday for the purpose of attending the funeral?

Mr. HAWLEY. It was not thought best, I may say to the Senator, that the Senate and House should make an attempt to attend as bodies, but that the members should go individually.

Mr. HOAR. That is not the resolution.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes, "the members," it says. This resolution is similar, I will say, to the resolution adopted at the time of the decease of General Scott and of Major-General Brown, who at the time of his decease was at the head of the Army. Members of both Houses will receive cards of admission from the Secretary of War.

The resolutions were agreed to nem. con.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

Subsequently a message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the resolutions of the Senate that the members of both Houses attend the funeral of General Sheridan on Saturday next, at 10 a. m,, and that as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, when the two Houses of Congress adjourn on Friday it be to meet on Monday next.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 11045) for the relief of Sam Rice Post, No. 6, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Iowa; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 422) for the relief of William Gray;

A bill (H. R. 610) for the relief of William Lavery;

A bill (H. R. 2088) for the relief of W. S. Carpenter;

A bill (H. R. 6232) for the relief of Nancy G. Alexander;

A bill (H. R. 6233) for the relief of Jesse Coe; and

A bill (H. R. 7647) to incorporate the Georgetown and Tennallytown Railway Company of the District of Columbia.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. EVARTS. I move that the Senate now go into open executive session and take up the fisheries treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate do now proceed, in open executive session, to the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now in open executive session. If there be no objection, the reading of the Journal of the last open executive session will be dispensed with. The Executive Clerk will report the treaty by title.

The EXECUTIVE CLERK. Treaty between the United States and Great Britain concerning the interpretation of the convention of October 20, 1818, signed at Washington February 15, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to postpone the further consideration of this treaty until the Wednesday after the first Monday in December next.

Mr. EVARTS resumed the floor and concluded the speech begun by him yesterday. See page 7325.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator from New York desire to retain the floor?

Mr. EVARTS. No; I do not proceed further now.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

Mr. HOAR. During the remarks of the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] interrupted that Senator by calling his attention to a proposed treaty sent to the Senate in June, 1874, in the administration of President Grant, the President stating in that message:

Among its provisions are articles proposing to dispense with the arbitration respecting fisheries, which was provided for by the treaty of Washington in the event of the conclusion and ratification of a treaty.

When the Senator from Alabama produced that document the Senator from New York answered that it was not pertinent to the line of argument with which he was then engaged, from which he declined to be diverted in order to make any comments upon the proposed treaty read by the Senator from Alabama.

I think it is proper that the fact should go on record now, first, that President Grant sent it as simply a matter submitted to his consideration through the Secretary of State by the plenipotentiaries of Her Britannic Majesty, intimated that "a proper treaty for such purposes would result beneficially for the United States," but said he was not prepared to say "whether it makes all the concessions which could justly be required of Great Britain or whether it calls for more concessions from the United States than we should yield," and requested the opinion of the Senate in regard to the proposition and the advice of the Senate before forming his own—a very different course from that pursued at the present time.

Then, the matter having been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, that proposition was reported by that committee adversely with a resolution that the proposed treaty was not expedient. Mr. Schurz, a Senator from Missouri, moved to insert in the resolution the words "under present circumstances," indicating that the proposed treaty in regard to this fishery matter might, under some circumstances, be expedient or that the Senate was not then prepared to declare to the contrary. That amendment was rejected without a division, and thereupon, by the unanimous vote of this body, the original resolution was adopted, Mr. Allen G. Thurman and Mr. Thomas F. Bayard being then members of the body.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know upon what authority the Senator from Massachusetts says that was a unanimous vote. There was no vote by yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. CULLOM. He said the resolution was passed without a division.

Mr. HOAR. It was a report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the resolution was agreed to without dissent.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not understand that when a vote is taken without a division or without a call of the yeas and nays, anybody has a right to say that it was a unanimous vote unless the record so states.

Mr. HOAR. It depends, it seems to me, upon the importance of the question and the gravity of it. If the Senator will pardon me to say that the adoption of a resolution in regard to a treaty proposed to this Government by the great power of Great Britain on the great subjects to which that negotiation related, reported without division from the Committee on Foreign Relations and passed unanimously by this body, does not represent the grave, deliberate, serious, and unanimous opinion of all the Senators then present, seems to me a great mistake.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I read the message of General Grant before the Senate to-day, and I presume it will go into the RECORD with the remarks of the Senator from New York. The President said then that—

The proposed draught has many features to commend it to our favorable consideration; but whether it makes all the concessions which could justly be required of Great Britain, or whether it calls for more concessions from the United States than we should yield, I am not prepared to say.

Among its provisions are articles proposing to dispense with the arbitration respecting fisheries, which was provided for by the treaty of Washington in the event of the conclusion and ratification of a treaty, and the passage of all the necessary legislation to enforce it.

In a preceding clause in the message in regard, evidently, to the reciprocity features of the treaty, which included free fish and fish-oil and all the products of the sea, all the animals that grow in the sea, including shell-fish, President Grant said:

I am of the opinion that a proper treaty for such purposes would result beneficially for the United States. It would not only open or enlarge markets for our productions, but it would increase the facilities of transportation from the grain-growing States of the West to the seaboard.

This treaty has very unfortunately, I think, in respect of all the proceedings connected with it, been given an ultra-political aspect here in debate. The Democratic party has come in for a large share of criticism, to use the mildest word about it, and criticism of a very rough character, and particularly the present Administration for its recommendation of a commission to negotiate in regard to the subject of the fisheries with Great Britain. Mr. Arthur in 1884, in his last message to Congress, when he gave notice to Congress that he had proclaimed the termination of the treaty of 1871, said:

Notice of the termination of the fisheries articles of the treaty of Washington was duly given to the British Government, and the reciprocal privileges and exemptions of the treaty will accordingly cease on July 1, 1885. The fisheries industries pursued by a numerous class of our citizens on the northern coasts, both of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, are worthy of the fostering care of Congress. Whenever brought into competition with the like industries of other countries our fishermen, as well as our manufacturers of fishing appliances and preparers of fish products, have maintained a foremost place. I suggest that Congress create a commission to consider the general question of our rights in the fisheries and the means of opening to our citizens, under just and enduring conditions, the richly-stocked fishing waters and sealing grounds of British North America.

As I remember what Mr. Cleveland recommended in his message to the Senate on that subject, the language of the two messages is almost identical. The principle of the two messages is unquestionably identical. Mr. Arthur proposed to the Congress of the United States precisely the same thing that Mr. Cleveland afterwards proposed. No action was taken. No members of the leading committee, the Committee on Foreign Relations, then thought it was necessary to introduce any resolution denouncing Mr. Arthur for having made the same recommendation precisely that Mr. Cleveland afterwards made. The fishery clauses of the treaty of 1871 were then to be terminated under his notice, and it was time that Congress was making some provision at that moment to meet the suggestion President Arthur made, that a commission should be organized by Congress to take into consideration the whole subject of the fisheries and deal with it and dispose of it; but no Senator on that side saw proper to make any point upon Mr. Arthur about it.

As soon, however, as Mr. Cleveland made the same recommendation, instantly resolutions came in of a denunciatory character. Several Senators tried their 'prentice hands upon resolutions denouncing Mr. Cleveland's method of referring this subject to a commission.

Sir, I have always had a very great respect for Mr. Cleveland as President of the United States, a respect that has grown day by day since I have had further opportunity of examining into his methods of administration, the principles by which he is controlled, the honesty, integrity, and patriotism that influence him in all of his political career, so that my opinion of Mr. Cleveland has continually increased in value.

But notwithstanding I have been supposed to be a pretty true Democrat, the moment a resolution was introduced into the Senate drawing into question the right of the Congress of the United States to create a commission to deal with a subject of this kind which will be in the future and was one of a diplomatic nature, I united with the Republicans on that side of the Chamber in denying to Congress any such right. I did it because that was a surrender of the constitutional power and rights of this body and of the President of the United States, not because I opposed negotiations, but I wanted negotiations conducted by the right man and brought to the right tribunal for confirmation, amendment, or rejection.

I did not wish that after the Congress of the United States had created the commission it should by joint resolutions instruct them what they should do, or by joint resolution or by bill, to pass both Houses and receive the President's approval as a law, approve what they did and make it obligatory upon the Government of the United States. I did not find it necessary, nor do I find it necessary now, or even admissible in the slightest degree, that the Senate of the United States should abdicate its constitutional authority and power and surrender into the hands of Congress that which our fathers never intended that Congress should touch, subjects of diplomatic arrangement between our Government and foreign governments upon affairs which concern us and them. That was the attitude.

Here we find, as has been stated to-day in debate, that in 1871, according to the protocol which I read before this body, the United States Government, General Grant then being President of the United States and Mr. Fisk Secretary of State, proposed free fish and free oil to the English people, and made the proposition. The protocol shows it. Afterwards, in 1874, when General Grant found, with his usual sagacity, which never failed him, that the matter of indemnity which was provided in the treaty of 1871 in favor of Great Britain, as was supposed and as was intended, for the difference between the value of her fisheries and our fisheries, would lead to the amercement of this country doubtless in a very heavy sum of money, he was quite willing to accept a treaty from the British Government which would cancel that part of the treaty of 1871; and the treaty which he sent to the Senate of the United States with his recommendation did cancel that part of the treaty of 1871, and if the Senate of the United States, instead of voting unanimously to reject that proposition that General Grant made, had been possessed of the common sense and sagacity that he had, they would then have accepted that proposition, and they would have saved to this country the $5,500,000 that some people say was wrung out of us by the fraud of some foreign man, Delfosse, or whoever it was.

All the wisdom in the world, Mr. President, does not happen to reside in this body, and we had just as well make use of what little we have, and have under circumstances very favorable, so that we shall not make any very great mistake. General Grant from his grave to-day speaks to the people of the United States more powerful advice and more powerful counsel in favor of a true and wise policy in dealing with this fisheries question with the Government of Great Britain than any Senator has uttered on this floor from that day to this; and if you had accepted his advice and passed his treaty instead, as you say, of voting it down by a unanimous resolution of this body, the $5,500,000 would have been saved to your country, because those articles were canceled, and the bitterness of feeling which has been engendered by that Halifax award and the unfortunate committals which our men made in their cases as presented to the Halifax award, and all the troubles and evils we are now trying to provide against would have been saved, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] would have been ready, perhaps, now to have welcomed the dawn at least of his arrangement, his general zollverein of which he spoke day before yesterday with so much vigor and with so much affection, which he hopes to see established on this continent, so that the trade between the provinces and the Dominion of Canada and the States will be as free on this continent as the trade is now between the States of the American Union. General Grant put one hundred and forty articles into that proposed treaty; he sent the treaty with one hundred and forty classifications of articles of reciprocity.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator be kind enough to inform the Senate on what authority he states that General Grant advised the adoption of that treaty?

Mr. MORGAN. On the authority of that message.

Mr. HOAR. I do not so read the message.

Mr. MORGAN. I do. President Grant would never have sent that treaty to the Senate of the United States unless he had approved it.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, General Grant said that he had not made up his mind whether it was advantageous to the United States or not.

Mr. MORGAN. Not in every particular. There might be some amendment necessary. General Grant took the advice of this body upon the question of amending the negotiations, as every President does who comes here and takes our advice about it, and this is the first time that the Senate of the United States have ever refused to give it, so far as I know. Treaties have been acted upon during this present term of Congress, quite a number of them, in which we have undertaken to advise the President that he had not got the treaty exactly right, and we have put words and sentences and clauses into the treaty by way of amendment. But we have come to that day of wisdom, of dogmatism, that day of obedience to party caucuses, when the Senate of the United States does not feel at liberty any longer to amend a treaty or to discuss an amendment, but must take it in solido and receive it or we must reject it, one or the other.

Then, Mr. President, was it not in 1870—I forget the precise date—when the Republican party in the Congress of the United States having a controlling and an overwhelming majority in both branches voted to put fresh fish on the free-list? If they believed that the only way to protect the fishing industry and build up this new naval establishment, that the Senator from Ohio has discovered equal to West Point or Annapolis as he says, was by protective duties, why did they repeal the tariff on fresh fish? They made that overture to Great Britain themselves without even being requested to do it, so far as I know; and now they clamor against this treaty because they say that it is a treaty which is intended to compel, to force the Government of the United States into repealing the duty on salt fish. I believe the product of that duty is $379,025.05. That is my recollection of the revenue we get from it annually now. That is what we get; and the Senators in this body are trying to make this world believe that all of this consideration and contention on the part of Great Britain, all of this harassing construction of the treaty of 1818 and the administration of it by the provincial courts is intended to compel us to give up that $379,025.05, to give to that magnificent government this small amount of annual stipend in the way of taxation upon salt fish.

We let fresh fish in free of duty. Why raise this paltry sum annually by the tax on salt fish? And grave Senators are here trying to persuade the people of the United States that it is that little motive, that small, inconsiderable, contemptible sum of money, when considered in respect of the financial power and ability of this Government and the Government of Great Britain, which is the source of all this trouble, that that is what we are contending for. The Senator from Maine informed us when I put the question to him that the repeal of the duty on salt fish would settle this question instantly. There is the category we are in.

Mr. President, when we get the speech on this subject after the Senator from New York has finished his remarks and I have the opportunity of seeing all that he has said and a chance to make some comments upon what he has said, I hope to be able to convince even some of the Senators on that side that we are not prepared just at this moment and under the exigencies of the present situation to consider the subject with that judicial impartiality which belongs to it and which its importance demands at our hands, and that we should deal with it in the same manner we have with some other questions, postpone it to a time when party heats, and party hopes, and party aspirations are retired from view to some extent, when the Senate of the United States would have an opportunity to consider this great and grave and serious question in the light of a pure and better atmosphere than that which prevails in this body at this moment.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, one word in reply to the Senator from Alabama. The Senator says that the Republican party put fresh fish on the free-list; that there is nothing left to-day but salt fish; that the duties on salt fish amount to $200,000 or $300,000 a year. The duties removed in 1878 were $690,000 that year alone under the treaty of 1871, and they would amount to over a million dollars now in all human probability.

Then, again, when the Republican party put fresh fish on the free-list there was no conception of the present condition of things in this country. When fish were put on the free-list under the item "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption," it was understood that that meant fish, fresh, for immediate consumption—taken to-day and used to-morrow or the next day. But since that time there have sprung up under the inventive genius of this country refrigerator cars and refrigerators on every fishing vessel.

This method of freezing the fish and keeping them on board the vessels themselves for two months at a time is now in vogue, and to-day you can take on the Banks a cargo of halibut, you can keep them on that vessel for two months, you can land them in Gloucester, you can send them to Boston frozen, packed in ice; you can put them into the great refrigerators of the Boston market, you can keep them three months there, you can take them from that great refrigerator and put them on the refrigerators in the cars, and you can land them in two thousand nine hundred and eighty counties of this Republic in as good and perfect condition as if they had been salted or smoked. Now, I say when fish for immediate use were put on the free-list it was never dreamed that these fish would be transported all over the United States and kept for six months.

Then, again, they have discovered processes within the last five or six years by which fish in a few moments' time can be frozen as solid as rock and you can not cut them at all. The only thing you can do is to break them as you would a block of ice, and those fish are preserved in immense factories in the provinces to-day and are poured into our country as the needs of the market seem to justify their doing. They go as cheap freight and find on the Pacific coast at any time a fit market. Those salmon can be sold readily. I have been in a mill there that freezes thousands and tens of thousands of tons every year. It never was dreamed that these fish would come in free of duty, and my judgment is that the Treasury Department is responsible for that construction.

For instance, it was first applied, I think, at Gloucester. A load of halibut came into Gloucester. The collector insisted that they must pay duty because they were frozen halibut and had been on board vessel then for over a month. The duty was imposed, it was paid, and an appeal was taken to the Treasury Department, and the Secretary of the Treasury determined that under the clause "fresh fish for immediate use" that cargo of halibut must be admitted free of duty. The duties were remitted, but as happens almost always with halibut that portion of a halibut sold for use fresh is the white. The portion which is smoked or cured is what is called the gray. Some halibut is called "gray halibut," but nearly all halibut will have some gray. The portions that are gray are the portions that are smoked and cured. The moment the decision came from the Treasury Department that this cargo of fish in Gloucester was free of duty, one-half of the whole cargo of fish was cured in the city of Gloucester itself. There it was then cured fish free from duty, and then notice was given to the Secretary of the Treasury that one-half of that whole cargo was cured in the city of Gloucester, and immediately the Secretary of the Treasury reimposed the duty and collected it on one-half that cargo. I say there is no sense in any such proceeding as that. The construction of the Treasury Department ought to be that fish taken fresh and used immediately is fresh fish, but not where they are kept on board a vessel for a month, then in a Boston refrigerator for a month more, and then sent all over the United States.

What is the result of this? The result is that the fresh-fish market of the United States to-day is worth more to Canada than the salt-fish market of the United States. The result is that Canada by means of transporting fish over the railroads into this country is controlling the fresh-fish market of the United States.

Now, what should be done? A construction by Congress should be put upon that provision, or else a duty should be imposed upon fish that are preserved by freezing, just precisely as if preserved in any other way; and why should you not do it? Canada has double the duty on salt fish, the duty against your fish, that you have on salt fish against hers, and Canada has a duty on all the fresh fish taken into Canada against the United States of America to-day. There is no pretense of taking it off, and she never has made any pretense of taking it off. What right has she to complain that we have that duty upon salt fish when we have none upon fresh fish and she has doubled the duty upon salt fish and has a duty upon fresh fish, too, as against us?

Now, I should like to inquire if the Senator from Florida is prepared to go on to-day.

Mr. CALL. I would prefer not to go on to-day.

Mr. FRYE. It clearly will not do for those who believe that this treaty ought to be acted upon at this session of the Senate to allow one speech a day on the fisheries treaty, or one-half a speech a day on the fisheries treaty, and those who want action on this treaty will be compelled before a great while to insist that the discussion of this treaty shall proceed to the exclusion of all other business. I do not like to do it to-day; I do not like to do it when the weather is so fiercely hot as it is, and when we have sat here listening to two or three speeches in three or four hours to-day; but certainly the time must come, and it must come very shortly, too—I will not give notice now when, but it must come very shortly when this must be continued to the end in some way or other.

Mr. MORGAN. We are conducting this debate this afternoon a little irregularly, because there is only two-thirds of the speech of the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] completed.

Mr. FRYE. I think the Senator from Alabama is entirely mistaken in what the Senator from New York said. The Senator from New York said that he had concluded all the speech he intended to make now, but that he understood the Senator from Alabama to say that when the treaty came up to be considered by articles the Senator from Alabama then intended to discuss the articles, and that he would reserve what he had to say on the articles of the treaty until that time.

Mr. MORGAN. I asked the Senator from New York before he left the floor if he desired to retain it, and he said yes.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator misunderstood him then. He said he did not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from New York to yield the floor on the treaty.

Mr. EVARTS. I thought I was not misunderstood. I did not feel that I could proceed with a further discussion to-day, and I had reached an inquiry of a critical examination of the articles of the treaty itself and at the conclusion of other topics of consideration that as I understood a critical examination of the articles would be made after a vote on the question of whether the consideration should be put over, and I understood the Senator from Alabama to assent to that proposition.

Mr. MORGAN. Did the Senator from New York yield the floor?

Mr. EVARTS. And then I yielded the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not so understand.

As I remember, Mr. President, the language of the act of 1870, if I am correct in the date, it was "fresh fish for immediate consumption."

Mr. FRYE. That is it.

Mr. MORGAN. That subject underwent a very complete examination by the Secretary of the Treasury, I suppose, before 1885. He must have done it before 1885. I know the Secretary of the Treasury in 1885 or 1886 sent to Congress, in a communication addressed to the House of Representatives, a very full discussion of the difficulties of the decision made in that matter. But at all events, that same language is carried into the tariff of 1883. The Republicans had the majority in this body in 1883, and the language of which the Senator from Maine complains, and which he says has received an improper interpretation, the same language was in the act of 1870, "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption."

It does occur to me in a matter of this great magnitude, and one that is brought up now to disturb the relations between this and a foreign country, that somebody might have got an opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the proper interpretation of that act by this time; but no effort of that kind seems to have been made, and the Senator from Maine insists that the meaning of these words has become inapplicable to the existing state of fishing because the process of freezing halibut and other kinds of fresh fish has been of recent introduction. It was introduced before 1883. That process is much older than 1883; and yet the Republican party went through the tariff in 1883 and put the same language in that as was in the act of 1870, and that in the face of the fact that fish were being imported from Canada in large numbers of tons every season, fresh and frozen.

Now, I reassert the proposition that the Republican party has been responsible for the introduction of the fresh fish into the act of 1870, and as far as General Grant could make it responsible it was responsible for the introduction of it into the proposed treaty which failed in 1874. They made the proposition to introduce it in the treaty of 1871, the treaty of Washington, and then they put it again into the tariff law of 1883. After that party has made these overtures, these demonstrations, these concessions upon a subject which the Senator from Maine says is of far more importance than the duty on salt fish, I do not understand how it is that you clamor against the Democratic party for stating to you that we do not believe the motive of this action on the part of Canada is to get rid of the tariff on fish. But if that can be assumed, if that can be alleged, if that is the actual motive, how has it been treated in this negotiation? When a proposition of that sort was mooted amongst the negotiators, Mr. Bayard declined it absolutely and informed the British authorities that our treaty rights and our treaty regulations were not to be in the slightest degree connected with the duty and power of Congress to modify the revenue laws of this country, its tariff laws, or anything of that sort, whenever they chose to do it.

The fifteenth article of the treaty might just as well be stricken out of it as not, so far as the treaty is concerned, because until the Congress of the United States by a law has repealed the duties on the articles named there—fresh fish, fish-oil, and whatever other articles are named—that article of the treaty can have no effect whatever.

So I think a little further examination of the facts connected with this treaty will show that there is a false clamor about the real motive of the Canadians in respect of this matter.

Mr. DAWES. What do you think their motive is?

Mr. MORGAN. I think their motive, first, is one of jealousy growing out of the old offense of one hundred years ago, from that time unto this. I think one motive is to get back from us what they received under the treaty of Washington, pretty broad reciprocal trade, and I think the Canadian merchants would like very much indeed——

Mr. DAWES. You refer to the treaty of 1854?

Mr. MORGAN. The treaty of 1854, I mean. I think the Canadian merchants would like very well indeed to take some of the trade from Boston and Portsmouth, and perhaps from Portland, in equipping vessels, in fitting out vessels, in supplies, and in a great many things. I think the Canadians would like very much indeed to have a part of that trade from our northeastern coast, and I think that those are very strong motives. But beyond that we can not deny to those people sensibilities like our own; and when they believe sincerely as we do that they have got rights, they are not a people that we expect to see surrender them absolutely because we differ from them in opinion.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator's theory is right, I should like to have him explain why it breaks out always the moment that our markets are closed.

Mr. MORGAN. There are two reasons for that.

Mr. DAWES. But suppose the markets are open?

Mr. MORGAN. There are two reasons for that, Mr. President. In the first place the Canadians, like ourselves, consult their own interests. They are very apt to do so, and when they find that we are not disposed to have reciprocal trade, to give them the advantages of dealing with us in a pretty free, liberal way, they naturally become a little bit conservative in their action. More than that, there are certain men in this country who are trying to compel the Congress of the United States to reinstate the duty on fresh fish. They are trying to reverse the action of the Republican party on that question. They are trying to coerce the Government of the United States to go back and restore the duty on fresh fish. And so, whenever treaty arrangements have expired and a pretext is offered, there are men always ready on hand for the purpose of raising a row. The history of this country bears me out in that, and Senators have arisen on this floor and predicted that within five or six weeks' time difficulties would arise over there, and sure enough they came; and I venture the prediction this afternoon that when you have rejected this treaty it will not be three weeks until difficulties will arise, and they will arise out of a state of preparation now made for the purpose of involving this country in trouble with the Canadian authorities.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator agree with the Secretary of State and Mr. Phelps as to the motive that will be behind this when it breaks out again?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know what motive that may be.

Mr. DAWES. Has not the Senator heard it several times?

Mr. MORGAN. If I have, I have forgotten it. Will the Senator repeat it?

Mr. DAWES. The Senator's Secretary of State and Mr. Phelps have stated in official documents that the purpose of all the trouble is to procure the opening of our markets, and Mr. Phelps says in his letter to the British ministry that he expects it will break out again, and he warns the British minister that any attempt to get our markets opened in that way will fail.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, Mr. President, those are very eminent gentlemen; they have looked over this field with a great deal of care; but they do not happen to have all the responsibility on this question. As a Senator on this floor I must make up my judgment on facts and act upon them.

I doubt very much whether the Senator from Massachusetts has been entirely exact in his quotations from those gentlemen. If he has been, I do differ from them. I do not believe that the purpose of the Canadian Government is to compel us to take off the remainder of this little duty on salt fish, for it is a mere bagatelle. There is nothing in it; there is no money in it. You could throw it away every year without missing it, even out of the exchequer of the Canadian Government.

When I speak about difficulties coming I look to a political campaign that surrounds us, I look to the aspiration of politicians, I look to the fact that they can all very easily attempt to get up controversies and rows and difficulties for the purpose of putting an administration that they want to defeat and destroy in a bad attitude, in a dangerous position. I can see that, and I can see in the urgency of this case, when every man in the United States knows that it is not going to benefit the country to destroy this negotiation at this moment, when everybody here knows that the modus vivendi secured in the protocol of this treaty is securing peace between the two countries and liberality of trade and intercourse, and when every person in this country knows that the object of destroying this negotiation at once is nothing more nor less than a political object connected with the Presidential election.

Under such circumstances, Mr. President, I think that it behooves us to look carefully around us. This Committee on Foreign Relations and the honorable Senator who has just left the floor, one of our greatest and most experienced statesmen, has offered nothing in the place of this treaty—nothing at all. He goes back to the retaliation law of 1887 without approving its application to the present, and pooh-poohs and treats with contempt the idea that there may be embroilment or war between these countries growing out of the fisheries.

One of the honorable Senators did me the distinguished honor of pronouncing me a silly man because I happened to make allusion to the fact that a war might grow out of a question like this. Well, I may be silly, Mr. President, but I have seen enough of war to be afraid of it. Perhaps the Senator from Massachusetts has not. I have seen enough of bloodshed between brethren in this country here to understand that when blood is shed between Englishmen and Americans who belong to the same stock, there are going to be a great many people killed and great destruction done. There is not much to be gained by either side of that stock, and I believe that the people of Great Britain have got just as keen a sense of honor and of duty to their government as we have.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator from Alabama allude to me?

Mr. MORGAN. I do.

Mr. HOAR. In the first place I wish to disclaim having pronounced that sentence.

Mr. MORGAN. You said you would do it but for the fact that you had some acquaintance with my record here.

Mr. HOAR. I said nothing about the Senator being silly. I said if it were not for my respect for the Senator from Alabama I would pronounce the suggestion that there was any danger of a war with England growing out of our existing difficulties and our insisting that we should have the same rule applied to our fishermen that we applied to hers, as supremely silly.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, Mr. President, if the Government of Great Britain, that has made a great many complaints against our people—I will produce them when the proper stage of the case comes up—if the Government of Great Britain, that has made these complaints and sent them to our Government from time to time of trespasses committed by our fishermen upon their ports and against their laws and for violations of the treaty, should pass an act of Parliament or bring in a report of a leading committee of Parliament, which report should be ratified and confirmed by the vote of that body, either sub silentio or by an act of open vote, and in that way they should declare that the time for negotiations with the United States of America about the fisheries business had passed, and that it was not a fit subject for negotiation, and that we had a law upon our statute-book which authorized retaliation and we intended to resort to that, what then? You would hear the kettledrums rattling over every neighborhood in the United States by the time that message got distributed through the telegraph. We should not mistake it. We need not blind our eyes with the thought that they mistake it. They do not mistake it.

You will find another thing about it. There is an old backbone of the Andrew Jackson spirit in the Democratic party of this country left pretty strong and pretty broad.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to see it.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no doubt you would be glad to see it after passing through a little sackcloth and ashes for bringing on the row. I have no doubt the Senator would thank Andrew Jackson in his heart for having redeemed the honor of this country in the battle of New Orleans after our troops had been whipped all over the North. I think he would feel more gratitude to the Democratic party. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me——

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to say further that this element is not going to make a foolish quarrel, but when we get into a quarrel, right or wrong, we are going to stand by our country and we mean business by it. You may mean a joke, you may mean some traffic, some swapping of knives, some bargain in open market, some chaffering about a little contract that you can beat the British people or the Canadian people at, but we mean business; we mean to execute the laws of this land just as they are on the statute-book, but we mean also, as the President has done, to resort to his high constitutional powers as a negotiator to make a negotiation and refer it to the Senate of the United States as the negotiators in the second degree for them to consider, and then after the negotiation has closed and that makes the act of Congress what it never was before in principle and spirit, mandatory, it will be obeyed. And yet when they expect it to be obeyed there comes up a long howl of discontent because the President will not pledge himself to the American Fisheries Union in advance that he will limit the retaliation to fish. No, sir; it is a broad American question and Congress deals with it in what is alleged to be a broad way; I think myself in a sort of cheap way considering the outcome of it.

As I remarked the other day, if we had to deal with poor little Venezuela on such a subject for a moment, we would provide men and means to send down there to choke the money out of her that was due to our citizens, as we believe. But Congress passed an act in which everything was left to the discretion of the President of the United States, and because he saw proper to enter into a negotiation and send it here, he, in the National Republican platform, is accused of pusillanimous cowardice, and his administration and this great party of five and a half millions of voters who stand by him—and it may run up to eight millions, and I expect it will before we get through with this next election—are so stigmatized.

We do not intend to have any mincing of words about this. The people of the United States shall understand what the issue is and how it is treated here, and long lecturers on the history of this country who seek to interpose their power and their authority to the supplanting of all the constitutional powers of the President of the United States and of our diplomatic authorities will find that there is something more in this than the mere rehash of old historical reminiscences or political platitudes or cheap poetry—something more in it than that.

Here comes the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] making a little bed for us to fall on after this treaty has been disposed of. He steps out, and passing around the Committee on Foreign Relations—and I am very glad he did—and passing around the President of the United States, he organizes a committee of his own selection for the purpose of doing what? Taking into consideration every relation between the people of the United States and the Government of Great Britain connected in any way with Canada. That committee will probably go to work some time next year; but it will be a very convenient little reference to make after this treaty has been beaten down by a political caucus, to say, "we have organized a committee and we are going to take the field, and just wait until you hear from us, and then you will find that American interests are all protected and taken care of." We can not afford to trust the Committee on Foreign Relations with JOHN SHERMAN at the head of it; we can not afford to trust the President of the United States and the Senate as the treaty-making power, but we must have a select committee led by the Senator from Massachusetts, who has already nominated to this body five wise men and negotiators, three of them employed counsel in cases, hired counsel, and have been for months and months. The Senator from Massachusetts is going out with his committee for the purpose of rectifying and fighting out and saving the honor of the country, its interests, and its rights in every particular. This has not escaped attention. We made no objection to it. If we can keep the country out of war or out of trouble by referring to him and his committee the settlement of these questions, God speed him in his work.

I am willing to accept almost any alternative that can be presented now rather than encounter the difficulties which must supervene after this treaty is laid upon the table or defeated in the midst of a political campaign, which can be likened to scarcely anything else than a conflagration through the land—hot temper, earnest aspirations, determined effort to grasp office and power—these the most exciting motives that ever entered the human heart and especially the heart of the American people, arraying men in opposing parties against each other almost like a military array, campaigns conducted with the most scrupulous care in respect of every voter throughout the country that can be reached on the one side or the other. In this condition of public affairs anything that promises that this country shall not be plunged into trouble with a great and powerful nation like Great Britain, but shall have a chance to stop and think over it and repent of it afterwards will bring to me relief. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will have a fine time and great success and prosperity in handling, as he is abundantly able to do, better than any man who lives, this great and delicate question which we have reposed in his hands as a trust. That Senator has the most important trust confided to him that a Senator ever had in the world, and I am only sorry that it was done on his own motion.

Many substitutes are offered here. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] wants the Government of the United States, in a resolution that is now before the Committee on Foreign Relations, to make a proposition to the Government of Great Britain for the cession of Canada or any part of it that may choose to come to us, and in connection with that the regulation of a sort of zollverein between the two countries which would lead to free commercial reciprocity. Many expedients are thought of. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] the other day foretold——

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will allow me, I have not made any proposition like what he seems to have apprehended. The proposition which I had the honor to introduce to the Senate, and which has gone to the committee, is one for political union and, of course, commercial union as a natural result of that.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, the acquisition of Canada, its political union with us. The only difficulty I can see about that is that it would make fish free, which would be a bad state of affairs in the fish market! Our market would be gone. "Our market," says the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. Whose market is it? The market of the halibut ring, the fishermen's association, the combine, who use it for their own purposes, not the market of the American fishermen who in their numbers even are represented by 40 per cent. Canadians—so the papers that are read in the Senate and credited show. Is it the market of 60 per cent. of American fishermen and 40 per cent. Canadian that you are talking about?

Is it the market of twenty-eight thousand fishermen who are plying this vocation along the coasts of Massachusetts and Maine and up in the Canadian waters? Or is it the market of sixty-two thousand men who conduct the fisheries in the Southern States? Is it the market of the fishermen alone, or is it the market of the sixty millions of people who have been spoken of here, many of whom are hungry consumers of fish and glad to get it to live upon?

The fisherman gets a small, poor, mean, miserable allowance of it. He does the work. The middleman, the vessel owner, the warehouseman, the packer, the shipper, the speculator makes the money, forestalls the market, fixes the price to suit himself, and makes the people pay whatever price he pleases, and it makes no difference whether the catch is a great one or a small one, the price, as stated in the evidence before the committee with which I sat, never varies. It does not vary at all; it is always one price. The retailer always sells at the same price and will not sell for any less.

Whose market is it? Whose are these markets in the United States? They are the markets as well of the consumers as of the producers. They are the markets of the men who eat fish as well as of those who catch them, and a fair balance in all the commodities that supply this market, especially in articles of food, will perhaps teach some of our friends that the twenty-eight or twenty-nine thousand fishermen on the coast of New England who are engaged in this business are not all the fishermen in the world. As many as fifteen thousand fishermen are engaged in the interior of this country in fishing, and there are just about twice as many fishermen in the Southern States as there are on the New England coast.

But where do these complaints come from? There is not a fisherman in the United States that has a word to say except the men who go up to catch mackerel and halibut and the like in British waters or in the open seas adjacent to British waters. All of these complaints, now for seventy years, have come from one fishing interest in this country; and yet with all the bounties we have given, all the drawbacks we have given, they are not as many to-day by just about one-half as the fishermen of the South Atlantic Ocean.

I think when the people of the United States have come to look over this field with deliberation and composure, when they get into that state of mind, that political condition when they can look at their own affairs quietly and coolly, they will approve the wisdom of this treaty; they will approve it as a means of settlement far more reliable than anything that has been offered in place of it. Your retaliation is an untried experiment. This country has never attempted yet to rectify its wrongs by this measure, which stands next akin to war. We do not know how it is going to work. One thing we know beyond question, and that is that a great many of the merchants and manufacturers all along our northern border, and the railroad men who now draw large sums of money annually and monthly and daily from Canadian trade into their business, who conduct prosperous trade across the border with Canada, will find when retaliation takes place that the door is shut down and their mercantile resources will be crippled, and their creditors—for we are all going upon credit to a certain extent, at least—will become doubtful about their solvency and their ability to liquidate, and their own credit will become impaired, and there will be created in this country that which it is less prepared to stand than it ever was at any moment in my experience, a revulsion of a financial character. Then you will see commercial centers commence to oscillate and tremble, the small dealers at first will go under and then the big ones, and there is no difficulty (with a hundred and odd millions of money pouring into your Treasury as a surplus annually) in shaking the credit of this country so that thousands and thousands will fall like withered leaves in autumn.

After the panic of 1873, which was produced by circumstances much more controllable than those that will exist during this political campaign after this treaty is rejected, workshops were locked and factories closed, and every road and by-way in the whole country was filled with tramps wandering from place to place, first in search of work, and then of provisions, until the business of being a tramp actually got to be a profession in the United States, and is so to-day. That state of affairs was produced by a political convulsion that merely threw men out of employment, made them desperate, and presented no light of hope before their eyes. It is perfectly easy to do that now. Here we are paying $1,280 for a bond of $1,000, doing it by a vote of Congress, bonds that cost the men who originally purchased them not more than 50 or 60 cents on the dollar; and we are doing it for what? To prevent that congestion in the Treasury of the United States here at Washington, which, if it continues, must necessarily destroy the trade of this country, must ruin a great many people, and bring the calamities of 1873 back upon us in worse form than we have ever experienced before.

It is easy enough to destroy confidence in this country. The men of business who have large capital at stake, who have money out upon ventures and commercial paper in the hands of smaller dealers, will understand the very moment the political parties of this country have got hold of a subject like that involved in this treaty, and that they intend recklessly to disturb relations between the United States and Great Britain, and that there is but one provision remaining, and that is in the act of 1887, which requires retaliation and non-intercourse—these men looking over the field will commence to think it is better we should make ourselves a little secure and lay by something for war times. So each man will restrict his credit, will call in what his debtors owe him, will demand a mortgage for the security of his debt on this or that property, and if it breaks down the man he can go and foreclose the mortgage and get the property below its value. It is easy enough for politicians to shake this country to its center; and when once you have got it into that condition it is a very difficult thing to reclaim your feet and straighten the country up again.

The panic of 1873 lasted for a long time in this country, like the virus in a man's system which works continually to the surface and shows blotches of an ineradicable disease. The great lapse of time has not effected a cure.

Senators accuse me of having changed my attitude on this question. Why, sir, if I had ever taken an attitude upon this question or any question connected with it which should have confronted me with the troubles that I see lying right before us now, I would change it in a minute and come right out and say so, and I would say to the American people that I did that because I saw that I was mistaken and I saw that I was imperiling your rights and your liberties and your prosperity without any adequate reason. I would reverse my action and try to reclaim the blow before it lit upon the victim.

Perhaps I feel more about this than I ought to do. My conceptions of it may be distorted; they may be to a degree imaginary; but I repeat the remark I made awhile ago, if the Government of Great Britain would say these things to us which we say in this majority report, rejecting a treaty upon the ground that the time for negotiation has passed, and after abusing us to their heart's content, as Great Britain certainly has been sufficiently abused here now to answer the purpose of this coming generation, I suppose—after having abused us to their heart's content, they had said to us, "We have got an act of Parliament which repeats this act of 1887, and we intend to turn it loose on you," there can not be any doubt what our attitude would be—I speak of American people—and even the Senator from Massachusetts, with his known ability and great patriotism, with the support of the ablest committee the Senate can furnish, with all the power that we can give him, would not be able to check the trouble we are in or likely to get in. That expedient—to use the language of the immortal man whom I hope I may live until November to vote for—"won't do," Mr. President. That is too shallow. That little pretense of saving this country upon the paltry bed that the Senator from Massachusetts has built for us, with his committee to go around and investigate the condition of affairs between this country and Canada, is something that the American people are not going to rely upon. I do not believe in his ability or that of any Senator in this body or any number of Senators, by probing into the condition of things, to save us from that which will be precipitated upon us, I am afraid, sooner than we are prepared to meet it.

Mr. BLAIR. I have only a word to say, but that word must be to the effect that it seems to me perfectly apparent that if there is to be no war with England or with Canada, or with England and Canada combined, until the discussion upon the ratification of this treaty ends, then that war is certain to be postponed until the destruction of this world by fire or by glacier. I do not believe there is any approach to the remotest shadow of common sense in the recitation of this declaration of war, war, destruction of the United States, destruction of the Anglo-Saxon race, and that sort of bloody collision which seems to so constantly haunt the imagination of the Senator from Alabama. There is too much of common sense north of Mason and Dixon's line, and I think south of Mason and Dixon's line, to permit these extravagant and illusory imaginations, these bloody apprehensions of the Senator ever becoming realities.

We have some little difficulty about this fishery matter, but, as has been demonstrated by the Senator from New York this afternoon, it is of comparatively such trifling importance that there never can be failure of adjudicating the pecuniary losses which might be inflicted upon us by any conceivable violation of our treaty rights, and if there were any insult to the dignity and honor of the country, the great power we have to deal with is certainly great enough and is magnanimous enough, when it is necessary to apologize, even to do that.

But I do not apprehend any condition of that kind whatever. I have always been of the opinion that there was a time in our diplomatic history when we did miss it. I have always looked upon the treaty of Washington, which has been so lauded, as one of the great mistakes of our diplomacy. There was a time when we had a cause of war against Great Britain, which was frittered away in the pecuniary result of that treaty that I think was a national calamity. That was a time when Canada was anxious to become a component part of the United States; the mass of her people then desired it; Great Britain was ready to liberate them, and for the great cause of war which we had against her, the destruction of our commerce, the hostile, the inimical intent which she had nourished towards us all through those four bloody years, by virtue of which she had prolonged our civil war at least two years and had doubled the destruction of both sections—there was a time when we had a cause of war and were prepared to make war, and we could easily have annexed Canada by force, if need be, but we could have done it by the willing assent of her people. The opportunity passed away. Great Britain saw how nearly she came to making a mistake and Canada was organized into a Dominion, and to-day there is a rising ambition among her leading men and among many of her people to make her the great connecting link in the British Empire, which encircles the globe and holds the destiny of mankind in her hands. The thing is not so easy now as it once was.

Is was so, too, with Mexico to the south of us. Mexico was anxious for a protectorate under the United States, and we were in that condition at that time, having been in controversy with ourselves, when one hundred and fifty thousand of the soldiers of the North combined with one hundred thousand of the soldiers of the South, and a like army thus composed marching in the other direction, would easily have taken possession of these two great extremities of the continent, and we would have reconstructed the Union upon fields, if need be, of warfare upon foreign soil, and at the same time would have consolidated the continent as one forever.

We pursued a policy of peace when we had adequate causes for war, and when willing populations invited us to the north and to the south. Sir, however strange these views of the situation in the past may be, nevertheless they are those which I honestly entertain, and I believe if we had embraced those opportunities when we were ready and able to meet the world in arms, when we had a navy that had advanced to the most perfect condition of naval accomplishment and ability for naval warfare, and when we had armies sufficiently numerous and powerful to have met any force that possibly could have been sent against us by any combination of European powers, either land or naval—I say at that time we could have consolidated the continent in one, and the dream of American destiny from that date would have been fulfilled. But all that has passed away, Mr. President, and yet it is as necessary for the American people, it is as necessary for the North American continent, that that union shall be effected to-day as it ever was. I say that, in my belief, it is utterly impossible that this continent shall go on developing and developing hostile nations, with different industrial conditions prevailing, with prejudices, and hostilities, and all those feelings which may be engendered between rival and hostile nations, and which constitute the secret of the continual warfare which infests Europe and which has really destroyed that great continent; for what human being that has an appreciation of real civilization and of the desirable things of human life would become an inhabitant of the continent of Europe to-day?

I will not enlarge upon these views. I say there is a necessity for union under some federal system in which the people shall be all-powerful. Intelligent masses never make war upon each other. There should be some federal system extended over the whole of the continent, and the production of homogeneous conditions among all who are embraced under one politicel system is indispensable for the future of the North American continent. It is with that view that I think now in Canada there is a rising nation already of 5,000,000, with at least one-half or certainly one-third of geographical extent, which in all its resources and in its capacities is equal to any portion of the United States, a country where there may be and there must be in the future a nation of at least 100,000,000. I say, sir, with such a nation as that organizing on the north of us, separated from us only by an imaginary line extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast, 4,000 miles in length, every inch of which is full of the possibilities of future difficulty, and the condition of the people so different from our own in the matter of industrial production, in wages, in everything that goes to make up the condition of the mass of the people, there are ample sources of trouble and hostility in the future unless by the good sense of the people of both these countries in these earlier times something like political union can be accomplished. Of course we can go on and we can have our wars in the future—wars as between hostile nations. That is possible and it may be probable, but there must be a way of avoiding all this.

Either the promises of the millennium and the anticipations of the human race that at some time there will be relief from the horrors of warfare must be cast aside, or there has got to be a time for the initiation of this policy of peace; and I believe this nation is great enough to undertake that initiative. I believe that however undiplomatic it may be to propose or suggest something of this kind, the American nation is great enough and that the opportunity is important enough to justify the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom the resolution which I have introduced has been sent, to consider whether they may not look upon this opportunity in a larger aspect and suggest something which may lead to the consummation which every American believes to be absolutely indispensable in order that American destiny may be realized.

When will there be a better time? Will you postpone it until there are 10,000,000 people in Canada and 100,000,000 in the United States, until we have quarreled for a half century longer? When is the opportunity to come if it may not be expected to come now? Are all these promises of the prophets and of the Christian religion and of the lovers of freedom the world over to be postponed? Are they to vanish in smoke? If not, there is some practical thing which has got to be done, and I took the liberty of introducing this resolution. Nobody else is responsible for it. It may have no effect, but I thought it might set somebody to thinking. Very likely it will not affect the Senate; very likely it will not affect the press; but there are men and women all over Canada and all over the United States who will say that is the thing that ought to be done, and let somebody else take the responsibility of finding the opportunity unless this be the fitting opportunity.

The talk about war under these circumstances I think is wholly out of place. I think the Senator from Alabama is talking war for effect in this political campaign at home. I do not know of any Republican who has talked about war as the result of the rejection of this treaty. The resources of diplomacy are certainly all open, and they have not been exhausted. A pig-headed Executive is not to take the opportunity of the exercise of its just and honorable and discreet judgment on the part of the Senate to inflict upon the American people needless injury, mercantile distress and disruption, the destruction of business unnecessarily simply because he has the power. Congress has confided to him a discretion, a discretion in the direction of retaliation so far as is necessary to correct and to vindicate the injury which may be done to our rights simply in the matter of this fishery; and when it is intimated to us that he is to go further and that he is to destroy the existing industrial fabric of the United States simply because of the exercise on the part of the Senate of its just discretion by the terms of this treaty—when it is intimated he does that it is an intimation that the whole party might be banished from the country as too idle, too ignorant, or too foolish or too unpatriotic to properly exist longer under the protection of our laws.

That sort of talk has no effect anywhere in the United States, and if the Senator and his party approve of it, they will come to discover that the American people are not so thin-witted as they may imagine. We shall go on and reject this treaty undoubtedly, and we ought to be permitted to reject it without much more talk of the indications that the Senator holds up to us every time he is on his feet, that he will prolong the session until after election, that he will prolong the contest by his everlasting speeches, and that seems to be the only obstacle to the war, if there is any danger over us, that the Senator may talk until all those who can fight are dead. These intimations I would be glad, for one, to listen to no more, if I can avoid it by leaving the Chamber—and I doubt but that is the only remedy—I shall be glad to be permitted to occupy my seat and take such humble part as I can in the way of listening to what may be pertinent discussion of matters that ought to be under debate; but as to the treaty itself, I hope it may soon be disposed of.

In order that there may be no misapprehension as to the nature of the resolution which I have introduced, I ask that it be read. It means simply to furnish a basis on which England and the Dominion of Canada and the United States may find a ground of action; it means simply that the boundary of the United States on the north shall be coterminous with the north pole. So far as Great Britain is concerned, she will be better off than she is now. Who does not know that her advantages with Canada are mainly those of a commercial character? She may need transit to her Asiatic possessions. An arrangement might be made to give her that transit, to bond her merchandise from the Pacific to the Atlantic and from the Atlantic to the Pacific; let it go in cars locked up, as is the case now part way across Canada, for the mutual benefit of both countries. If some arrangement of that kind can be made with Great Britain, the alliance of friendship between the Anglo-Saxon race which would result therefrom, giving to the United States the whole continent, or so much of it as lies north of Spanish settlement and occupation, would be to Great Britain the perpetuation of her empire; and I believe in my inmost soul that any other possible solution of this difficulty will result in the dismemberment of the British Empire, for our destiny is just as sure to the north pole as is our existence.

And that must be desired by those north of the line as well as those south of the line to-day, for it is equally indispensable to them. It is utterly impossible that the Canadian country and our own should live together under existing circumstances in peace for any great length of time. How can it be with a population directly north of us, where wages are not more than one-half of what they are in the United States? I need not enlarge on the difficulties which must result and what would be the consequence to Canada were she to accede to some such invitation as this and become a part of the American Union. Every dollar of value in Canada would be two dollars the day after such a consummation, and the equalization of conditions which would result in the lifting of wages there, the lifting of values there, would not only justify but would make the abolition of the tariff which exists now between the two countries indispensable and a natural consequence for the common good.

What is the other great danger that threatens this country to-day? It comes from the South, as well as from Canada on the north. Though we are politically united the difficulty is simply because at the South there is a system of labor—passing away certainly—but there is at the South a system of labor that makes production nearly as cheap as it is to the north of us, and no tariff to protect us, with our existing industrial system at the North against it. That is what makes the difficulty between the North and the South. That is what makes the South solid against the North, and practically the North solid against the South. We are not a homogeneous people. Some time we shall be; existing causes will work that all out. When wages at the South are the same as they are at the North, when production is the same as it is at the North, then free trade between the two sections can continue to exist without resulting in political attrition; and never until this industrial condition is equalized by a homogeneous condition of the people of the two sections will this irritation cease, never will reconstruction be perfected.

But, Mr. President, this talk that I have made has come without reflection, and I do not know that the tendency of it will be good. I wish that the resolution which I introduced may be thoroughly understood, and so I ask that it be read at the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. R. 101) requesting the President to open negotiations with the Government of Her Britannic Majesty with a view to the political union of the Dominion of Canada, or any of the provinces or subdivisions thereof, and the United States, and for other purposes, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the President be requested to open negotiations with the Government of Her Britannic Majesty, in which the Dominion of Canada and the several subdivisions thereof shall be represented, with a view to the settlement of all differences between Her Majesty's Government and the United States, and especially to the arrangement of terms mutually just, honorable, and satisfactory for political union between the Dominion of Canada, or between any of the several provinces or subdivisions of the Dominion of Canada, and the United States, subject to the approval of the people of the Dominion of Canada, or of the people of any province or subdivision thereof who may be included in such arrangement, and to ratification by the United States in such manner as Congress may prescribe; such political union to be republican in form and in accord with the Federal system and the Constitution of the United States; and the negotiations may embrace such further treaties, compacts, and alliances as shall be deemed necessary for the future peace, happiness, security, and general welfare of Her Majesty's dominions and of the United States.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, when the Senator from Alabama is in the mood which possesses him this afternoon he always speaks clearly and plainly and shows what he means and what sentiments move him. In that he is bolder than many of his associates. It was impossible for him to let the discussion upon this treaty, or more immediately upon the question of postponement until December, pass without seeking and taking opportunity for advocating the free-trade side upon the only subject-matter under this negotiation where the question of protection or free trade arises. It was not possible for him to let the opportunity pass without delivering a denunciation of the protection that our statutes at present give to the fishery interests of the United States.

Mr. President, the Senator and his party have of late grown somewhat sensitive over the charge made in many places and profoundly believed by the American people that the Democratic party is un-American in its attitude, unsympathetic with American labor, and is imbued with British views and British policies and British theories. The country has not failed to take notice of this leaning of the Senator's party, and this is one reason for its great interest in the discussion upon the treaty, and the discussion develops the attitude of the Democratic party as boldly taken by the Senator from Alabama in the speech he has just made.

Here is a proposition to remove duties upon fish caught in British or Canadian vessels by British fishermen in British waters to be brought into our ports in competition with our own American-caught fish. It is not a movement called for anywhere by the American people. It is a proposition that Canada, with Great Britain backing her, came into this negotiation more in favor of and more decided upon maintaining and securing than any other one proposition involved in the controversy. Free fish was what the Canadian representatives sought and hoped for and demanded when they assembled in session with the other negotiators.

There was, as I have said, no demand for free fish in any American quarter. Six months ago the Senator from Alabama did not venture to stand up here in the Senate and argue for it, and there was no call for it anywhere. It is a plain case of an elaborated and defined British demand. It does not even come under the category of the many other industries where it is claimed by gentlemen on the other side that it is the consumer in the United States who wants free trade. So we have here an example where the destruction of one industry of ours has in terms been championed by Great Britain and has been made the subject of long-continued and elaborate negotiation, in which that power has at last succeeded in putting her proposition into the treaty, and to-day we find the Democratic party, represented by the Senator from Alabama, who is at its head on the Committee on Foreign Relations, and who in this discussion has more than any other voiced the sentiment of his party and of the President—we find him here unable to let the discussion pass without bringing out clearly the subserviency which he and his associates and the President who leads them are under to British interests and British demands.

It does not do for the Senator to belittle this industry of ours and say that but a few miles of our coast comparatively are represented by it, and that the American fishermen who are interested in this question are only a small part even of the fishermen upon all our shores. That is not the fashion that the Democratic party had in years past in dealing with the interests of American citizens, great or small. The number of seamen who were impressed by British ships and carried into the British service, the question that more than any other gave rise to the war of 1812 with Great Britain, was not one in one hundred thousand of the American people, and yet it was the pride of the party in power then, from which the Senator claims lineal descent, to espouse the cause of the seamen who had been torn from the decks of our vessels and put upon British ships, few as they were in number. That was the fashion of the Democratic party in that day.

It was not a great strip of ground that lay between the Rio Grande and the Nueces that gave rise to the war with Mexico. It was not needed to the integrity of the American people, or to the symmetry of our boundary, or to the happiness or welfare of the American people; but the moment that General Arista with the Mexican army crossed the Rio Grande the whole American people, with a Democratic administration, flew to arms and the country determined that, whatever territory was involved, great or small, the honor and the dignity of the flag should be maintained. It was only a handful of men that held that beleaguered fort in Charleston Harbor twenty-seven years ago; and yet when the Senator from Alabama and his associates fired upon that body of men the whole loyal North rose as grandly as though an hundred thousand of our soldiers had been assailed.

The Senator can not put this question out of sight nor cast it under his feet because this industry does not represent a numerous portion of the American people. It is an industry that represents men of hardy lines of pursuits that require manliness and intelligence, that has trained men to stand in the defense of the country, and it is only—and I speak it as an American citizen with a sense of shame—it is only within this last year that an American administration has been found that has been willing to trample this industry and the people engaged in it under foot and to send out long homilies and inspire its defenders here to make long speeches in favor of the side of our competitors, the British people. As I have said before, it is fortunate that the country watches this debate and appreciates the position of the Senator from Alabama and of his party.

Mr. MORGAN. Nothing is to be made, Mr. President, by any ingenuity of Senators who mistake the attitude of a Senator on this floor, because the RECORD is here to show. I appeal to that RECORD, and I ask Senators to look over it in the morning to see whether I have made any statement that I desired or expected the repeal of the duty on salt fish, or that in the tariff discussion that is to take place in the Senate very soon I expect to make any motion of that kind, or that any Democrat expects to make a motion of that kind. But I referred to the insignificant amount of money that we got from the duty on salt fish, after the Republican party had made fresh fish free, as not being a sufficient inducement to provoke Great Britain or Canada into all of this series of wrongs and outrages of which we complain—of many of them very justly. I merely referred to that. I made no argument in favor of free fish, and never stated the proposition that I was in favor of taking that duty off fish. I would pass laws, if I knew how to do it, to give to the fishermen the benefit of this tariff on fish instead of giving it to the middlemen, to the men who pickle and prepare fish for market and who forestall and monopolize the market, in preference to giving it to the halibut rings or any other rings in that region, or "combines," of which there are quite a number, whose history has been spread upon the records of this Senate and are now in print and can be read of all men.

Indeed, I would, if I could, distribute the benefits of this tariff bounty that we give to the fishermen so that the poor laboring men who haul the lines over the deck of the ship may get some benefit out of it.

I have not said one word about repealing the duty; I have not intimated that I would vote for it. I doubt very much if I would vote for it. But I will go with anybody who has the ingenuity to devise some plan by which the money which we get out of the duty on fish, and by which I suppose of course the price is enhanced, shall go to the advantage of the poor fisherman who treads the deck and stays with his boat in fogs and in the night fishing, and who encounters all the perils of a terrible sea.

I should like to do that; but the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] can not misrepresent me, because the RECORD shows exactly what I have said. He has set up a man of straw this evening to exhibit his skill in knocking it down. There are better targets than that in the Senate. Arguments have been delivered here, facts have been stated time and time again, and if the Senator would indulge himself in meeting the arguments or in controverting the facts that we state instead of imputing positions and attitudes to Senators which they never took, he would have quite enough to do. His abilities would not be overtaxed, probably, but he would have plenty of work in this hot weather.

For my statement with regard to the number of fishermen in the country and the manner in which they are distributed, I turn to page 5 of a speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who, I have no doubt, took very great pains to get his figures correct, and I will read them to the Senate:

> Professor Baird estimates the number of persons employed in our fisheries in 1880 as 131,426. Of these 101,684 were Americans. The value of the fisheries of the sea, the great rivers, and great lakes was over $43,000,000. The fisheries of New England engaged 37,013 men. The South Atlantic States engaged 52,418 men; the Middle States, 14,981 men; the Pacific States and Territories, 16,803.

What I said about that was this, that I and my colleagues from the Southern Atlantic States and the Gulf States represent a good many more fishermen than the Senators from Maine and Massachusetts. But, I repeat, after all the bounties that have been afforded, after all the drawbacks that have been allowed, the complaints that come to us and have come to us for the last seventy years about the fisheries have all come from that quarter of the country. I am disposed to be entirely just with them, and, more than that, I am disposed to be bountiful to them. I am disposed not only to applaud their valor in what they have done for us in the past, but to look forward with great hopefulness to that great resource for seamen in our coming controversies, if we are ever to have any, upon the ocean.

But, Mr. President, at the same time I want to take care of the rest of the people of this country, and I do not want to see any injustice done. I do not think that it is our business here to inflict an injustice upon one man that we may raise bounties or benefactions for another. I have never considered that that was within the purview of my constitutional authority. If protection is a doctrine of the Constitution of the United States, as a great many good Democrats argue that it is, I insist that it means protection as well for the consumer as for the producer—protection for both; not the robbery of one class for the enrichment of another.

I have not advanced any theory or doctrine on the subject of free trade here this day. I have said nothing about it. I merely adverted to the fact that these gentlemen who profess to be the friends of the fishermen, and who seem to spend the better part of their lives in utterances of sympathy and respect and declarations of their proud appreciation of fishermen, nevertheless come here and in this Senate year after year, in 1870 and 1883, pass and continue to pass, long after the freezing process has been discovered and all that, a tariff law which makes "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption," free of duty, and that brings in probably in value and in bulk and in weight as much as two-thirds of all the fish that are landed from British decks or Canadian decks in the ports of the United States.

They flourish here, trumpeting their own praises and magnifying their own glory in the eyes of the poor fishermen as their warm and staunch and unfailing friends, and yet they put fish on the market free, fresh fish, and help to rob these poor fellows out of the benefit, as they claim it is, of the tariff, that they are now saying Great Britain wants to have removed. What did Great Britain do to the Republican party to make them put "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption," upon the free-list, I should like to know?

Sir, the day for false pretenses has gone. The glamour that hung over all questions in the United States for forty or fifty years before 1860, that warped every man's political attitude without reference to reason, and shut him off from an investigation of the true merits of questions affecting the economical condition of the country, has passed away, and now we meet facts and questions face to face, and the American people are beginning to understand them. The Senators who voted to put fish on the free-list will come to their accountability to the men they say they have been trying all this time to help.

It is because I happened to open a little door of light upon that question that I am charged here by one Senator with being an ex-rebel, and by another with being a free-trader. I am charged with being the leader of the Democratic sentiment in this country and in the Senate upon the subject of the tariff, and it is said that I have taken a position here that the Republican party did right in putting fish on the free-list. I denounce you for it. It is an act of arrant hypocrisy on the part of the Republican party. A Senator says I speak plainly, and I do. It was done for the purpose of currying favor with the lords who rule the fish market in the Northern States, and yet pulling the wool over the eyes of poor fishermen to make them believe that these men are their friends in the name of God!

That is the same thing that is done all the time by this party that has paraded itself before the land as the friend of the laboring man, the friend of the artisan, the friend of the spinner, the friend of the weaver and the dyer and the manufacturer of the goods that enter into commerce. They know that they are not their friends. They know that they are the obedient servants of the combines and trusts and large operators upon heavy investments of capital, who have their organizations to send their literature through this country broadcast, and who make a pharisaical and hypocritical pretense that they are the friends of the laboring man, when the truth is that they are dominated and controlled by the great lords who rule the land and live upon the tops of the high hills.

I repeat, the time for the real consideration of questions between the people of the United States has come. If I was a rebel soldier, as it has been intimated this evening and at various times before, I was the same sort of man then in one respect that I am here. I was an honest devotee to what I believed was right. I was not afraid to think and I was not afraid to fight for it. But some of the men who accuse me, some who even said that my life was a forfeit, perhaps that it ought to have been taken, did not give me or any of my comrades an opportunity to take their lives on the field of battle. They did not come in reach when the issue was up and the question was one worth while talking about.

I contemn and despise men who have got such ideas, who stood out from under their own flag, who hid themselves in bomb-proofs and secured positions where their lives were safe and filled their pockets in the mean time, and when they came out the war was over and they came to places of prominence to which their talents entitle them, I admit, and then they take it out in fighting the battles which they never raised a gun in, and did not dare to tow a line or test their mettle with the enemy that they now so despise and so abuse.

Sir, I am here with a commission from one of the sovereign States of the American Union, and as good a State as there is in it, with as good a population as there is in any State in the American Union, a people whom I trust, whom I love and am proud to represent, a people upon whose lips the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] can not cause the curl of scorn by anything he chooses to say. He is at perfect liberty to say what he pleases, it will scarcely receive a reply from anybody, about the labor situation and the ignorance in the Southern States.

My God, Mr. President, if we had to go to school to him to learn lessons of wisdom from him this world would grow into a millennial state, I suppose, very quickly. But we have never come to that humiliating position where we have had to receive any instruction from a Senator who can offer such a batch of nonsense as has been read this evening about the United States Government dealing with the Government of Great Britain for the cession of Canada!

What credit can the British Government give to that set of resolutions or to the American Senate, in which it has been offered and debated, except to say that the Senator from New Hampshire did not know what he was talking about and his party is not responsible for what he says? What else can be said about it? Who would undertake a negotiation of the kind presented in that resolution with any government in the world? Who would scarcely undertake it with the Indians among the five civilized tribes who are subject to us, and whom we have the right, or at least the power, to mold according to our own will and wish?

After all of this, that Senator undertakes to make comments upon the social condition, the progress, the material condition, the future prospect of as proud and grand a constituency as the sun shines on in its diurnal revolutions. For there are no people who have a better constitution of local government than the people of Alabama. There are very few people who pay less taxes per capita for the support of their government. There are no people more frugal in the administration of their public affairs. There is scarcely a people in the world, I think, who vote more money for public schools than they do, or for the support of the entire State government, including the interest on the public debt. They are a people who live at home, who take care of themselves and their families, who pursue their own methods of religious instruction and their forms of education, discarding all the patent outside arrangements that have been made for them by the invention of men who have had nothing else to do. They know how to serve God and their country, how to raise their families in industry and respectability. They have already come to the front, and have taken out of the hands of many older and wealthier communities industries and manufactures of the most valuable character, and it has been done upon their own capital.

There is scarcely a Northern capitalist in the whole State. More than that, their furnaces and rolling-mills are conducted by their own men. It is the genius of the people of Alabama that revolves in the wheels which are set in motion there and makes the products which are now stripping from Great Britain itself some of its most valuable staple productions, iron in different forms, pig-iron, and as we proceed, with land at low rates—not labor at low rates, for the laborer in Alabama gets dollar for dollar what the laborer of the same grade and class gets in any State in the American Union——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator inform me what are the wages of the agricultural laborer in Alabama per day?

Mr. MORGAN. There is no hiring of agricultural labor by the day.

Mr. HOAR. How much are the wages in the way you do hire? Do you hire by the month?

Mr. MORGAN. We usually hire our laborers by the year. I suppose 90 per cent. of the agricultural laborers in Alabama get a share of the crop, just like your fishermen get a share of the catch.

Mr. HOAR. But the Senator said the wages are the same as at the North?

Mr. MORGAN. Our laborers are not hired in any other way than that I have stated. I have really no market to which I could go.

Mr. HOAR. Then it seems when the Senator from Alabama said that the working people got as good wages in Alabama as they do in Vermont he did not know anything about it.

Mr. MORGAN. Perhaps I do not; and what I do not know of course the Senator from Massachusetts does, for he knows everything, whether another person knows anything or not.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator said he did not know.

Mr. MORGAN. I bow with humble submission to the superior knowledge and especially to the great assumption of the Senator from Massachusetts, who seems to flatter himself with the idea that he is almost omnipotent, and that there is no end to the cutting edges of his wit.

The Senator from Massachusetts asked me a question which I answered in a very correct way. I said I did not know, because there was very little hiring of agricultural labor. Most of the agricultural work is done by what we call the cropping system or on the shares, and there is no market for labor there to which I can go in dollars and cents by the day and week and month and be correct about it. If the Senator should ask me about labor in the iron establishments, in the factories, mechanical labor, and the like of that, I could point him to many a negro man in Alabama who earns his $5 a day and gets it puddling. The wages of negroes in different vocations connected with the production of iron are quite up to those of the white people, unless it may be some man who is extraordinarily skilled, as the conductor or manager of a furnace, the keeper of a furnace, or something of that kind. But in all the grades and ranges of labor that they are capable of performing successfully the colored people get just as much wages as the white people.

We have to pay a little more wages in that country, because there is some prejudice as to the association of white and black people together. They are continually in quarrels with each other and kill each other, and a white man does not like to take his family from the North down into a nest of negroes. He does not like to take his family down there and put them in the same quarter of the town or as a next-door neighbor, and have his little girls working in factories with negro boys and negro girls. The white man from the North does not like it. He does not like it as much as the white man from the South does, because we understand the negro better than the white man in the North does. Therefore we have to pay a little higher inducement than they do in the North.

We have plenty of land, a genial, beautiful climate, waters bursting from the hills in every direction, crowned with most magnificent forests, yielding a great variety of productions, fruit of various kinds and of great abundance. A common poor man, as he is called, a man who has a family to support and take care of, can go down there and get from three to five or ten acres of land and he can make a living which a great many of the nabobs of the North would envy him in. If such a nabob would just have a chance one time to go to the table and sit down at the snowy cloth and see the decent wife presiding there he would envy him.. A great many of those laboring men live better than your men who are worth $50,000. I have been at your tables, and I know how it is. I have been at theirs, too; and I say they live better. It is a better country. God has favored it more than He has any other country in the world. He is evidently in love with it, and I think one of the peculiar evidences of the ways in which He has manifested His love for us is to give the Northeastern Yankee a holy prejudice so that he will not come among us; he keeps away. Our population grows; the West comes to us; the Central States come to us, and a good many Yankees come too—New England fellows. They are all welcome, but still they will make mischief wherever they go. I never knew one to fail in my life, if he had the best chance in the world, to get up some mischief. Being a peace-loving and an order-loving people we are afraid of you, and would rather you would stay at home.

We do not feel so much interest down South in this treaty. It is the rarest thing that you hear it spoken of down there. Our ports are generally so shallow that they can not be entered by big foreign ships. We have not any great cities right in the range of bombardment to be burned down. We have not much money upon this question, but the moment you get to fighting, if you ever should, we would be supplying you with a great deal of needed products—iron, steel, timber, cotton, cotton goods. I do not see but what we could make money out of a war with Great Britain; I think we could. I think our time would then come to do what you have done, to stay at home. We would stay at home, many of us, the old fellows, and we would do just as you did during the late war, get rich.

I do not see that our people down there have any peculiar interest in this matter, but while I am in the American Senate I am not going to consent to be a participant in the shedding of one drop of American blood as long as there is a just and honorable way of escape from it. That is exactly the way I feel about it. I would not make one widow even in order to make the Senator from Massachusetts President of the United States, and that would be a great thing for this country. I would not do it to gratify the zeal of any politician. If there is any one thing that I have a sovereign contempt for it is a man who will deal in a reckless way with the sacred interests of his country and with her affairs in connection with foreign countries when the situation becomes intricate, delicate, and dangerous, when there is a chance open to him of dealing in a fair, manly, open, just way, and arriving at a better conclusion than you can ever reach by war.

I am for this treaty, but not because I believe it will produce free fish. Senators who argue the treaty in that direction know that it will have no influence at all upon the production of free fish. That is no motive or inducement to me in the world for voting for the treaty. I would willingly agree to strike out the fifteenth article, but I am for the treaty because I believe it to be the best adjustment of the contention between the two parties. Without saying which is absolutely right or which is absolutely wrong, and admitting a fair degree of sincerity on the part of both the great contending parties, I believe that a ground has been taken by the negotiators between these parties which is just and fair.

I am very glad indeed that no man born in the South or reared there, or who ever had any affiliation with us, so far as I know, had anything to do with making the treaty. It is a Northern affair. You got one of your very ablest, and I expect one of your most patriotic men, and I dare say one of your most just and excellent men, Mr. Putnam, right from the coast, almost from the Bay of Fundy, to come into the negotiation and manage it. No slur is cast upon him; there is no imputation or impeachment of the man in the world, of his ability or his fairness, or anything of the kind; and he, living right there among those people, has concluded that it is best for them and best for all concerned that this subject should have been treated just as it is.

President Cleveland is not—save the mark—a "pig-headed" man. He is not a fool. He has been wise enough to beat your party every time he came in contact with it, and he is going to do it again so easily that you will hardly know what has happened to you. You see the hand of doom already; there is nobody who can hide it from you.

If President Cleveland had been a mere politician, if he had desired merely to make the most out of the situation, he would have done what some of the Senators on that side have been doing to-day, he would have fulminated immense threats and talked about Great Britain. He would have gone into the jingo business, and when he issued his proclamation, if he should have issued one, it would have included nothing in the world but fish, and he would have plucked the little red feather that you are trying to put in your caps now as a war party, out of your caps and stuck it in his own, and beaten you worse than he is going to do in November.

But that man marches boldly and squarely along in the discharge of what he believes to be his conscientious duty to the people of the United States, and to-day Mr. Cleveland's strength consists in the fact that the people of the United States believe that he and his Cabinet are just and honest and sincere men; that they can not be swerved from the line of duty by threat or inducement; that they march boldly and straight to the front; that they serve this country with singleness of purpose, and that there is not a taint of fraud anywhere to be heard of against any man connected with the Administration.

There is the anchorage ground of Cleveland and his party. That is something that the people of the United States are not going to forget between this and November. After the years and years of constant impeachment of Executives and others in high authority in this country, until the records of Congress have become almost entirely a repository of scandal against the good fame of this land, the people of the United States find themselves under the lead of an honest, square man, a true and just man, if he is not a very polished man according to somebody's ideas. Finding themselves in the company of such a leader as that, who wants to do justice to every institution and every party and every human being in the American land, they are gratified at the result, and they feel strong in the union which he produces in their hearts. He enjoys for the first time since the convention system was inaugurated in this country the unanimous voice of the representatives of at least five and a half million voters in the land. Gentlemen may cry out against him as a pusillanimous coward, a pig-headed man, a coarse man, an ignorant man; he is the truest representative to-day of the American character that stands upon the bosom of this continent. The people know it, and they intend to sustain him in it.

That is all I have to say about politics in this discussion.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, when I used the unfortunate adjective "pig-headed," I used it with reference to the anticipated conduct of the President of the United States in case the Senate saw fit to exercise its constitutional right of rejecting this treaty, referring to the conduct to be pursued, as foretold and proclaimed by the Senator from Alabama. I have no wish to qualify any expression that I used with reference to the President any further than to not have it misrepresented by the Senator. I certainly do not wish to interfere in the slightest degree with his adoration for the President.

Of course the Constitution guaranties religious as well as civil liberty, and the Senator from Alabama can worship any fetich whatever that he chooses. It is a constitutional right; nobody would think of interfering with it; and certainly from what I know of the Senator he would naturally select just about such a god. Let him go on with his adoration, I have nothing to say about it. But equally it will be remembered that the pagan worshiper of any other idol, be it of wood or of stone, is guarantied in the same liberty by the Constitution of our glorious country. So let the Senator enjoy his worship of his supreme being exactly in the same way that we guaranty religious liberty to the Chinaman, to the pagan, or to any other man on the face of the earth, no matter what may be his form of religious belief.

I wish to call attention to a point of more importance, and that is what I conceive to be the misrepresentation based upon ignorance (for I wish to be charitable with the Senator from Alabama) in reference to the compensation which people get for work in the State of Alabama where he lives and throughout the South, of which the Senator would assume that he knows something. I undertake to say that while those who are engaged in skilled labor and who are in effect instructors in the mercantile and manufacturing pursuits of the South, in the development of the mines, of the manufacturing industries of the South, while that class of men who are substantially educators get as much as, and in some instances more than, they do in the North, because they are exercising their missionary avocation at a distance from where such people naturally would be, nevertheless the masses of the Southern people for their labor do not receive in monetary values more than one-half, or at the most two-thirds, of what is paid to corresponding citizens engaged in the same occupations at the North.

I will point to one general fact and ask Senators to account for it. I ask the Senator from Alabama to account for it, whose lip, it seems, is not, perhaps on account of its thickness, inclined to scorn, even when that sentiment ought to be exercised. I will ask him or any other Senator to account for the fact, proclaimed only a few years ago on this floor by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN], not now in his seat, and which there is no Senator here so unintelligent as not to know to be substantially the truth, and based upon census returns, that although the colored population had done the work of the State of Georgia substantially for twenty-five years since the war (and the Senator from Georgia spoke of it as a great achievement, showing the industry and the excellent condition of the colored population of the South), during all those years they had accumulated only about $6 per capita?

They had got their living, such as it was, and with all their industry, which constituted the rising industrial glory of the State of Georgia, they had contrived to save only some $6 per capita. How long would it take a man laboring twenty-five years and saving $6 to enable himself to buy and pay for a homestead of $500, which is the ordinary homestead exemption even in the pecuniarily poor State from which I come?

If there is any State in the South where the condition of the colored population is any better, I do not know it. I presume it has improved somewhat since 1880, but it is no better to-day in the State of Mississippi, it is no better in the State of Alabama, except around some of the manufacturing centers which have been built up by the intelligence and the capital of the North very largely, as the Senator knows.

I do not even undertake to impeach the intelligence and the high quality of the Southern people. The Senator does me a wrong, which I do not complain of, because it is easy for him to do a wrong, intentional it may be—he does me a wrong if he undertakes to put me in the attitude of any assault upon the Southern people. If he meant to do that he meant to do a wrong. I say the Southern people in their great interests, in my belief, could be more worthily represented on this floor, and with less talk about it, too.

The white population at the South is somewhat better compensated in the matter of wages than is the average of the colored population. In what do they get their wages? The Senator well explains the secret of the slight returns that are left after the livelihood has been secured. They get their pay off the farm; they get a share of the crop. That is what they get. What is there left? Are they paid at the "pluck-me" store? Does the planter see to it that in many cases there is a profit at both ends?

I admit, and it must be the case, that the colored man very largely is an indolent laborer. What reason has he to be otherwise? What is the good effect of hard work? Ought not twenty-five years of honest toil, during which years they have constituted the recuperative agency of the South, to have given to the Southern colored man more than six or even ten or fifty dollars per capita of savings? Look at the savings institutions of the North. Sir, in my own State the laboring men have more in the savings institutions of that little State of three hundred and fifty thousand people than there are in the entire savings-banks, I believe, of the whole South, so far as the deposits of the laboring population are concerned.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator mean to say that the market value of the labor of the colored man of the South is not adequate?

Mr. BLAIR. I do not mean to say that he is inadequately paid. I do not know what would be his adequate payment under the conditions in the South. What I wanted to say was that the colored laborer of the South is not paid in money values at the rate of the common laborer of the North. That is the issue between myself and the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. GEORGE. That may be true, but the point is this: Does the Senator mean to be understood as stating to the American people that the colored laborer does not receive for his labor in the South all that the employer can fairly pay him?

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Mississippi must not undertake to raise another issue. I have no issue with the Senator from Mississippi. I do not undertake to say that compensation at the South ought to be or can be under existing conditions what it is at the North. I too often have undertaken to say on this floor what constitutes the real cause for the great and absolute difference that exists between compensation and the cost of production at the South and the North. I have tried to explain that often. I believe neither does the employer nor the employé get at the South anything like the compensation for his efforts in the line of production that he ought to obtain, or that under other conditions he might well obtain, or that he will obtain.

Mr. GEORGE. I agree with the Senator about that, if he would attribute it to a different cause.

Mr. BLAIR. That may be. Now, my issue is with the Senator from Alabama, with his lip that never curls, not even in contempt and scorn. Mine does sometimes, and always when I think it is deserved.

I say that the laborer at the South receives pay for his work in such lines of production as are now coming in competition with the goods of Great Britain and with the goods of the North, and he receives a far less amount of compensation than does the corresponding laborer, I think, even in England, and certainly in the North. If it were not so, I ask how comes about the fact of competition? How is it that Birmingham, Ala., sells iron in Pittsburgh, Pa., unless it be that her labor is cheaper? In the name of Heaven is not the labor of the miner of Pennsylvania cheaply enough paid? Does not the raw material that comes from the bowels of the mountains in Pennsylvania come cheaply enough when the Hungarian and the foreign miner, the worst-paid labor that we have at the North, produces the raw material which goes to Pittsburgh and is operated upon in her great manufactories? Is not her raw material cheap enough? If, as the Senator says, the labor in the furnaces and in the iron works of the South is as well paid as it is at the North, and the laborer in her mines is as well paid as at the North, how is it that she sells to the North and pays transportation from her own country to the Northern market?

Mr. MORGAN. Because she has so much better resources and they are right together. That is the reason.

Mr. BLAIR. Oh, the Senator——

Mr. MORGAN. Now you have asked me a question, and I wish you to take my answer or prove that it is not so.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not object to the Senator making an answer.

Mr. MORGAN. I say it is because we have very much better resources of every kind and the resources are all together. There is very little haul to assemble them at the furnaces. An average of about 17 miles will draw the coal, iron, and limestone necessary to manufacture pig-iron, in what we call the Birmingham district, together at one hundred stations.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator's explanation is correct, how then is it that, as he says, they sell in old England to-day and are rivaling her in the cheapness of her iron production when on the Clyde all these things are within a stone's throw of each other?

Mr. MORGAN. It is because——

Mr. BLAIR. No, the Senator's explanation is not the true explanation.

Mr. MORGAN. Let me say this about the last branch: In England they have to mine away under the sea for their coal and for their iron ore, and then they have to transport it across to the shore, and it has to be hauled to the fields of consumption, which are for the productions of Alabama very largely in the far West as we call it. We sell a great deal of iron to Chicago, to Cincinnati, and St. Louis. Of course they want the benefit of the iron we produce down there to mix with other iron to make the various productions of commerce. Our iron is in demand. We can make it down there, when matters are in a normal condition in regard to the price of provisions, at a considerable profit at $10 a ton. Our furnace-men are making iron at that price now and they are all growing rich.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator ought to know the fact that if iron costs as much in Alabama as it does in Pennsylvania——

Mr. MORGAN. No——

Mr. BLAIR. Very recently I know that was the fact, and it was testified to by intelligent witnesses engaged in the work themselves.

But, Mr. President, I wish to emphasize the great fact which is overlooked at the North, and which is a fact more important to the North to-day than the existence or the modification of the tariff as between ourselves and foreign countries, that we have a vastly more expensive system of wage labor at the North than we have at the South. In our factories, in our furnaces, in our fields, everywhere the common laborer at the North is a much more expensive producer or laborer than he is at the South. There is no protective tariff, and there ought to be no protective tariff, as between the States of the Union, which are united as one political power; and unless there be within the policy of some party or of all parties a system of development pursued which shall give wealth to the producer and to the laborer at the South, and make the common people of the South largely consumers of that which they themselves produce, the competition to Northern industries from that direction will be infinitely more hurtful than anything which we have any cause whatever to expect from European shores.

That is a thought connected with the tariff discussions of the present day which is not sufficiently dwelt upon, and in connection with that, what seems to be the real issue in the minds of so many of our people, to my mind utterly disappears. We ought to pursue such a policy that when I state it as my belief that neither the employer nor the employé in the State of Mississippi or at the South generally receives as the return for his efforts what he ought to receive, the Senator from Mississippi would not rise in his seat and say that I am correct in that regard.

But, sir, he may not perhaps differ from me as to the real remedy, and I assure both the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Alabama that if I understand myself that remedy is not one which implies any belittlement or unpleasant comment whatever upon the Southern people of any race. I am the last man who would see any violent disruption of their existing institutions or their status, but as the South becomes the scene of diversified industries she ought to become the market where the benefit of that diversification shall be felt. As the manufactures grow and trade builds up manufacturing cities, the community in the vicinity of those cities should find a market for their productions largely increased in value precisely as it is at the North, because that market is at home.

Unless those who are there engaged in manufactures, in the development of these industries of diversification, have compensation, how are they to buy? What does the laboring man, what does any man get of the productions of the earth save in the form of his wages or the price at which he sells his commodities? The South never can become a great country industrially; it never can be fully developed; its condition will never be homogeneous with those portions of the North which have existed under superior advantages, until that diversification finds its market at home as well as its productions there; and that never can be until increasing intelligence of the masses of the people is attained, not simply in books, but in knowledge of the arts of production as well, when such exertion, such labor shall have received at the South compensation adequate or comparatively the same that the same class of people receive at the North. Then the South will find her market at home, and the increased production of which Senators speak will be consumed there, and there will be no interference with the market at the North, which is now no more than is necessary for the just maintenance of our own industries.

In regard to the questions of fact as to the matter of compensation, I am satisfied that I am right, and the great fact that the South is able to compete with the North in her own markets, selling all the coarser manufactures of cotton and somewhat of wool in the North and in the West to-day, is a demonstration that the cost of production is less at the South and that they are obliged to seek their market elsewhere for the reason that the people at the South are unable to purchase and to consume that which they produce at home.

There is a way out of all this, and I believe the American people will find that way; I believe the Southern people will find that way; and I believe that they will find it rapidly, and that they will lift themselves by their own naked strength as high and as rapidly to that condition by improved compensation and consumption as any other people on the face of the earth.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, August 10, 1888, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, August 9, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LADIES' SILK CULTURE ASSOCIATION OF CALIFORNIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of Agriculture, transmitting a report of the expenses and results attained by the Ladies' Silk Culture Association of California; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

DEATH OF J. K. EDWARDS.

The SPEAKER. At the request of the gentlemen composing the corps of Official Reporters the Chair will lay before the House the following communication, with the resolutions relating to the death of the late J. K. Edwards.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., August 8, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit copy of resolutions adopted by the Official Reporters of debates on the death of their late associate, James Keith Edwards.

I am, with respect, your obedient servant,

J. J. McELHONE,
Chief Corps of Official Reporters,
House of Representatives.

Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker House of Representatives.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., August 8, 1888.

The Official Reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House of Representatives, following long-established precedent, have met to express their profound sorrow at the loss by death, July 17, 1888, of James Keith Edwards, one of their associates.

He was born in Dundee, Scotland, June 11, 1829; was graduated at the University of Aberdeen with the degree of A. M.; was promoted in Canada after service as editor to the position of parliamentary reporter, and in 1869 was appointed to fill a vacancy in the corps of Official Reporters in the House of Representatives, which position he held with honor to the last.

His profession has given able men to journalism and public affairs, such as Gales, Seaton, Raymond, Hincks, Lord, and others; and in profound learning and special skill as a Congressional reporter he was equal to any.

His death at his post was the highest attestation of his devotion to his duty.

Resolved, That we, his associates, place on record in the customary mode the expression of our deep sorrow at his loss and our appreciation of his personal integrity, his generous spirit, his professional skill, and his large knowledge of parliamentary law and public affairs generally.

Resolved, That a copy of these proceedings be transmitted to the honorable Speaker of the House of Representatives and to the relatives of the deceased.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection these resolutions will be inserted in the RECORD and printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

GENERAL W. F. SMITH.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 9396) for the relief of General W. F. Smith with a Senate amendment, and a request by the Senate for a committee of conference.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask that the House agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think that ought to go to the committee.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The Senate asks a conference, and I hope my friend will not object.

Mr. McMILLIN. This is one of those bills that provides for a promotion simply to give General Smith an additional retired rank and pay, if I remember it correctly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The Senate has reduced the grade.

Mr. McMILLIN. Well, let it lie on the table for the present, and I will examine the Senate amendment during the day.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Very well.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill will lie for the present on the Speaker's table.

There was no objection.

ANTHONY L. WOODSON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 8962) for the relief of Anthony L. Woodson with a Senate amendment, and a request by the Senate for a committee of conference.

Mr. FINLEY. I ask that the amendment be non-concurred in, and that the request for a conference be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The amendment had better be read.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us have the bill and the amendment read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Anthony L. Woodson, of Woodsonville, Ky., the sum of $3,666.20, being the value of quartermaster's stores taken from the said Woodson by the United States forces during the late war, and appropriated to their use; and the further sum of $2, 00, being the value of engineer stores taken in the same way for the construction of forts, stockades, and so forth, at and near Munfordville, Ky.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

The amendment strikes out all after the word "use," in line 9, in the following words:

"And the further sum of $2,300, being the value of engineer stores taken in the same way for the construction of forts, stockades, etc., at or near Munfordville, Ky."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FINLEY] to non-concur in the amendment and agree to the conference?

Mr. SPRINGER. I think this bill had better go to the committee.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. There can be no really good purpose served in sending it to the committee. The committee have had it, and the best thing to do now is to agree to the conference requested.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let it lie on the table for the present, then, and I will look at the bill and see whether I shall continue objection.

There was no objection; and the bill was permitted to lie on the Speaker's table for the present.

MATTIE S. WHITNEY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2185) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of Mattie S. Whitney, as administratrix of Franklin S. Whitney, deceased, heretofore referred to said court.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent to have that bill considered at this time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is this a Senate bill?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. It is.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that it be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Mattie S. Whitney, as administratrix of the estate of Franklin S. Whitney, deceased, the sum of $22,224, in full satisfaction of her claim against the United States, for supplies furnished to the Army and Navy of the United States, the same being the amount found to be due her by the Court of Claims.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. The amount is large, and I think it had better go to the committee.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman will not object; it is carrying out the findings of the Court of Claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read.

The SPEAKER. This is a Senate bill and there is no report accompanying it; but there is a House bill, and the report accompanying that bill can be read.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let it go to the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the bill will be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were severally read a first and second time, and referred to the committees indicated:

The bill (S. 3163) to provide for the erection of a public building for the use and accommodation of the post-office at Mammoth Hot Springs in the Yellowstone National Park—to the Committee on the Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill (S. 3196) for the relief of Joseph G. Swank—to the Committee on War Claims.

The bill (S. 3162) providing for the printing of Government publications upon private orders—to the Committee on Printing.

The bill (S. 3181) removing the political disabilities of Julian Morris—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (S. 2802) to fix the number of unbound and bound Journals of the Senate and House of Representatives, and to provide for their distribution—to the Committee on Printing.

The joint resolution (S. R. 56) granting permission to officers and enlisted men, members of the military order of the Loyal Legion of the United States and of the Grand Army of the Republic to wear the badges adopted by those orders—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (S. 1019) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to place on file in the War Department the names of the officers and members of the Frontier Guards, mustered into the volunteer military service of the United States on the 18th day of April, 1861, and issue discharges to the same—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 3304) to prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask that that bill be taken up and considered at this time. The bill has been reported by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations unanimously, and has passed the Senate unanimously. The same bill identically has been considered by the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, and has been reported from that committee unanimously and is now on our Calendar. It is exceedingly important that the bill should be considered at once, and that if it is to pass it should become a law as soon as possible. We have negotiated a new treaty with China; that treaty has been amended by the Senate of the United States and has been sent to China that the amendments may be approved by the government of that country. It is likely to be returned here in a very few days.

By the terms of the treaty it goes into effect upon its ratification. As this new treaty will abrogate the existing one, it becomes necessary for Congress to provide the machinery to carry it into effect upon its ratification, in order that there may be no hiatus between the present law and the new one. This bill provides for executing the provisions of this new treaty. The treaty itself is somewhat comprehensive. It goes somewhat into details as to what shall be done respecting the prohibition of Chinese immigration into this country. It provides a method of identifying those that shall depart from the United States, a method of identification which it is claimed will be more effective than the existing one, and will amount to something in the way of preventing the coming in of those who are not entitled to come.

The present law and the present treaty, by reason of inherent defects, do not prevent Chinese immigration. On the contrary, the Chinese are now coming to the Pacific coast, and particularly to San Francisco, in greater numbers than they came before the existence of the present law or the present treaty. Mr. Speaker, this is an important measure. The people of the Pacific coast ask—ay, they demand—that Congress shall relieve them of the difficulties that they now encounter by reason of previous ineffective measures on the part of the law-making power under the treaty now in existence. I ask, therefore, the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, it is very important in passing a bill of this character that we should be sure that it is an effective measure. It is important, therefore, that time should be given for the bill to be printed and examined by gentlemen who are on the Committee of Foreign Affairs, even if they do not examine it as a committee.

Mr. MORROW. They have examined it already.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I understand that it has just come from the Senate.

Mr. MORROW. The House Committee on Foreign Affairs have reported the same bill identically, and it is now on the Calendar.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I would suggest to the gentleman, in the interest of effective legislation, that he ask the House to fix a day, say next Tuesday, for the consideration of the bill, so that in the mean time members may have an opportunity to examine it and see what improvements, if any, can be made in it.

Mr. MORROW. I appreciate the gentleman's suggestion, and if I thought there were any possible advantage to be gained by accepting it I would do so. But, Mr. Speaker, this measure has been approved by the State Department; it has been considered fully and attentively by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations; they have reported it unanimously, and it has passed the Senate unanimously; and the same bill has been considered by the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, and has been reported unanimously to this House. The bill has the approval of every person who is familiar with the difficulties connected with this subject and the necessity of legislation to overcome them; and I must request that it be considered at this time. If there are any questions to be asked about the bill I am ready to explain it. The provisions of the treaty are very full and comprehensive, and this bill provides for carrying them into execution.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I do not suppose there is a gentleman on this side of the House who has any objection to an effective measure being passed for this purpose. The only objection that can be urged must be based upon some defect that may exist in the bill itself; and I think the gentleman would act more wisely, if he will permit me to say so, not to spring upon the House out of its regular order a bill which relates to a treaty, a bill which relates to a subject that has been found exceedingly difficult to handle with success, a subject which the gentleman himself says has baffled all previous attempts to deal with it effectively. I shall urge no formal objection to the immediate consideration of this bill if the gentleman insists upon it, but I think the friends of the bill manifest a spirit of haste that is born more of zeal than that thoughtful and prudent consideration which such a measure deserves, and which the gentleman from California doubtless has given to it, but which he knows other members have been unable to give to it up to this time. I therefore again suggest to the gentleman that he ask the House to fix an early day for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, the interests involved are too grave for me to consent to any further postponement of the bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Let me suggest further to the gentleman, that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs is absent, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY], a member of that committee, is also absent. I observe at this moment that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER], who is also a member of that committee, is present, and I now yield to him and ask him to express his views as to the proper course in dealing with this subject.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I entered the Hall just as my colleague on the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. MORROW], was bringing this bill to the attention of the House. It is, as has been suggested by my friend from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], a very important measure.

Inasmuch as the House is now engaged from day to day in the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill, which under our general rules has precedence, I would suggest to my colleague on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from California [Mr. MORROW], whether it would not be better to have this measure considered on Tuesday next than to undertake to bring it up now in preference to the deficiency appropriation bill, an important branch of which is now under discussion. If my colleague will allow me I will move——

The SPEAKER. The arrangement can only be made by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOOKER. Then I will ask unanimous consent that Tuesday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be fixed for the consideration of this measure; and I am the more inclined to favor this course for the reason that, as will be observed, a number of the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, including its chairman and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY], next in succession on the committee, are not now here. Therefore, if it meets the approbation of my friend from California I ask unanimous consent to designate next Tuesday, immediately after the reading of the Journal, for the consideration of this measure to the exclusion of all other business.

Mr. MORROW. I ask my colleague on the committee whether he objects to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. HOOKER. I am not objecting to its consideration; I am suggesting a method of giving it consideration.

The SPEAKER. The bill has not yet been read, which is the ordinary preliminary to asking consent for consideration.

Mr. OATES. I desire to include with the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] the proposition that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. There is a request pending for immediate consideration of the bill, and unless that is objected to the House will proceed at once to consider it.

Mr. OATES. I shall not object, because I am in favor of the bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry: Is it not now in order to move that this bill be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with instructions to report it back next Tuesday immediately after the reading of the Journal?

The SPEAKER. No motion in regard to the disposition of the bill is in order except by unanimous consent, unless the House takes up the bill for consideration. The bill has not yet been taken up. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill at the present time. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask whether there be objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand this bill is quite lengthy and its reading will take some time. I suggest that the bill be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs——

Mr. McKENNA. Do you object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman will wait a moment he will understand my proposition. I suggest that the bill be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which would be the regular course, and then on Tuesday next the committee can report it and ask its immediate consideration. We shall then see whether gentlemen on the other side will object. For the present I think the bill should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

I have always voted in favor of bills to restrict Chinese immigration, and I desire to vote now for the most stringent measures on that subject. But I am not prepared to accept bills prepared by a Republican Senate on this subject, knowing that the Republican party, in view of its record, can not be trusted to prepare and enact into law measures which will effectively prevent Chinese immigration. I therefore insist upon the reference of the bill to the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, and hope that committee will have leave to report at any time, and that its report will be privileged over all other business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] objects to the present consideration of the bill and asks its reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. McMILLIN. And I ask unanimous consent that the committee have leave to report the bill back at any time.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Have they not that authority under the rules?

Mr. McMILLIN. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Affairs have leave to report the bill back at any time for consideration.

Mr. SPRINGER. The bill will then be privileged?

The SPEAKER. It will be. Is there objection to the proposition that the bill be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with leave to report it back at any time for consideration?

Mr. HOOKER. If in order, I would like to include in the proposition a designation of Tuesday next as the time for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. The proposition I have made will allow the committee to report it before Tuesday, if they are ready.

The SPEAKER. The committee can report the bill at any time. The Chair hears no objection to the proposition; and in the absence of objection, an order will also be made for the printing of the bill.

A MEMBER. Let the bill be made a special order for Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. It will be a special order whenever reported—on Monday, if reported then.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, my request, as I understand, is agreed to?

The SPEAKER. The Chair heard no objection, and the order is that the bill be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with leave to report it back at any time for consideration.

Mr. McMILLIN. That makes it privileged.

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. McMILLIN. I am in favor of the bill, and desire its early consideration.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1701) authorizing the construction of a wagon, bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Sioux City, Iowa; asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. VEST, Mr. SAWYER, and Mr. WILSON, of Iowa.

The message also announced that the Senate insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 182) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Omaha, Nebr.; agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. SPOONER, Mr. QUAY, and Mr. VEST.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 685) for the relief of Royal M. Hubbard;

A bill (S. 110) for the relief of Horace A. W. Tabor;

A bill (S. 2783) for the relief of the sureties of George W. Hook, deceased;

A bill (S. 2430) explanatory of an act entitled "An act to settle certain accounts between the United States and the State of Mississippi, and other States, and for other purposes;" and

A bill (S. 3136) to amend section 1014 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to fugitives from justice.

GENERAL WILLIAM F. SMITH.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to call up from the Speaker's table for consideration at this time the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9396) for the relief of General William F. Smith.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE, August 7, 1888.

Resolved, That this bill pass with an amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask that the conference requested be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The House has not yet acted on the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I shall move to non-concur.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the amendment be read. [After a pause.] I do not insist on the reading of the amendment.

Mr. OATES. I insist on the reading of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "colonel" and insert "major of engineers."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I insist that the bill shall be referred to the Committee——

The SPEAKER. That is an objection to the consideration of the amendment, and it will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs if there be no further objection.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let it lie upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will remain upon the Speaker's table.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 422) for the relief of William Gray;

A bill (H. R. 610) for the relief of William Lavery;

A bill (H. R. 2088) for the relief of W. S. Carpenter;

A bill (H. R. 6233) for the relief of Jesse Coe;

A bill (H. R. 6232) for the relief of Nancy G. Alexander; and

A bill (H. R. 7647) to incorporate the Georgetown and Tennallytown Railway Company, of the District of Columbia.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. HOPKINS, of Virginia, for five days.

SAM RICE POST, NO. 6, GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

Mr. LYMAN. I move by unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11045) for the relief of Sam Rice Post, No. 6, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Iowa, and that it be taken up for present consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed, if it be not incompatible with the interests of the public service, to supply to Sam Rice Post, No. 6, Grand Army of the Republic, at Atlantic, Iowa, one hundred wall tents, two hundred muskets, and two cannon for reunion purposes, the said post first to give such security for their return as the Secretary of War shall direct and deem adequate.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I move to insert, after the word "their," in line 8, the words "safe-keeping and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LYMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUSAN B. HOPKINS.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. I move, by unanimous consent, to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1813) for the relief of Susan B. Hopkins, widow of Arvah Hopkins, late of Tallahassee, Fla., deceased.

The SPEAKER The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Susan B. Hopkins, widow of Arvah Hopkins, late of Tallahassee, Fla., deceased, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $392.50, in full for rent of houses used for offices and storing purposes situated in Tallahassee, Fla.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. This bill has passed the Senate, and one of a like character has been favorably considered by the Committee on War Claims of this House. The duplicate vouchers of the Quartermaster-General show conclusively it is just and right. I do not deem it necessary to say anything further.

The SPEAKER. Unless better order is preserved on the floor the Chair will have to suspend the business of the House. The bill referred to by the gentleman from Florida is not here, but in the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. The House bill is on the Private Calendar, but the Senate bill is in the Committee on War Claims, and I move that that committee be discharged from its further consideration and that it be put before the House.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The Senate bill is not here.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. Here is a printed copy of the bill.

The SPEAKER. But the original Senate bill must be upon the desk when action is asked. The bill will go over for the present, and can be called up again some time during the day.

CORRECTION.

Mr. STRUBLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to submit a privileged motion; to call up the special order for the day.

Mr. BRUMM. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. STRUBLE. I want to bring to the attention of the Chair the order of the House fixed for to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to lay the special order before the House; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania rises to a question of privilege.

Mr. BRUMM. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to ask a correction of the RECORD of this morning. On yesterday, while the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] was occupying the floor, I asked the gentleman from Arkansas this question:

I would like to ask the gentleman from Arkansas whether the tariff has been changed so as to cause this rise in the price of cotton bagging since the Committee on Ways and Means were consulted on the subject?

To which he replied as follows:

In reply to the gentleman's question I will say that the present tariff affords to the manufacturers of cotton bagging a protection of 3 cents a yard, and that a few weeks ago they were not in a pool or a trust, the former one being broken up, and they were getting along very well at prices which were less than foreign bagging of the same weight could be laid down here for, judging from the prices of similar articles.

The Committee on Ways and Means thought that these manufacturers were able to get along without any duty, but the claims for some protection were urged upon various grounds with so much evidence of sincerity of belief and so much earnestness that the committee put into the bill a protection, not of 3 cents a yard, but of three-quarters of 1 cent a yard; and it is in the face of this proposed reduction, not increase, that the bagging manufacturers have formed this pool and put up the price from 7½ and 8 cents a yard to 11 cents, so as to take the entire 3 cents a yard protection which the law at this time permits to them, but which of course will not be permitted if the bill which we have passed becomes law.

I then stated:

Then I understand the gentleman to say that the prospective decrease in the tariff has been the means of raising the price of cotton bagging so suddenly and so largely.

To which the gentleman from Arkansas further replied:

If the gentleman had listened to me I think he would have understood me to say just the reverse of that. They hastened to reform the trust or pool so as to grab while they can. If the bill passes they come to an end. If the bill fails they can continue the extortion permanently.

I am then quoted as using this language:

That is what I said.

This is the part of the RECORD I wish to have corrected, because on the face of it it is inconsistent, and shows it is not what I said. What I said was that his reply was not an answer to what I had asked.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit me a moment I will say to him that the error of which he speaks is, doubtless, if I understand him, due to the double insertion of a remark that I myself made, by the insertion of my language in the wrong place. It should have followed, as the gentleman will remember, another portion of what took place in that discussion, instead of being also placed where it now is. The correction he speaks of would have been made without any action on his part. Through my own fault, thinking that this remark had been omitted, in looking over the manuscript copy of the report, these words were inserted twice and manifestly once in the wrong place. The gentleman doubtless remembers that the remark was made in reply to another portion of what I had suggested, and it is only misplaced in the RECORD, as I have stated, by an error of my own, the error being one of location, and making me faulty in repetition as well as destroying the connection of his own remarks.

Mr. BRUMM. I have no doubt the gentleman states the fact. The point is simply this, that the gentleman made a prophecy as to the effect of the tariff; but did not, as I understood, squarely answer my question, but rather, as I contended, corroborated my statement in that regard.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The gentleman is both correct and incorrect. I stated exactly what is there set forth, only it is printed twice and does put the gentleman in the attitude of occupying a position that he did not occupy; and I had intended, as I have just stated to him, to make the correction by striking out one of the duplications from the RECORD.

Mr. BRUMM. If the gentleman will show me his correction, we can go over it together and arrange it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Certainly.

FUNERAL OF GENERAL SHERIDAN.

Mr. HOOKER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized to make such provision for attending the funeral obsequies of the late General Sheridan as may be ordered and adopted by the committee appointed by the House of Representatives, and that the expense thereof be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

GENERAL WILLIAM F. SMITH.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9396) for the relief of General William F. Smith, and that the same be allowed to remain upon the Speaker' stable for the present.

There was no objection.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a privileged motion. I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. DOCKERY. But to-morrow night is set aside for the consideration of pensions.

Mr. COX. Then I will modify it by moving that when the House adjourns to-morrow it be to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that motion would not be in order at this time. The House might agree, by unanimous consent, that when it adjourns to-morrow it be to meet on some succeeding day, but the motion would not be privileged of itself.

Mr. COX. I have no objection, if the difficulty is in the way of the pension night, to asking unanimous consent that to-night be fixed for the consideration of pensions instead of to-morrow night.

Mr. NELSON. I was just going to suggest to the gentleman that he ask unanimous consent to substitute to-night for to-morrow for the consideration of pension bills.

Mr. SPRINGER. If it is understood that this is to get rid of the session to-morrow, I shall object. I have no objection to an adjournment from to-morrow until Monday, and am willing to give unanimous consent that the motion may be submitted now that when the House adjourn to-morrow it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. BRUMM. That does not dispense with the pension night.

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. CANNON. I want to see the appropriation bills passed and get ready to go home, and I shall object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask my colleague from Illinois if he is opposed to allowing the members of the House and the officers of the House an opportunity of attending the funeral of General Sheridan?

Mr. CANNON. I am not opposed to it. I am perfectly willing to adjourn over Saturday when the proper time comes.

Mr. COX. Then withdraw your objection.

The SPEAKER. The motion the gentleman desires to make is that when the House adjourn to-morrow it be to meet on Monday.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Would not that motion be in order to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. CANNON. Then let it be made to-morrow. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. CRISP. I ask that that be withdrawn until my request can be made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the request of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CRISP. My request is that on Wednesday, the 22d instant, after the reading of the Journal, the House shall consider the Senate bill for the amendment of the interstate-commerce act. It has been reported to the House and is on the Calendar.

Mr. WEAVER. I am in sympathy with that bill and I desire to see it passed, and it is very important that it should be; but we have before this House the bill for the organization of the territory of Oklahoma, which in my opinion is quite as important to the people of the country. It has now been struggling here for over three years, and I do not think I shall yield for special orders to be made until that bill shall have been disposed of. There is plenty of time to pass both bills. Oklahoma now has the right of way and should not be crowded out. Let both committees unite and put both of these important bills through.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. COX. I move that when the House adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The question was put; and the Speaker announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. COX. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 49, noes 59.

So the motion was rejected. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

MRS. GENERAL WARD B. BURNETT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 681) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. General Ward B. Burnett.

Mr. SPRINGER. How does that happen to be the special order?

Mr. McMILLIN. It is analogous to a number of other bills, the consideration of which has been postponed.

The SPEAKER. There are two bills that have been postponed by order of the House.

Mr. McMILLIN. They were made the special order, but I suggest that they go to the Calendar with the other bills. They are bills of similar import, and one case will determine the rest, as they stand upon the same question.

Mr. STRUBLE. I can not consent to that.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask postponement of the consideration of the two bills. This is a private bill, and as to-morrow will be private-bill day, I ask that it be postponed until that time.

Mr. STRUBLE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask if that is in order?

Mr. SPRINGER. To-morrow is private-bill day.

Mr. STRUBLE. I desire to say just one word, and that is this: that upon request last Friday night, when objection was made by gentlemen to the consideration of the bill, it was made the special order for to-day. I would like to have this bill considered now and disposed of.

Mr. SPRINGER. I want to say that I object to having special orders made, when general business is in order, by the few members of the House who attend here on Friday night to look after pension cases. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. LANHAM. I rise to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LANHAM. Is that a privileged motion that has just been made by the gentleman from Illinois?

The SPEAKER. It is a regular parliamentary motion and is in order. The bill is up for consideration.

The motion of Mr. SPRINGER to postpone consideration until to-morrow was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 681) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. General Ward B. Burnett.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place the name of Hattie A. Burnett, widow of Maj. Gen. Ward B. Burnett, on the pension-roll and pay her her late husband's invalid pension of $100 per month in lieu of the pension she now receives.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us have the report read.

The SPEAKER. That can be done in the time of the gentleman, as it is in the nature of debate.

Mr. STRUBLE. I am not in error. The order was that the report be read and thirty minutes be allowed for debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is no provision in relation to the reading of the report or any relating to debate. The bill is up for consideration in the usual way.

Mr. STRUBLE. Then I claim the floor, and ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. STRUBLE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 681) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. General Ward B. Burnett, have considered the same and report it back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The facts of the case are correctly set forth in the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions as follows:

[Report No. 519, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

That the applicant is the widow of the late General Ward B. Burnett, deceased. The principal facts in the military life of her husband have been presented once before to this committee, in a report made April 6, 1880, by Senator BLAIR, of New Hampshire, now, as then, a member of this committee.

We quote from said report as follows:

GENERAL WARD B. BURNETT.

Died June 24, 1884, at Washington City, aged seventy-four.

This distinguished veteran of six wars was appointed by President Jackson a cadet at West Point in 1828, and he was graduated in 1832, brevetted second lieutenant, Second Artillery, July 1, 1834; ordered to report to Colonel Mahan, professor of engineers (was furloughed), reported to Chief Engineer Major Douglass, assistant upon the surveys and plans and estimates which resulted in the adoption of his plans for the Croton Water Works, now indispensable to New York City, and a monument to his genius. When relieved from the academy was ordered to report for duty to Maj. Hartman Bache, United States Topographical Engineers, at Philadelphia, Pa., on harbors and light-houses, then as principal engineer to Col. H. Long, topographical engineer, upon surveys conducted by himself and Major Yarl, of the Royal Engineers, to determine the routes of railways connecting the Atlantic with the Canadas.

Engaged in action of Lacha-Hatcha against the Seminole Indians. He fought in the Black Hawk war in that year on the ground near where Chicago now stands, before a single house was built in that great city, and as captain of cadets in the Black Hawk war; the command, in seeking the enemies of his country, met one more formidable in the Asiatic cholera, which attacked more than one-half of General Scott's army, spreading consternation and death among them. As the Surgeon-General and his assistants were among the dead and dying, the officers were obliged to take care of the sick, and young Burnett, fearless of consequences, was among the most active in providing for their comfort and safety.

Reported to Maj. Gen. Winfield Scott, during the nullification difficulties at Charleston, S. C.; acted quartermaster for a time; was staff officer to General Clinch; staff officer to General Bankhead at the battle of the Coves of the Withlacoocha. He organized two regiments and tendered his services to the President for the Mormon war. In 1842 and 1843 he organized a brigade, offered his services to the President when war was anticipated with England over the Oregon boundary line; he was the brigadier-general and the brigade was kept together at his own expense. He attended the artillery school, Metz, France.

After leaving the Florida and Creek wars, was engineer with Colonel Abert, chief engineer of topography on harbors, in 1837; became resident engineer in State of Illinois and Michigan Canal upon that great and important work. Was made major-general of militia; founded the Light Guard, of New York State; captain of Tompkins Blues when a mere lad; was major and brigade inspector.

In 1846, two regiments of his brigade having been accepted by Governor Wright, he was ordered to report with his regiments (the first troops raised for the Mexican war) to Maj. Gen. Winfield Scott for duty in the Mexican war, where his actions were brilliant. He was engaged in that war in the siege of Vera Cruz, Molino del Rey, Buena Vista, Palo Alto, Resaca de la Palma, in the battles of Cerro Gordo, Contreras, Monterey, and Cherubusco—battles unsurpassed in thrilling interest and the glory of military achievement in the annals of the world, and the bravest deeds on record.

General Burnett's regimental flag was the first one planted on the elevated causeway opposite Portalis in the battle of Churubusco, and his command captured Santa Anna and planted his flag at Cerro Gordo, the headquarters of General Santa Anna; after the troops had captured the position held by the whole Mexican line he returned the first American flag that was planted upon the castle at Chapultepec, even before the Mexican standard was hauled down from the plaza of the castle, and the brave Mexican general surrendered his troops and the key to the enemy's position to General Burnett's command, as shown of him in the great painting now hanging in the governor's room, city hall, New York, and the national flag presented to him by Maj. Gen. Winfield Scott at the national palace in the City of Mexico, and a beautiful one from the ladies of Mexico, made by their own hands, and three other ones presented by the State and the city of New York for their gallant conduct through the war. General Burnett presented the flags of his country to his command at the Island of Laboes, Mexico, in 1846, upon their knees, repeating this oath from his lips: "No enemy shall capture these colors while our lives are spared to defend them." Welcomed home to New York by the first division of New York regiments, under Major-General Sandford, by 200,000 people. Broadway was literally packed with people, who turned out to receive the returning troops, and flowers strewn in their pathway. Public receptions tendered him by the cities of New York, Brooklyn, Troy, Albany, Philadelphia, New Orleans.

General Burnett was a warm personal friend of President Andrew Jackson, of Henry Clay, Abraham Lincoln, and Daniel Webster. In the wars he had many wounds, and the Mexican, where he was severely wounded by a shot through his body, hip and shoulder dislocated by the fall of his horse—twice shot under him; from his wounds his jaws were closed with (tetanus) lockjaw for forty-five days. His coffin was made, but the gallant Major Twiggs was buried in it. He was promoted general by President Polk, September, 1847, by an act of Congress, his commission signed by Governor Seymour; he commanded a brigade.

For General Burnett's heroic services to his country he was tendered a resolution of thanks by the State of New York, Congress, and other States, and honors in private life showered upon him by his countrymen.

In 1861 he organized troops for the war of the rebellion, although a great cripple, in the Assembly Rooms, Broadway, New York City, at his own expense, consolidating regiments as general United States Army, under appointment by the governor and commission from the Government by President Lincoln; headquarters were at the Metropolitan Hotel. He rendered valuable service to the city during the New York riots, and by his efforts saved the United States mint when he had command of the city; was wounded again and sent to the United States Ladies' Hospital. He organized several commands in New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, for services in the field during the war. From exposure consequent upon these labors he became a martyr to inflammatory rheumatism and neuralgia.

General Burnett rendered valuable services to his country as United States topographical engineer. In 1849 President Polk offered to make him commissioner to run the boundary line between the United States and Mexico; but being upon crutches, he was made chief engineer for the construction of the navy-yard dry-dock, which he completed in 1852. Thence, in 1855, he was in charge of the New York dry-dock and the construction of the workshops in the New York navy-yard.

He made the plans of the Brooklyn water-works, which were adopted and of inestimable value to the City of Churches and a lasting honor to his name. In 1857 he was made chief engineer of Norfolk navy-yard and Portsmouth water-works, which involved his survey of Lake Drummond; in Richmond and Maryland made plans for tunneling the Blue Ridge Mountains in Virginia.

He was made surveyor-general of Kansas and Nebraska, which included Colorado, Montana, and two other Territories, because from ill-health he was unable to accept the appointment offered him by President Buchanan as minister to Turkey.

General Burnett, at the time of his death, was the oldest living graduate who became general, United States Army, in the Mexican war. Of the fruits of his valor was a territory conquered by the United States in 1848 almost one-quarter in extent of its then existing area, which is now peopled by 1,500,000 souls, and which from its mines alone could pay our national debt. He won by his bravery the highest honors awarded to the immortal Jackson; in brief, the highest honors accorded to Lafayette by the Empire City of the Union. Relics of great value were showered upon him; many came from foreigners. Two massive gold medals from the city and State of New York, another of great intrinsic value from the officers and soldiers of his division and command. The sword and the old hickory cane of President Jackson, newly mounted and ornamented with jewels and a massive gold eagle; another one from Mrs. Jackson heavily mounted. A beautiful gold-mounted sword, with diamonds, was presented to him by the Light Guard of New York for the gallant acts of his youth and saving the life of Cadet Clark from drowning, and six others at different times. A grand reception was given to him by the mayor and common council and citizens at the governor's room, City Hall, New York, at the theaters and public places. A great dinner was given to him by the citizens of Philadelphia, and also dinners and receptions in several other cities. A grand banquet was given to him and his officers at Troy, where the ladies from the seminaries showered them with flowers.

General Burnett never was in a battle that was lost, or skirmish; he had great perseverance and fortitude, and many are the incidents of his generous nature which can be related. He drew around him a multitude of friends. In the parlor he was as gentle as a lady. He was calm, cool, and brave in the field. It was often said of him he never knew what fear was, ever manly and hopeful through the many afflictions and hardships he was called to endure. His civil and military career placed him as one of the most distinguished men in American history, and he was a most accomplished gentleman, possessed of more than ordinary intelligence of mind and of refined and artistic tastes. His mind had been cultivated by reading, studying, and reflection, and his memory was wonderful even up to the hour of his death, and the extent and accuracy of his information was remarkable. He was sociable, refined, and generous to a fault. He revered and loved his Redeemer and was confirmed early in life in the Episcopal Church. A hero, a gentleman, a kind father, a devoted husband; for many years an invalid, but cheered by a faithful, brave-hearted wife, which was the one bright spot in the closing years of a once brilliant career.

General Burnett was honored as the bravest officer in the United States, and by his countrymen he was awarded the "President Jackson Gold Box" (and bequeathed to his widow), which bears the following inscription:

"FEBRUARY 23, 1819.

"Presented by the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the city of New York to Major-General Andrew Jackson, with the freedom of the city, as a testimonial of respect for his high military service."

(Reverse side.)

"THE HERMITAGE, TENNESSEE, August 17, 1839.

"Bequeathed by Major-General Andrew Jackson 'to that patriot of New York City who (should our happy country not be blessed with peace) should be adjudged by his countrymen to have been the most distinguished in defense of the country and our country's rights.'

"Awarded under that bequest, by the general voice of his countrymen, to Brigadier-General Ward B. Burnett, commanding the New York troops in the late war with Mexico."

It is seldom that we find a service so long and so distinguished.

General Burnett died in Washington City nearly four years ago. He had been, for many years prior to his death, in a condition of helplessness, requiring the constant aid and attendance of hired persons. This condition is clearly shown to have been caused by wounds and disease incurred in his military service. The applicant was his faithful attendant, affectionate nurse and companion during many years of suffering; spared neither time nor labor in easing the afflictions of that long disease—his life in these latter years.

He was and had been for some time prior to his death a pensioner at the rate of $122 per month. Neither the general nor his wife seem to have been possessed of any means of livelihood except the pension so paid to him. This was all exhausted and even indebtedness beyond it accumulated against them by reason of the necessary expenses of his protracted illness. So that when he died there were no assets of his estate, no dower for his widow except the claim upon the gratitude of the country for services so prolonged and so meritorious.

The widow is left without resources, except the pension now paid her under the special act of Congress, which is $50 per month. The bill under consideration proposes to grant her $122 per month, the amount of the pension of her late husband at the time of his death. She may indeed be equitably entitled to the full sum thereof, but having signified her willingness to accept $100 per month, the committee by reason of the premises accord her that sum as a merited provision for the claim made by her.

Mr. STRUBLE (interrupting the reading of the report). I would like to make a request that the further reading of the report be dispensed with, and that it be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN). The report is being read in the time of the gentleman, and he has the right to request that the further reading be dispensed with, subject to objection by any other member.

Mr. STRUBLE. I desire to say to the House, Mr. Speaker, that I should like very much to have the House listen to the full reading of this report. I am satisfied that if each member of the House would listen to the report, or should read it, there would be an almost unanimous agreement that this case presents such merit as to entitle it to favorable action by the House.

I desire to be as brief as possible in reference to the career of this soldier. Let me say in the beginning, however, that I regard the career of General Ward B. Burnett, as it relates to the military service of this country, and particularly to the Mexican war, as being most self-sacrificing, brilliant, and most honorable; creditable alike to himself and to his country.

There was no braver soldier, not only in that war, but there has been no braver soldier in my judgment in the history of our country, than General Ward B. Burnett. He participated in nearly all the battles of the Mexican war. He led his troops uniformly with courage and with success; he was severely wounded; two horses were shot from under him during that war. His services were such that on his return to New York at the head of his command he was received by the people of that city with demonstrations which have scarcely ever been surpassed in the history of popular enthusiasm.

We have recognized the soldiers of the Mexican war as we have not yet recognized the soldiers of the late war; we have granted to the private soldiers of the Mexican war a service pension. Here now comes the widow of this gallant officer, and asks at the hands of this Congress that her pension, which is now $50 a month, may be increased to $100. As one who has carefully considered the report and the facts pertaining to the career of this soldier, I ask that the House agree to the Senate bill granting this lady $100 per month. As I have said of General Burnett, his gallantry, his devotion, his patriotism, and his distinguished services were such that they commanded the recognition and the commendation of all the people of the American Republic at the close of the Mexican war. The appreciation of his services is strikingly illustrated by one among many incidents. The famous gold box voted by the mayor and aldermen of New York City to General Jackson, as a mark of their appreciation of that great statesman and soldier, was by him bequeathed to "that patriot of New York City, who (should our happy country not be blessed with peace) should be adjudged by his countrymen to have been most distinguished in defense of the country and our country's rights;" and, as a result of that bequest, upon the judgment of those having the matter in charge, that gold box was awarded to this magnificent soldier of the Mexican war, General Ward B. Burnett.

General Burnett participated in six wars. He began away back in the Seminole war; he participated in the Black Hawk war; he raised troops when a disturbance with Great Britain over the Oregon boundary line was threatened; and when the war for the preservation of the Union broke out he again raised troops at his own expense, as he had done on former occasions, and offered his services to President Lincoln, and although he was then too infirm to go forward at the head of his command and participate actively in the war, he performed valuable services in raising and organizing troops for that war. During the New York riots he rendered most important aid, and by his efforts undoubtedly saved the United States mint when he had command of the city. He stood in high favor with President Lincoln, by whom he was commissioned to organize troops for the war. He was always loyal to his country and his country's flag from the early days of his youth to the closing hours of his life.

In order that I may emphasize the importance of General Burnett's military services to the country, let it be remembered that he participated actively in the Seminole war; that he fought in the Black Hawk war on ground near where Chicago now stands; that when the Asiatic cholera attacked General Scott's army furiously, young Burnett, notwithstanding all or nearly all the principal medical officers fell victims to its havoc, bravely stood at his post, doing all he could to alleviate suffering and stay the ravages of disease and death. He reported for duty to General Scott during the nullification difficulties at Charleston. He organized two regiments and proffered his services to the President for the Mormon war, and when in 1842-'43 trouble with England over the Oregon boundary line was anticipated General Burnett organized a brigade and again offered his services, maintaining the brigade at his own expense. But while these exhibitions of his courage and devotion to his country in times of real or apprehended danger are sufficient to illustrate his character as a soldier and a patriot, the record made by him during the Mexican war surpassed all previous action and stamped his name high up on the roll of America's bravest generals.

The language of Senator BLAIR in the report to the Senate on this bill, and which report the House Committee on Pensions adopted, so much better describes General Burnett's services in the war with Mexico and the verdict of the American people on them than I can that I venture to quote from it at some length, asking members to grant me attention to the end that they may have as full information as possible of these invaluable services, on account of which largely the widow of the deceased general now asks an increase of her pension:

In 1846, two regiments of his brigade having been accepted by Governor Wright, he was ordered to report with his regiments (the first troops raised for the Mexican war) to Maj. Gen. Winfield Scott, for duty in the Mexican war, where his actions were brilliant. He was engaged in that war in the siege of Vera Cruz, Molino del Rey, Buena Vista, Palo Alto, Resaca de la Palma, in the battles of Cerro Gordo, Contreras, Monterey, and Churubusco—battles unsurpassed in thrilling interest and the glory of military achievement in the annals of the world, and the bravest deeds on record.

"THE HERMITAGE, TENNESSEE, August 17, 1859.

"Bequeathed by Major-General Andrew Jackson 'to that patriot of New York City who (should our happy country not be blessed with peace) should be adjudged by his countrymen to have been the most distinguished in defense of the country and our country's rights.'

"Awarded under that bequest, by the general voice of his countrymen, to Brigadier General Ward B. Burnett, commanding the New York troops in the late war with Mexico."

It is seldom that we find a service so long and so distinguished.

General Burnett died in Washington City nearly four years ago. He had been, for many years prior to his death, in a condition of helplessness, requiring the constant aid and attendance of hired persons. This condition is clearly shown to have been caused by wounds and disease incurred in his military service. The applicant was his faithful attendant, affectionate nurse, and companion during many years of suffering; spared neither time nor labor in easing the afflictions of that long disease—his life in these latter years.

He was and had been for some time prior to his death a pensioner at the rate of $122 per month. Neither the general nor his wife seem to have been possessed of any means of livelihood except the pension so paid to him. This was all exhausted, and even indebtedness beyond it accumulated against them by reason of the necessary expenses of his protracted illness. So that when he died there were no assets of his estate, no dower for his widow except the claim upon the gratitude of the country for services so prolonged and so meritorious.

The widow is left without resources, except the pension now paid her under the special act of Congress, which is $50 per month. The bill under consideration proposes to grant her $122 per month, the amount of the pension of her late husband at the time of his death. She may indeed be equitably entitled to the full sum thereof, but having signified her willingness to accept $100 per month, the committee, by reason of the premises, accord her that sum as a merited provision for the claim made by her.

Mr. Speaker, because of the heat and the anxiety of the House to pass to other business, I will not occupy further time, but will simply add to what I have already said, that this lady, the widow of General Burnett, was for thirteen years prior to his death his wife and the attendant who cared for him in the days of his feebleness and down to the time of his death in 1884.

Mr. WILLIAMS. At what age did the general die?

Mr. STRUBLE. At seventy-four.

Only within a few days this House has passed a bill raising the pension of another lady—the wife of a brigadier-general in the late war—from $50 to $100 a month, and another such bill has also received the favorable consideration of the House. Were this an original question, I am quite sure I would be opposed to it, as I have opposed some others of a kindred nature, but the precedents have been clearly and apparently deliberately set, and this bill is superior in merit, as I think, to others which have been passed.

A MEMBER. What cases were those?

Mr. STRUBLE. One of those bills was for the benefit of Mrs. Paul and the other was the case of Mrs. Stannard. Still another bill is pending, I believe—having been favorably reported—which proposes to raise the pension of a Mrs. Ricketts from $50 to $75 a month. Now, I do not think it is necessary to consume further the time of the House, and unless some gentleman desires to discuss the bill, I shall call for the previous question.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, this bill seems now to be fairly before the House to be voted upon, and of course I am going to vote for it because I know all about the character of General Burnett. It is a bill that ought to pass, and I am going to vote to pass it; but I want to say here that there are some twelve or fifteen similar bills which have come over from Friday night sessions with the previous question ordered upon them and days designated for their consideration, and I would like to know when we can reach those fifteen bills so that they may be called up and acted upon as this bill is to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the bills to which the gentleman refers are not in order at this time. As to when they will come up, that is not a matter for the present occupant of the chair to decide.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I understand, then, they are not in order at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They are not.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I would be glad to know from the Chair, if possible, what is the prospect for calling up those twelve or fifteen meritorious bills for increase of pension to the widows of admirals, distinguished generals, and others. Those widows are in very straitened circumstances; their husbands did gallant service in the Army or the Navy; and Congress has never failed to pass one of these increase-of-pension bills in such cases. Indeed, some three or four months ago there were two such bills passed, following rapidly upon the granting of the pensions at the Department. There have been one or two such bills passed since. I speak to-day in the interest of those widows of generals, admirals, and commodores. I feel that the House is in duty bound at some early day to take up those postponed bills. As I said on rising, I intend to vote for the pending bill, for I think it a meritorious measure, and am glad it has been called up.

Mr. JACKSON. I would be glad if my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] would inquire and ascertain when we can have a day for considering general pension legislation affecting enlisted men. I know he is in favor of such legislation.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I would not interpose any obstacle in the way of any bill granting a pension to the widow of any soldier. But that is not my present point. I want to know why these bills to which I have referred, on which the previous question has been ordered, can not be reached and receive fair consideration in this House.

Mr. STRUBLE. I wish to make one more statement. General Burnett at the time of his death was drawing under the general law a pension of $72 a month, and under a special act a pension of $50 a month, making $122 a month. This widow asks only $100 a month. The pension of $50 a month was undoubtedly granted on account of the unsurpassed bravery and devotion of this soldier through a long term of years.

Mr. LONG. How much is she receiving now?

Mr. STRUBLE. Fifty dollars a month.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE] how many times General Burnett was married.

Mr. STRUBLE. I understand this lady was the second wife of General Burnett; that she was married to him seventeen years ago; that she lived with him as his wife about thirteen years, until his death, and at a period of his life when he most needed care, and when that care must have been a great burden to any one.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Where was his other wife? Was she dead when he married the present applicant?

Mr. STRUBLE. I do not know; I think so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand differently.

Mr. STRUBLE. I think she was; but I am not advised on that point. At all events this beneficiary was, for thirteen years just prior to his death, the legal wife of General Burnett.

Mr. FELTON. Does the claim of this lady depend upon the length of time she was married?

Mr. STRUBLE. I think not.

Mr. Speaker, unless some gentleman wishes to debate the bill further, I will call the previous question.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I would like some information in regard to this lady's present pecuniary condition.

Mr. STRUBLE. She is in receipt of a pension of $50 a month, her sole dependence, as I am advised, and is in debt on account of the expenses attending the sickness and burial of her late husband.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word on this subject, and I think in doing so I speak the sentiment of the whole New York delegation. I know no member of the delegation who is in any way opposed to this bill. All of us are acquainted with the circumstances of General Burnett's great services in the Army. I think I can say for Mrs. Burnett, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE] has said, that her watchful care over her husband during the last fifteen years of his life entitles her to the respect of the people of New York and of this nation; and more than that, the services of General Burnett as one of the bravest officers that ever drew a blade in the Mexican war, ought to be recognized in the person of his widow by this nation.

I know that those who ask for pensions of this kind are persistently met with the remark that the private soldiers and their widows or other dependent relatives are not properly provided for. But, sir, I think this Congress and this nation would be ungrateful if we did not embrace the present opportunity to demonstrate the gratitude of the Republic for the services of General Burnett, by granting the present application of his last living relative. I hope, sir, there will not be one vote cast against this bill.

Mr. STRUBLE. I demand the previous question on the third reading of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. DOCKERY. Have the amendments been agreed to?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair). There are no amendments pending.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I ask for a division on the third reading of the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 42.

Mr. STRUBLE. I demand tellers.

Mr. PETERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PETERS. Is this vote on the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; on the third reading. On the request for tellers the ayes are 26, which is not a sufficient number to order tellers.

Mr. STRUBLE. I call for a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is too late. The gentleman demanded tellers, at which time he could have made the point of no quorum, but now, as tellers have been refused, the point of no quorum comes too late.

Mr. STRUBLE. I call for the count on the other side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no other side.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, and Mr. BRUMM called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Is it in order to amend the bill so as to make it $75 per month? If that be done we would carry the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order to amend the bill at this stage.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I make the suggestion, as the bill would pass in that shape.

Mr. LONG. I move to reconsider the vote by which the third reading of the bill was refused.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 46.

Mr. STRUBLE. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will appoint as tellers Mr. CHEADLE and Mr. STRUBLE.

The House again proceeded to divide.

Mr. STRUBLE. I withdraw the point of no quorum, as it is evident no quorum is present in the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I renew the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The tellers will resume their places and the count will proceed.

Mr. STRUBLE. I think it is evident no quorum can be obtained. In order to dispose of the case I ask that its further consideration be postponed until one week from to-day, to come up immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SPRINGER. I object unless it be made one week from to-morrow.

Mr. STRUBLE. I do not object to that personally, but I know there are gentlemen who will object. I will make the request, however.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not object to its postponement, but I do object to taking up the day set apart for the consideration of private bills.

Mr. STRUBLE. The debate has been closed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understand that, but it is not fair to take up the time which has been devoted to the consideration of private bills. I do not object to any other day but Friday.

Mr. STRUBLE. If no quorum is present on that day I will ask for its further postponement. I do not wish to weary the House when there is no quorum.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not object to the postponement of the bill to some other day than Friday of next week.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE] agreed to modify his amendment so as to make it Friday.

Mr. STRUBLE. If there is no quorum on that day its consideration will not be insisted upon.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have been trying to get an opportunity to call up and press to its passage the bill for the Territory of Oklahoma, but some little thing insidiously is brought forward and the time reserved for public business is taken up and that important public measure still remains undisposed of. It has been again and again set aside for the consideration of other and less urgent business.

Mr. STRUBLE. I do not propose to ask the House to take up time if no quorum is present.

Mr. LONG. And the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. STRUBLE. Yes; so that there will be no discussion or time occupied with the bill; merely a vote.

Mr. DOCKERY. Allow me to suggest that with the statement of the gentleman from Iowa, that he will not press this unless a quorum is present, it can not possibly delay the consideration of the bill to which the gentleman from Illinois refers.

Mr. LANHAM. What is the request?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That the further consideration of the bill be postponed until one week from to-day.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to that unless it is understood that it is not to antagonize the bill for the organization of the Territory of Oklahoma.

Mr. WEAVER. Let that be put in.

Mr. STRUBLE. Then I will except that bill, and will not antagonize it.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I desire to inquire if any order has been made in reference to the Oklahoma bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not remember any.

Mr. BARNES. None has been made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa as modified by the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BARNES. I object to coupling it with the Oklahoma bill.

Mr. STRUBLE. I repeat that I will not insist upon occupying the time of the House if it is manifest that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Georgia that this unanimous consent was only to postpone this bill, and does not include the Oklahoma bill.

Mr. BARNES. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there further objection?

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The tellers will resume their places and continue the count.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until next Thursday, with the understanding that it will not be pressed if a quorum is not present, and that it shall not antagonize the consideration of the Oklahoma bill.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I do not understand that any order has been made as to the Oklahoma bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No order has been made, but if an order should be hereafter made it is understood that this bill will not interfere with it.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I did not want any misunderstanding which might imply that an order had been made with reference to the Oklahoma bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that any statement of the Chair with regard to this bill would not change the status of this bill in the House.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MARGARET STAFFORD WORTH.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 867) granting a pension to Margaret Stafford Worth.

Mr. CHEADLE. I ask unanimous consent that the same order be made with reference to that bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

BRIDGE ACROSS RED RIVER.

Mr. CRISP, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10319) to authorize the Natchitoches Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Red River, in Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CUSTOMS-COLLECTION DISTRICT, TAMPA, FLA.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1721) to establish a customs-collection district in Florida, to be known as the collection district of Tampa, and for other purposes; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

AGRICULTURAL LANDS, PIPESTONE INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported, as a substitute for the bill H. R. 10544, a bill (H. R. 11128) for the disposition of the agricultural lands embraced within the limits of the Pipestone Indian reservation, in Minnesota; which was read twice, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The bill H. R. 10544 was ordered to be laid on the table.

PUBLIC BUILDING, BEATRICE, NEBR.

Mr. McSHANE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 1619) for the erection of a public building at the city of Beatrice, Nebr.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with an adverse recommendation bills of the following titles; which were severally ordered to be laid on the table and the reports printed, namely:

A bill (H. R. 223) granting a pension to Nathaniel Grigsby;
A bill (H. R. 8529) granting a pension to Nathan B. Rarick;
A bill (H. R. 5119) granting a pension to John W. Younger;
A bill (H. R. 2534) granting a pension to Louis W. Bucklin;
A bill (H. R. 213) granting a pension to W. W. McArthur;
A bill (H. R. 8426) granting a pension to C. F. M. Morgan;
A bill (H. R. 222) granting a pension to Thomas J. Hutchins;
A bill (H. R. 2258) granting a pension to Jonas G. Dodge;
A bill (H. R. 2627) granting a pension to Andrew M. Jorden; and A bill (H. R. 202) granting a pension to Jessie W. Williams.

MAGHILL H. PATTEN.

Mr. BLISS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 10672) granting a pension to Maghill H. Patten; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARTIN KENOPSKI.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 1671) for the relief of the heirs of Martin Kenopski; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON AND WESTERN MARYLAND RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. HEMPHILL (for Mr. COMPTON), from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 9418) to incorporate the Washington and Western Maryland Railroad Company with amendments; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. This concludes the call of committees for reports.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a resolution proposing that both Houses attend the funeral of General Sheridan, and that when the two Houses adjourn on Friday it be to meet on Monday next.

FUNERAL OF GENERAL SHERIDAN.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair will lay this before the House at the present time.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, August 9, 1888.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring in the proposition), That both Houses attend the funeral of General Sheridan on Saturday next, at 10 a. m.

Resolved, As a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, that when the two Houses of Congress adjourn on Friday it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. COX. I move concurrence in the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] asks consent to consider this resolution at the present time. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. FINLEY. Will this interfere with the Friday night session?

The SPEAKER. It will not. It provides that when the House adjourn on Friday evening it be to meet on Monday next.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10896) making appropriation to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The fourth section of this bill is still before this committee. One hour and fifty-three minutes have been occupied by those opposed to the provision in the bill and two hours and twenty-three minutes by those in favor of the proposition. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES].

Mr. BURNES. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW].

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman, I shall speak to-day not so much to change the opinions of others as to express my own, and I take pleasure to myself because in the remarks I shall submit to the committee I shall speak in vindication of the reputation and honor of our fathers, of those who were concerned about the beginning of this century with the transactions which are involved in the present debate. Those patriots and statesmen, in my opinion, did no injustice to the ancestors of the present claimants and gave to them no proper case of complaint. We are told, however, and told in strong language, repeated in various forms, that they took the property of citizens of the United States and applied it to public use, to buy off the urgent and clamorous demands made against us as a Government by a foreign power to relieve ourselves from onerous obligations under former treaties, and yet refused to make compensation to the citizens thus plundered of their property, and that down to this day, during a period of eighty-eight years, since the treaty of 1800 was made, that this most manifest injustice to those men and their descendants has continued without redress; in other words, that our Government has been unjust in withholding what was due to injured parties and has set up from time to time various pretexts and excuses for non-payment which will not endure fair investigation and honest debate.

Sir, more than twenty years ago, when a Senator from Massachusetts was making repeated reports on this subject (rhetorical in form, but earnest in purpose), I was a member of his committee and had occasion to look into this subject, and then imbibed certain impressions concerning these claims and the liability of our Government to answer for them. Now, when the subject is again in Congress, and it is pressed upon the attention of the body of which I find myself a member, I have turned again to official documents and to other sources of information, examined before, and also to recent information in proceedings of Congress and of the Court of Claims, and I am now prepared to say upon thorough conviction that the charge against our fathers, the public men of our country in former times and their successors in more recent times, that they have been unjust to the ancestors of the present claimants or to those claimants themselves, is a charge unfounded in fact and unjust in character.

Sir, there are in my judgment three complete defenses to this demand upon the Treasury of the United States, either one sufficient, but taken together, absolutely overwhelming to any mind bent upon honest inquiry and fair judgment.

In the first place, sir, when it is alleged that the United States appropriated these claims to a public use, and, by so appropriating and using them, relieved itself from treaty obligations with France, I answer that at the date when this alleged appropriation was made, beyond all honest contradiction, these claims were without pecuniary value, either in the public markets of the world or in the private transfers which one individual may make to another of his property for a consideration paid.

One of the men engaged in negotiating the treaty of 1800 (Mr. Vans Murray, our minister at the Hague), and who was thoroughly conversant with the claims, declared that they were not worth a quarter of 1 per cent. of their amount. He declared that they were without value, and it was his hope that the Senate of the United States had stricken out the second article of the treaty of 1800, because they also believed them to be without value. I shall not pause to recite again the proofs which the Committee on Appropriations have collected upon this point, because, so far as I understand, their finding is uncontradicted, and being uncontradicted it may be assumed to be true. These claims, then, were without pecuniary value at the time when they were abandoned as objects of negotiation by the United States in February, 1801.

Now, sir, if you admit everything that has been said in this debate and outside of this debate in former sessions of Congress, on behalf of these claims and on behalf of the ancestors of the present claimants, what result do you come to? Why, that their compensation should be the value of these claims in the year 1801, because that would conform to the universal rule applicable to the appropriation of property for public use. Gentlemen see that rule administered in their courts at home all over the United States. Where private property is appropriated by the public or by a corporation authorized to exercise the right of eminent domain, the property is taken subject to the right of the owner to have paid to him its value at the time of the appropriation.

If but a part of a man's property is taken other rules come in; you take the value before the public interference with the property and the value after the public has taken a part of it, and give the owner the difference. But that is not the case here. Here, if there is anything in the claim of these persons, there was a total appropriation of these claims, and it was a permanent appropriation, not a temporary use, and therefore they were entitled to the pecuniary value of the claims at the time the appropriation was made. That is the rule of justice, and law follows justice in this respect.

Now, in 1801 when the negotiation upon these claims with France was abandoned by us, beyond question the claims had no pecuniary value. France had refused to pay them. Our envoys concerned in the negotiation had reported elaborately all the proceedings of the conferences with the plenipotentiaries of France, and the whole transaction was well known, and no man desiring to invest his money at that time would have paid five cents on the dollar for the claims unless he was influenced by some other consideration than a desire to obtain a claim of pecuniary value and capable of collection. Therefore, I say, if you admit the whole argument on behalf of these claimants upon every ground presented, and reach the ultimate conclusion that the Government did appropriate their property and ought to pay for it, then comes in the general rule of law and justice which requires that you should pay what the property was worth.

But their value at that time was merely nominal. Yet what is proposed here? Why, it is proposed that by your vote upon a single item of the pending bill you shall commit yourself to the payment of $30,000,000 eighty-eight years after the event, and you have also Mr. Tuck's report from Paris in regard to additional claims for which you ought to lift the bar of the two years' limitation in the act of 1885, and let them come in, because additional testimony is now being supplied from the French archives and court records, and as a matter of justice those claims are entitled to come in if others are allowed.

But I shall not stop to argue about the amount of these claims. I leave that question upon the official report of the Acting Attorney-General. Founded upon an actual computation of the claims and the application of an average rule to blanks, the basis of making reasonable deductions from the total sum, the amount stands at thirty-three and a half millions, and making further liberal deductions for all possible causes, I think that thirty millions is a safe and reasonable estimate for the whole.

This is the official information we have; and the public are not to be pacified or this Congress satisfied with unofficial, uncorroborated suggestions in debate that the amount will be much less.

They tell us that Mr. Webster estimated the amount in 1835 at only $10,000,000, and that his judgment ought to be good. Yes; and he said that the claims involved 615 vessels captured or seized; and upon that basis he made up his aggregate of $10,000,000. Now there are 2,378 vessels involved in the claims before the Court of Claims, a prodigious increase, the number being more than three times that stated by Mr. Webster in 1835, on which he based his estimate of $10,000,000. Sir, with the addition of the claims under the two years' limitation which may come in hereafter I shall not be surprised if these claims shall ultimately reach $50,000,000 or $60,000,000, the amount which Colonel Benton, in his bluff, blustering manner, when denouncing the claims, said they would amount to if the Government ever undertook to pay them.

What was done by these claimants themselves? What was done in 1835 by their great advocate, Mr. Webster, whose speech I took up last night and read over again? He estimated these claims, as I have stated, at $10,000,000; and then he asked that Congress appoint a commission to ascertain the claims, and that $5,000,000, about 50 per cent., be paid upon them, to be distributed pro rata. He said that would comport with what had been done by our Government in other cases; that it would not exceed in proportion what was paid French claimants under the treaty of 1831, for by that treaty as to claims subsequent to the year 1800 we recovered against France 25,000,000 francs, subject to a deduction of one million and a half of francs on account of the old Beaumarchais claims and other matters, reducing the amount to twenty-three and a half million francs, which was distributed by means of a commission to the claimants, who received 58 per cent. of their claims. That occurred in the time of Andrew Jackson; and it was declared to be a great achievement to wring from a reluctant foreign government 58 per cent. of the claims. Those were claims subsequent to 1800, about which there was no real cause of dispute, but for which the French Chamber had refused to vote an appropriation. Yet persons are here now with claims of their ancestors, demanding thereon 100 per cent.; claims which were denied when first presented and have been, upon strong grounds, contested ever since.

I shall vote against these claims, because they were of only nominal value at the time of alleged appropriation. Besides, the parties had no right to come and impose their losses upon the Government of the United States. Our Government did not injure them; their injury was by a foreign power; and we did our best for them with that power. We sent out our ministers and remonstrated when those wrongs were going on; nay, we resorted to actual war against France by act of Congress in 1798 and 1799. We did all that could be done both by negotiation and by actual force in order to prevent depredations upon our citizens. Our Government was confessedly free of blame up to the negotiation of the treaty of 1800.

What more did we do in behalf of the claimants? Why, sir, by that very treaty of 1800 we obtained nearly $4,000,000 for them upon the undisputed portion of their claims, prior to 1796 or 1797, which came under the French decree of 1793. To be sure, it took three or four years of negotiation to accomplish that result; the money was finally paid out of the Louisiana purchase money in 1803–'04. But we obtained the allowance from France and paid over the money to the claimants. We also obtained from France a release or discharge of all the vessels she had captured which had not been finally condemned. Over forty ships with their valuable cargoes were thus taken from the hands of the spoiler, and handed back to our merchants who owned them.

Then, sir, we pursued Spain for that portion of the French depredations which arose from the violation by Spain of her duty as a neutral power. France made some captures of our ships in Spanish ports and along the Spanish coast, within the jurisdiction of Spain. Therefore we made claim upon Spain. We could not get any money from her, but in 1819 we bought Florida from her, as we had bought Louisiana from France in 1803. Out of the purchase money these claimants obtained $5,000,000, secured to them by the action of our Government. It was distributed by commission and paid 92½ per cent. of the Spanish division of the claims.

This same class of men—the merchants and ship-owners—had claims against Bonaparte for unjustifiable seizures. Our Government pursued those claims from the time they arose to 1831. As I have already stated, our Government recovered ultimately 58 per cent. of those claims. Our Government did its duty to these people from the beginning. It negotiated for them; it spent money to establish a military force at home; it sent out ships to defend them against capture; it authorized private merchantmen to arm in self-defense; it pursued all possible remedies against France, and it obtained for our citizens substantial though not complete redress.

Why are these claims here, with claims denied by France and abandoned by the United States? The answer is, because nearly the whole mass were war claims and uncollectible from France. We never could obtain a dollar upon them, and were compelled to give up negotiation for their recovery.

Now, because we gave them up it is said we traded them off. Because we abandoned them it is said we released them to France for a consideration. Because we could not get them allowed, it is said we assumed them and they charge them up against us.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to state two propositions, and I think I will have time to go through with them. (I) There were certain treaties with France negotiated by Dr. Franklin in 1778. In 1800 they were extinct, dead treaties, of no force, broken and set aside by the parties to them.

That is one proposition. My other proposition is (II) that France made war upon our commerce—limited war—and we responded by a war which was mainly defensive, but still aggressive for the purpose of defense, and that claims for losses on either side were not recoverable, were not legal demands. We claimed that France had been unjust, and therefore we tried to recover those war claims on our side by negotiation, but failed therein, and the claims fell because not provided for in the treaty of peace.

In one of the treaties of 1778 (the treaty of alliance) there was a mutual guaranty by France and the United States of their respective possessions in America. There was another provision, mutual also in its terms, in the commercial treaty of 1778, which provided that when either nation should be engaged in war they should have hospitality for their vessels and privateers in the ports of the other, enabling them to take in prizes of war and take them out again free from port charges. These were two provisions of the treaties which gentlemen have been talking about, and which are claimed to have been valuable to France.

The commercial treaty of 1778, in the twenty-third and twenty-fourth articles, provided, as it turned out, for the interests of the United States. By these articles free ships made free goods. We could carry British goods in our vessels and they would be safe from French capture. When France and England went to war the advantage was on the side of England as far as this particular treaty was concerned, and France complained. Dr. Franklin had secured the adoption of a great principle, a beneficent one in its application to maritime war. Another feature of the treaty was to limit articles contraband of war to those that were properly so; in other words, to military stores and implements; and the treaty also provided that provisions and all articles of a similar character, of which our country produced abundantly, should not be regarded as contraband.

These were the provisions of the treaty of a continuing character, which were immensely valuable to us, so that when the war between France and England broke out early in 1793, we, as a neutral power, had the ports of both England and France freely open to our commerce. War prices sprang up all over Europe, and we reaped a rich harvest; great armies were raised; agricultural sections were stripped of laborers, and we, as a neutral nation, could take advantage of the situation and make great profits. In fact, notwithstanding these depredations, our commerce was quite profitable from 1793 to 1800.

These provisions of the treaty, which, as I have said, were of vital importance to us, France openly set aside by the decree of the 9th of May, 1793. Why, she acknowledged it; she said so, that she had set them aside. She declared that she could not keep her vows to the neutral powers, for England was pressing her too closely; and by that decree of her National Assembly it was provided that her vessels of war and cruisers should seize as prize of war the enemy's property upon neutral vessels. So that, in defiance of the treaty of 1778, we could not carry British goods or the goods of any other nation engaged in war with France.

What further? She provided that our vessels on the ocean, loaded with American provisions might be seized by force, gutted of their cargoes, the provisions brought into French ports and applied to French use upon a promise that they should be paid for. When? Not when the act was committed. They were not paid for up to 1800, except in a few cases, nor until 1803, eight or ten years after they were seized. Was not that breaking the treaties? Could the treaties be broken more clearly, more absolutely, and more outrageously? The merchant of Boston who sent his ship-load of goods to Liverpool to be sold there, the proceeds to be invested in British goods for the return voyage, could make double profits by his venture, and the vessel could earn double freight. But such voyages were broken up by this decree of the French Assembly. Our profitable commerce was heavily injured. What did the decree do? Why, the French ships seized our vessels on the ocean, in the British Channel anywhere, taking them to French harbors, then despoiled them, turned them loose upon the broad Atlantic to creep their way back home. No money to buy a return cargo, stripped of everything of value; and yet gentlemen tell us that France maintained her treaties with us and had continuing rights under them! Nothing can be more unfounded or extravagant than to say that the treaties bound us after this open, defiant annulment of them by France. They were dead as far as she was concerned, and she could claim nothing under them. We had a right to treat them as rescinded from the date of that decree.

We bore and forbore until 1796, when she passed another insolent decree, that our vessels should be treated as we permitted Great Britain to treat them. Until 1795 we had no commercial treaty with Great Britain, and our relations with her were under the law of nations, and she could seize as contraband of war things that France could not under the treaties of 1778. Of course the treaties of 1778 were disadvantageous to France in her great struggle with England, while they were of very great advantage to us. She was better off under the law of nations than she was under her bond to us, and she said so, and set the treaties aside, for it was her interest to do so. But in July, 1796, she declared that she would treat our ships as England was permitted to treat them. Why, the poor skipper upon the ocean, if England took his vessel for breaking an imaginary blockade of continental ports, could not resist the outrage.

That was the insolent decree of France, which again broke her treaties with us. Of course they were broken before, but this was an additional breach.

Then, 2d March, 1797, she made another decree, of which I have a memorandum here. It was a decree of the French Directory, which provided in the first place that enemies' property should be seized on neutral ships without limit. Second, it extended contraband of war to extraordinary limits. And lastly, it required ship-rolls under an old, ancient French regulation, the absence of which on our ships was made cause for seizure and condemnation. That was the decree of 1797.

No wonder that General Dix, in his argument of 1846, declared that that decree abrogated the commercial treaty of 1778. In other words, swept it out of existence.

Next, we come to the important French decree of 18th January, 1798, which the President of the United States in his annual message to Congress of December in the same year described as an unequivocal act of war upon American commerce by the Republic of France. What was that decree? It has been quoted already, but I must refer to it because it is of great importance.

Here is the decree:

ARTICLE 1. The character of vessels relative to their quality of neuter or enemy shall be determined by their cargo. In consequence every vessel found at sea loaded in whole or in part with merchandise the production of England or of her possessions shall be declared good prize whoever the owner of the goods or merchandise may be.

ART. 2. Every foreign vessel which in the course of her voyage shall have entered into an English port shall not be admitted into a port of the French Republic, except in case of necessity, in which case she shall be bound to depart from the said port as soon as the causes of her entry shall have ceased.

So that if an American vessel had any commodity on board a production of Great Britain or of any of her colonies in North America, in the West Indies, or in Asia, the ship and everything it contained was forfeited to France, to be condemned in her prize courts. It left no commerce of ours upon the ocean secure from her grasp. Taken in connection with her prior decrees it absolutely outlawed American trade. Now I assert with confidence that these decrees which I have cited entirely set aside, so far as France was concerned, the treaties of 1778. She broke them because it was her interest to break them, but thereby she forfeited all rights under them and released us completely from all their obligations.

Now, what was done by us in regard to the treaties? Why, on the 7th of July, 1798, the Congress of the United States, the law-making power representing our sovereignty, passed a statute which binds us and all the people of this country in honor and conscience. They passed a law declaring that those treaties with France were null and void; that they did not bind the Government or the people of the United States and should not bind them in the future. Congress did not formally abrogate the treaties; they treated them as already abrogated by France, and Chief-Justice Ellsworth declared that the act did not change the situation between France and us because it simply declared what that situation was at the time. The treaties are all dead, dead by reason of outrageous violation of them by France, and we declared in our sovereign capacity as a nation that they were dead and should remain so.

Now, what becomes of this argument heard for over seventy-five years, that we gave up to France these claims of our citizens for the consideration that she would kindly release us from the old treaties of 1778? What becomes of that miserable pretense of an argument which has been heard so long in Congress and outside of Congress in support of these claims? It is plain that in 1800 France had no treaties with us that were valuable to her or onerous upon us. The whole question of treaties as subsisting or abrogated had been closed two years before. We were in our relations with her under the general law of nations.

In the next place, it is equally clear that France, by the several decrees I have referred to, made war upon our commerce, and in particular by the decree of 1798 placed herself in the attitude of an avowed and open enemy.

And she followed up her decrees by practical action. She sent her war-ships upon the ocean to seize our vessels. She gave commissions to privateers, and they also spoiled our commerce on all parts of the sea; and this condition of things continued until, as Judge Marshall says, hostilities were terminated by the treaty of 1800. Some persons have doubted whether that convention treaty of 1800 was a treaty of peace. But Judge Marshall decided (in Talbot vs. Seaman, 1 Cranch, 1) that we were at war with France, and that the state of war continued until the treaty of 1800 was made. That treaty was therefore a treaty of peace. He decided not merely that there was a state of war between the two countries, but held that we had the right to recapture a vessel taken by France from Holland and restore her to Holland, and that the captors had the right to claim salvage; and he held this although the acts of Congress against France did not provide for such a case at all. And why could we do that? Because, said the great judge, France was our enemy and we were hers; because the relation of public war between us justified us in going even beyond the acts of Congress in smiting her.

I might go on to multiply proofs. The Attorney-General of the United States, in an opinion which was read yesterday, said that public war existed on the part of France against us and on our part against France. You have the declaration of the President of the United States in his official message of December, 1798, that France opened war upon us by her decree of 18th January in the same year. You have in the treaty correspondence of 1800 the plea of the French negotiators that the actual condition was one of war; that they had previously made an undue concession in admitting that there was only a misunderstanding between the two countries. They plead war. Then, sir, you have the decision of our Supreme Court in 1800, in Bass vs. Tingey (4 Dallas, 37). While our negotiators were in France that case was heard at the August term of the court, and it was held that there had been war between France and the United States from the spring of 1798 onward. Four judges concurred in that opinion, the Chief-Justice being in Europe as one of our envoys.

When the treaty of 1800 came before the Senate in February, 1801, unfortunately that body sat in secret session, so that we can not tell by any record what their views were. It seems that they struck out the second article of the treaty, with but one negative vote, and that all the Senators along the Atlantic seaboard voted to strike it out. Why did the Senate so vote? The argument of the claimants has been that the Senate did that in order to get rid of the old French treaties; but that is quite impossible. No such motive could have actuated them. Why, then, did the Senate strike out that second article? For two or three good and sufficient reasons, which we may infer from the facts known to us, in the absence of any record of the Senate debate. In the first place, they struck out the article because the Supreme Court had just decided, virtually, that these claims were war claims against France, as the French negotiators had contended they were. Therefore, to have any future negotiation about them was idle, because France, standing upon the decision of our own great court, could readily defeat us in any future contention we might make.

In the next place, there was a reason for striking out that article of the treaty in the fact that it had been put in by our negotiators to save the point of honor to themselves, because they had no power to abandon these claims; but the Senate was not bound by instructions; the Senate was free to judge of what was expedient, and what was due to all parties, and undoubtedly it was the opinion of the Senate that these claims could not be collected from France. They had before them all the proceedings of the negotiation, even the secret journal of our envoys, and all the correspondence, and they must have believed, from all the facts known to them, that the claims were, and always would be, uncollectable. Besides, while the article could do no good, it was capable of doing some harm, because the claimants might suppose, if there was a chance, that they might at some time have their claims heard and allowed by France. I insist that there was good reason for the action of the Senate upon these grounds, while there was not an atom of reason for their action upon the ground that has been urged on behalf of these claimants, namely, a desire to get rid of the old French treaties.

Now I come to the last point, which is this. It is said that the exchange with Bonaparte of ratifications of the treaty in 1801 has something to do with this question of governmental liability. Why, sir, it has nothing to do with it. Bonaparte's declaration when ratifying the treaty is only important as evidence of what nobody denies, namely, that we had abandoned the further prosecution of these claims. Bonaparte's ratification of the treaty on the 30th of August, 1801, was unqualified and absolute; there is no condition about it. At the end, however, of the ratification he added: "It being well understood (bien entendu) that by this retrenchment the two states renounce the respective pretensions which are the objects of the said article."

What does that mean? The word "provided" is printed here in the book (report of 1826) at the end of the ratification; but that word "provided" is simply a mistranslation in the State Department; there is no such word in the original French; consequently the argument built upon that word, to the effect that Bonaparte signed the ratification upon a condition, is absulutely untrue. He did no such thing. His addendum—I use a neutral word to which nobody can object—his addendum to his ratification has been variously yet harmoniously described by men of the highest authority. Mr. Jefferson said it was a legitimate inference by Bonaparte that the old dispute about the pretensions on either side were dropped or abandoned.

Talleyrand, in subsequent correspondence, speaks of it as an explanation; and M. Roederer, the great lawyer and a negotiator on the side of the French, said to our minister afterward that the explanation was properly made, simply because it declared the legal effect of making a treaty without providing for indemnities. He was certainly right in that. If during a war there are losses on either side of debatable character, which are not provided for in the treaty of peace at the end of the war, they can not be brought forward afterwards as subjects of negotiation or complaint. There may be circumstances under which, in the negotiation of a treaty of peace, war losses may be provided for; if not then provided for, they are gone forever. And so when the treaty of 1800 was concluded, the second article having been struck out, the treaty contained no provision in regard to these claims, and of course that was an end of them. We had abandoned negotiation upon them. All that Bonaparte's addendum at the end of his ratification amounted to was that he announced it as his understanding or the understanding of the French Government that the pretensions on both sides were ended.

Sir, we abandoned negotiation in favor of these claims against France because we could not collect them after doing our best for that purpose. We struck out the second article of the treaty because there was good reason for striking it out. What was that article? It read as follows:

> The ministers plenipotentiary of the two respective parties, not being able to agree at present concerning the treaty of alliance of February 6, 1778, the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date, and the convention of the 14th of November, 1788, nor upon the indemnities on either side due or claimed, the parties will negotiate—> the parties will negotiate further on these subjects at a convenient time, and until they may have agreed upon those points the said treaties and convention shall have no operation.

Those old treaties were, therefore, out of operation by this very section, and it is absurd to say the section was struck out to get rid of them.

What is the meaning of the main provision I have just read, that the parties at a convenient time will negotiate further upon matters of difference? What does that mean? It has been aptly described by one of the French negotiators as an indefinite postponement of the claims. What does an indefinite postponement mean? It means that the subject of controversy is turned over to a time which will probably never come. In a legislative body, when you wish to get rid of a measure without voting directly upon it, you postpone it indefinitely, and it is never heard of again. The parties were to negotiate at a convenient time, but no time was fixed. No time could probably ever arrive when both parties would deliberately enter upon another fruitless negotiation. We had presented those claims; France denied her liability and maintained that they were war claims (and so far as that position is concerned, it seems impregnable), and it was not expected that time would ever come for renewed negotiation upon them.

I say that the second article of the treaty, upon the evidence to be found in recorded documents, was a diplomatic device to postpone this subject forever. The recorded proceedings of the negotiation prove that both parties understood these claims were given up forever before the treaty was sent home.

Mr. Webster admits in his speech of 1835 that there was no cause for complaint against our Government until the Senate struck out that provision of the treaty. Everybody else must admit that the Government had a right to give up these claims when circumstances became desperate and we could not collect them. We certainly had that right. Having come to a point when the claims could not be collected and when there were good reasons for not having a sham pretense held out that there would be a settlement in the future, the Senate honestly struck out the article.

I have now, as I conceive, shown, first, that upon the grounds set up by the claimants themselves those claimants can only claim against the United States the actual pecuniary value of their claims in February, 1801, when the treaty of 30th September, 1800, was amended by the United States Senate; that the value of the claims being then merely nominal, and the evidence of subsequent events plainly proving that France would never have paid a dollar of the claims, it is an inevitable conclusion that upon the showing of the claimants themselves their present enormous demand upon the Treasury of the United States is both unlawful and unjust. If the Government took their property for public use (which I wholly deny), then, as that property was of no appreciable value at the time of appropriation, the present demand made upon the public Treasury has no foundation in law, morals, or justice.

I have shown, in the second place, that the treaties of 1778 were extinct—were dead treaties in the year 1800 when the new treaty negotiation took place. They had been broken and set aside by France, and by our own act of Congress of 7th July, 1798, they were lawfully and properly declared to be no longer binding upon the Government or people of the United States. From this it follows that the argument of the claimants that we abandoned negotiation upon their claims in consideration that France would release us from the old treaties is wholly unfounded in fact, and can not support their present demand upon our Government.

In the third place, these treaties were necessarily abrogated by actual hostilities between the two governments in 1798 and afterwards. In 1800 hostilities were partially suspended, pending negotiation, and the relation of war between us and France was terminated on the 30th of September of that year by the signing of a treaty of peace.

If, then, war existed these were war claims; they were not legal demands on France under the law of nations and could not be enforced except by the application of a measure of coercion which was beyond our power.

I say, in concluding my argument, that from my point of view these claims are invalid:

First, because the rule of damages which could be applied to them if they stood sustained by facts and inferences as alleged by their supporters, would give them only some nominal amount, if any amount at all.

Second, the argument that we gave up these claims in order to get rid of the old treaties is an argument that would affect the Government of the United States, is quite unfounded and false.

Lastly, when independent nations wage war, the losses suffered by individuals in the war are without redress unless provided for in the treaty of peace. They are not legal rights which survive hostilities.

Another word. In some mysterious way the argument is attempted to be set up that although there was war, these acts of Congress did not extend to and cover the French capture of our ships. Pray, what has that to do with our question? If France made war on us—for one party can make war—if she made war upon us and we committed no aggressions in return, still the laws of war applied to the situation. Only one thing is to be observed: When war is limited, either as to its subject-matter or territorial location, the public laws of war have force only so far as they are applicable to the situation. The fact of war must be admitted in the present case, and its effect upon those claims is plain enough.

Admitting war, any attempt to bolster up these claims as not included with its operation is an attempt to wriggle out of an inevitable and insuperable difficulty in argument.

Mr. Chairman, I know very well what is the feeling in this House regarding these claims, and with a suggestion of it I will conclude. Here are over 2,300 vessels and over 5,000 claims; men of 1795 and 1799 who claimed to be injured have long since passed from the scene of action; their children have appeared upon the stage, played their brief part, and have passed away. Their grandchildren, many of them, have already gone to the land of the silent; and yet these claims are here, and they contend for the mastery in this House.

Sir, the names of the present claimants, amounting up into the thousands, scattered along the Atlantic seaboard, some of them inland, have been collected; they are known, their post-office addresses are known to the managers of these claims, and they have been supplied with circulars informing them that the great engagement upon their ancient demands is to come off here in Congress in this month of the year 1888, and they are advised to write to their members of Congress upon this subject and call attention to the claims; and like the leaves of autumn, when the forest is denuded by early frost, these little missives have come from all quarters of the country to members of Congress in order that irresponsible private solicitation, in the form of letters from members' districts, shall become a controlling influence to pass this bill.

Let us see to it that our votes as honest representatives of the people shall not be filched from us by individual importunity directed by individual interest.

For one I shall stand against this and all like influences, and looking only to the merits of this question, to the honor of our country, and to the facts of history, according to my honest convictions upon this subject, I shall be immovably opposed to this enormous bill of plunder and greed. [Applause.]

Mr. LONG. I now yield twenty-five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania occupied one hour and seven minutes.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, one of the ablest associate justices that ever sat on the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States, and whose great works upon law questions constitute him probably not only the ablest writer of the day in the age in which he lived, but whose views, especially upon subjects which pertain to equitable adjudication, were unsurpassed both for their research, learning, and eloquence—I allude, sir, to that admirable man and splendid jurist who has left such an immortal memory behind him as endears him to every citizen of the land, wherever he may live, Judge Joseph Story, of Massachusetts, before our Congress had passed a law giving quasi jurisdiction to the Court of Claims, said:

> It was a disgrace to the freest nation on the earth that our citizens had no tribunal in which they could institute a suit upon a claim, however just, against the Government, while there was no government so despotic and monarchical in its tendencies across the water under which the humblest citizen could not enter its tribunals and demand justice and a judgment against the government.

And, Mr. Chairman, that remark was strikingly illustrated in the memorable case which came before one of England's criminal courts when two of the greatest bankers in the land, connected with the nobility, were arraigned before it to have judgment pronounced upon them, and when all the influence of the great hereditary lines to which they belonged was brought to bear upon the court in their behalf, the judge in passing sentence of condemnation upon them remarked that "it was the glory of the English law that there was no man so high that it could not reach him, nor was there a man so poor and humble that he could appeal to it in vain."

That stigma has passed away from our Government only in a qualified sense. Up to the time when the Congress of the United States established the Court of Claims with its five judges, with power to decide upon certain questions to be intrusted to them in the limited jurisdiction with which they were invested, there was in this country no tribunal in which a citizen of the United States could enter to bring suit against his Government or set up his complaint against it. He was entitled under the Constitution to the right of petition, and it was the only manner in which he could present his claim against his own Government; and the claims known as the French spoliation claims were brought before Congress by petition within a few months after the signing of the treaty of 1801.

They have continued from that day to this petitioning Congress, persistently knocking at the doors of Congress and humbly begging the Government to give them a hearing upon the justice and the merits of their claims. They were denied it, sir, for nearly a century. They were refused even to be heard in any tribunal of the Government's own creation until in 1885, the Congress of the United States seemingly having its conscience awakened and probed by these constant appeals, gave to the Court of Claims the power to hear the claims of these petitioners, of those people who since 1801 had begged in vain of the Government of the United States to give them a hearing; and Congress not having time to consider them, a subject dwelt on at length by my friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] in his remarks a few days ago, Congress finding it had not the time to go into the consideration of them, agreed that a tribunal of its own creation should hear them, where its own Attorney-General was authorized to appear and represent it and resist every unjust claim against the Government. The Court of Claims was designated as the tribunal to which it would refer them to ascertain their amount, ownership, and validity, and if they had been transferred or assigned, to whom transferred or assigned and for what consideration.

I repeat, sir, it was not until 1885 that the Congress of the United States agreed to create this tribunal, and they passed the bill under which this finding has now been sent back to the Congress of the United States for adjudication. And in this connection on page 712 of the RECORD of the second session of the Forty-eighth Congress will be found the yea-and-nay vote by which this bill was passed by Congress, which I will ask to insert in my remarks as it appears upon the RECORD, to show, sir, what was the sentiment of Congress when the bill was passed, the object and purpose of which was to refer these claims to the tribunal of the Government's own creation, in which it was represented by its own Attorney-General, as an indication of the sense of Congress in passing the act in question, and as having a direct bearing on the question now presented as to whether or not the pending bill should become law. But let me first read the bill upon which the vote was taken. It is as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That such citizens of the United States, or their legal representatives, as had valid claims to indemnity upon the French Government arising out of illegal captures, detentions, seizures, condemnations, and confiscations prior to the ratification of the convention between the United States and the French Republic concluded on the 30th day of September, 1800, the ratifications of which were exchanged on the 31st day of July following, may apply by petition to the Court of Claims within two years from the passage of this act, as hereinafter provided: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not extend to such claims as were embraced in the convention between the United States and the French Republic concluded on the 30th day of April, 1803; nor to such claims growing out of the acts of France as were allowed and paid, in whole or in part, under the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Spain concluded on the 22d day of February, 1819; nor to such claims as were allowed, in whole or in part, under the provisions of the treaty between the United States and France concluded on the 4th day of July, 1831.
> SEC. 2. That the court is hereby authorized to make all needful rules and regulations, not contravening the laws of the land or the provisions of this act, for executing the provisions hereof.
> SEC. 3. That the court shall examine and determine the validity and amount of all the claims included within the description above mentioned, together with their present ownership, and, if by assignee, the date of the assignment, with the consideration paid therefor: Provided, That in the course of their proceedings they shall receive all suitable testimony on oath or affirmation, and all other proper evidence, historic and documentary, concerning the same; and they shall decide upon the validity of said claims according to the rules of law, municipal and international, and the treaties of the United States applicable to the same, and shall report all such conclusions of fact and law as in their judgment may affect the liability of the United States therefor.

SEC. 4. That the court shall cause notice of all petitions presented under this act to be served on the Attorney-General of the United States, who shall be authorized, by himself or his assistant, to examine witnesses, to cause testimony to be taken, to have access to all testimony taken under this act, and to be heard by the court. He shall resist all claims presented under this act by all proper legal defenses.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the State to procure, as soon as possible after the passage of this act, through the American minister at Paris or otherwise, all such evidence and documents relating to the claims above mentioned as can be obtained from abroad, which, together with the like evidence and documents on file in the Department of State, or which may be filed in the Department, may be used before the court by the claimants interested therein, or by the United States, but the same shall not be removed from the files of the court, and after the hearings are closed the records of the proceedings of the court and documents produced before them shall be deposited in the Department of State.

SEC. 6. That on the first Monday of December in each year the court shall report to Congress, for final action, the facts found by it, and its conclusions in all cases which it has disposed of and not previously reported. Such finding and report of the court shall be taken to be merely advisory as to the law and facts found, and shall not conclude either the claimant or Congress; and all claims not finally presented to said court within the period of two years limited by this act shall be forever barred; and nothing in this act shall be construed as committing the United States to the payment of any such claims.

While this bill was under discussion in the House, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Cox, of North Carolina, speaking in advocacy of the bill and of the convention of the 21st of December, 1801, favorably quotes Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State under Washington and Adams, as follows:

Thus the Government bartered the just claim of our merchants on France to obtain a relinquishment of the French claim for a restoration of the old treaties, especially the burdensome treaty of alliance, by which we were bound to guaranty the French territories in America. On this view of the case it would seem that the merchants have an equitable claim for indemnity from the United States. * * * It follows, then, that if the relinquishment had not been made the present French Government would be responsible; consequently the relinquishment by our own Government having been made in consideration that the French Government relinquished its demands for a renewal of the old treaties, then it seems clear that, as our Government applied the merchants' property to buy off those old treaties, the sums so applied should be reimbursed.

Chief-Justice Marshall, in conversation with Mr. Preston, of South Carolina, said that "having been connected with the events of the period and conversant with the circumstances under which the claims arose, he was, from his own knowledge satisfied that there was the strongest obligations on the Government to compensate the sufferers by the French spoliations."

Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, instructed Mr. Pickering, then minister to the court of Spain, as follows:

The claims from which France was released were admitted by France, and the release was for a valuable consideration in a correspondent release of the United States for certain claims on them.

The vote on the bill submitting these claims to the Court of Claims for decision was as follows:

It will thus be seen, Mr. Chairman, that the bill passed by a vote of 181 yeas to 71 nays, more than a two-thirds vote by a few votes, and among the distinguished gentlemen who voted for that bill I find the name of my friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS]. Now, that gentleman says that he wants the Supreme Court of the United States to pass upon that question before Congress should consider the findings of the tribunal which they themselves have created, and they desire to amend this bill so as to require that finding and that judgment to be taken by either party to the Supreme Court of the United States and the Supreme Court of the United States should be allowed to pass upon it. But no such suggestion was then made, and my distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. OATES] has even voted in the affirmative. Why was there not a proposition then made that there should be an appeal to the Supreme Court? Simply, I presume, Mr. Chairman, because it was designed and intended to pass this legislative enactment of the Congress of the United States, to get all the facts and forms of law in a court having all the appliances for investigating the facts and determining the amount of each claim and have it reported back to the Congress of the United States.

Now, gentlemen say in the first instance that it was intended to have an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States before these claims should be paid. They have been passed upon by this very tribunal which has determined the facts, settled the amount and fairness of the claims and the ownership, and reported them back to the House as the findings of the Court of Claims. It did all this from the early inception of the cases down to the present time. It has investigated all the cases with great patience, and it has reported back a certain number which they found to be cases in which the parties had actually sustained a loss which amounted to so many dollars and cents. And yet my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW], who has just concluded his subtle argument upon this subject, says in his opposition to them these claims had no valid commercial value by the finding of the Court of Claims when they were transferred to these parties and their descendants. We have the gentleman from Arkansas saying that you ought not to pay these claims until they have been determined by the court of last resort. That court has powers under the Constitution, but it is restricted to certain cases in its jurisdiction, and it would not be proper to have it enlarged beyond what the Constitution gives. The Court of Claims passed upon this matter. They have reported back to this House that certain of these claims are just and proper claims to be paid.

It will thus be seen by the yea-and-nay vote which I have embodied in my remarks that the Congress of the United States, so far from agreeing with my distinguished and learned friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW], and with the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], who spoke upon this subject the other day, that these claims had no commercial value and no commercial existence, and that they had been abrogated by the existence of war between France and this country; the House decided by a two-thirds vote that these claims had such validity and that they ought to be considered by this tribunal to which the Congress of the United States had referred them. In the debate it will be found that the question arose as to why these claims were not referred under what is known as the Bowman act, for the purpose of ascertaining the facts and amounts, and that it was necessary to pass this act. It passed by a two-thirds vote of the House on the proposition for the passage of the bill.

Now, sir, to go back to the question as to whether or not there was, according to the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW], an absolute cessation of all treaty relations between the United States and France owing to the war which sprang up between Great Britain and France. It will be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that this treaty of 1778 was made when this country, just then struggling for its freedom from British rule, and its own independence; when Washington himself, almost despondent at the terrible disasters that had befallen his army in and about Valley Forge, declared that unless an alliance could be formed with some European power, that his small and rapidly decreasing army must dissolve, perish, and disappear. What country was it, sir, that came to our rescue in this trying hour of the infancy of the Republic? It was the country to which the noble and gallant Lafayette belonged, that came to our rescue, and it was due to this alliance with France in all probability that you now sit here a free and independent Congress to pass upon the questions and interests that concern the development of our country.

It was under these circumstances, sir, that this treaty was made. Is it wonderful, therefore, that it should have been favorable to France? Is it wonderful that we were willing to guaranty the integrity of the French possessions in all the Western hemisphere? And when France and England were thrown into war, is it wonderful that France should have said to us: "We helped you in the day and hour of your great peril; you made treaties with us which made it incumbent on you to aid us;" and if, pursuing the line which the judgment and discretion of Washington marked out for our country, to avoid all entangling alliances, we refused to make a similar treaty with France, a refusal which at that time subjected us to a great deal of abuse, is it wonderful that the French should have said they thought they ought to be aided by the country whose independence and freedom their swords and their valor had done so much to achieve?

But, sir, is it true, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] has said, that these treaties are dead? And if they are dead, is it true that they died of the cause which he suggests? Sir, we have the evidence presented by the history of that time, and by the very elimination of the second article of the treaty, to show that so far from these treaties being considered dead they were considered as living; they were considered as existing; they were considered as binding.

And that second article of the treaty of 1800 simply proposed, as to topics upon which the parties could not agree, that that subject-matter of difference should be reserved for future diplomatic negotiation and adjustment between the two countries.

Mr. LONG. Thereby recognizing the existence of the treaty.

Mr. HOOKER. Thereby recognizing the existence of the treaty itself. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania read the treaty, I followed him in the document which I have before me, to see what it proposed, but before I go to that I beg leave to call the attention of the House to what was said by the men who were the French plenipotentiaries in this negotiation. The concluding paragraph of the basis suggested by the plenipotentiaries of France is as follows:

The indemnities which shall be due by France to citizens of the United States shall be paid by the United States, in return for which France yields the exclusive privilege resulting from the seventeenth and twenty-second articles of the treaty of commerce and from the rights of guaranty of the seventh article of the treaty of alliance.

That is signed by Bonaparte and by Fleurieu and by Roederer, the last a man who has been alluded to as a great French jurist and diplomat, whose opinions are entitled to so much weight.

That was their opinion as to whether or not these treaties were dead; that was their opinion as to whether they were still in existence. And when you come to look at the second article of the treaty, which was stricken out by the Senate, you find that they had made this provision. I now read that second article:

The ministers plenipotentiary of the two parties not being able to agree at present respecting the treaty of alliance of February 6, 1778, the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date, and the convention of the 14th of September, 1788, nor upon the indemnities mutually due or claimed, the parties will negotiate further on these subjects at a convenient time; and until they may have agreed upon these points the said treaty and conventions shall have no operation, and the relations of the two countries shall be regulated as follows.

Then come the other provisions of the treaty. There was a distinct declaration that there were claims on the part of the French Government against the United States, and a distinct declaration that there were claims on the part of citizens of the United States against France.

Mr. LONG. And that the treaties were in existence.

Mr. HOOKER. And that the treaties had a valid existence. Sir, it has been said by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW], who has just closed his speech, that these are hoary claims, that they are aged claims. Are they any less right or just because they are old? Should they be rejected by the Congress of the United States for that reason?

If we have allowed decade after decade to pass from 1801 down to the present time, if we have allowed generation after generation to pass away who were entitled to these claims, the original claimants and their descendants, is it any argument to the enlightened conscience and to the just sense of right of an American Congress to say that because we have persisted in wrong for nearly one hundred years, therefore we should persist in it for another hundred years? I say to these gentlemen whose names are recorded in favor of the law giving the Court of Claims, the right of jurisdiction upon this question, if you did not intend to make a promise to the ear which was to be broken to the hope, if you did not intend that, then you ought to have raised all these objections when that bill was pending in this House, and you ought to have voted down the proposition to refer these matters to the Court of Claims, because, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania is correct, you were referring to that court claims the subject-matter of which had no value, and the assumed beneficiaries of which were nefarious claimants of something to which they had no right.

Yet the finding of your court answers him. Your tribunal composed of five enlightened and able jurists, sitting for long weeks and months upon these cases, taking proof for the claimants and proof for the Government, tell you that certain of these claims which they have investigated are just, valid, subsisting claims against the Government of the United States.

Mr. ROGERS. Will it disturb my friend from Mississippi if I interrupt him long enough to correct a statement of his with reference to myself, and which does me injustice?

Mr. HOOKER. Certainly, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROGERS. I am told that during my absence from the Hall my friend from Mississippi said—inadvertently, of course, for he would not intentionally misstate any fact—that in the Forty-eighth Congress I voted for the bill under which these claims were sent to the Court of Claims. I was at that time a very young and inexperienced member, but I did not vote that way. My friend has confused me with General Rogers, of New York, who was then a member. I voted in the negative.

Mr. HOOKER. I make the correction with a great deal of pleasure. I had supposed, without looking at the initials of the members voting, that the vote of my friend from Arkansas was in favor of the bill. I find, however, that he is right in the statement he has just made; he did vote in the negative, not in the affirmative. But when he voted in the negative, he voted against two-thirds of the House, embracing some of the ablest members on both sides. Two-thirds of this House, without reference to party, and including some of the most prominent men on either political side, voted to refer these claims to the Court of Claims.

I submit that my young friend from Arkansas, with his assiduity and his legal acumen, ought then to have made his proposition in favor of obtaining a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upon these matters. That was the time when any member who believed that none of these claims should be paid until the Supreme Court of the United States had passed judgment upon the findings of the Court of Claims should have offered an amendment and insisted upon it. By a two-thirds vote of this House you passed an act designating the Court of Claims the tribunal to pass upon the claims of these parties.

Now, one word as to who these parties are. My distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] stated in his concluding remarks that he was going to give you this matter in a nutshell; and he said that members were actuated in favor of these claims by the persistency of clients or constituents behind them. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I have in my district a single constituent interested in these claims. I am aware that lower down in the State of Mississippi there are some gentlemen interested in the adjudication of these questions.

My friend has also said that if you will look further you will find that insurance agents are some of the men who are pressing these claims. Sir, when we had before us the distribution of the Geneva award, we decided, as you remember, to pay millions of dollars to insurance agents, because, according to justice and law, they were subrogated to the rights and claims of those whom they insured. It does not matter therefore who owns these claims. When this same argument was made in Congress before, at the time the bill referring these claims to the Court of Claims was under consideration, a gentleman not accustomed to speaking in this Hall, without being listened to with great respect, replied to this accusation that speculators and men who wanted to make money out of these claims had become the possessors of them. Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania, to whom I refer, said at that time:

I will state to the gentleman that few, if any, of these claims have passed out of the hands of the original parties or their heirs. It is safe to assume that nineteen-twentieths of them are in the hands of the legal representatives of the original claimants.

I can say that all of these claims of which I have any knowledge in my region of country in Mississippi are in the hands of the legitimate descendants of the original claimants, who for a century have been denied their rights.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] relies upon the case of Bass vs. Tingey to establish the fact that a war existed between France and the United States as a proof of the invalidity of these claims. The case which he cites was one for salvage, the claimant being entitled to a higher rate of salvage if war existed. All publicists divide war into two general classes: First, a general war, which renders all the citizens of one country enemies of all the citizens of the other, and therefore invalidates and destroys all private claims and all demands for reclamation. The other is a partial or limited war, confined therefore to either particular classes of persons or to some particular locality. The Supreme Court, in the case which he cites, observes this distinction and lays it down very clearly, and held that a limited and partial war existed between France and the United States; that that war was confined to the armed vessels of France.

It was not even a maritime war, for it did not affect the private vessels of France in any way whatever. It was limited to those armed vessels of France which were within the jurisdiction of the United States or on the high seas. And this was exactly the extent of the hostilities authorized by the act of Congress, and it specifically limited the power of vessels of the United States to seize French armed vessels within the jurisdiction of the United States and on the high seas. They could not, and as a matter of fact they did not, attack any private vessel of France anywhere, and they attacked only the armed vessels of France and them only on the high seas. That such a war as this existed no one denies; but that such a war in any wise affected private rights or the claims for reclamation for these citizens is in contravention of the settled law of nations as laid down by all writers on that subject from Vattel to Wheaton.

This fact is shown by the ultimata in the instructions of the Secretary of State to our envoys, published with the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG]. That all the condemnations were made on the ground of violations of neutrality is shown by the decrees published by the same gentleman and by the decrees of condemnation, one of them dated two days before the signing of the treaty, which was produced here by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL], and the rescission of the second article by the Senate of the United States; and the condition on which the treaty was ratified by Napoleon, with that rescission, is conclusive to any mind familiar with the principles of international law that the claims were recognized by both parties at the time of the making of the treaties as being subsisting, valid claims.

My friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] has placed much stress upon the statement that these American vessels, many of them, were armed, and armed under the authority of an act of Congress by a commission granted by the President. That is true, and what if they did? Does any man suppose that a vessel carrying a small armament and a large cargo would seek to make seizures? For what then were they armed other than self-defense? I will not argue that they had a right to arm for self-defense, but I will answer that proposition in the language of Mr. Jefferson, Secretary of State, who in a letter to Minister Morris, dated August 16, 1793, uses this characteristic and forcible language, to wit:

Though a merchant vessel has arms to defend herself in time of war, in the course of her regular commerce, this no more makes her a privateer than a husbandman following his plow in time of war, with a knife or pistol in his pocket, is thereby made a soldier.

But, Mr. Chairman, let us look more closely to the decision of Bass vs. Tingey, 1 Dallas Supreme Court Reports, so confidently relied on by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] to sustain their views on these French spoliation claims.

The court at that time consisted of five judges, Hon. Oliver Ellsworth, of Connecticut, being the Chief-Justice. The four associate justices delivered each his opinion in the case. These opinions were delivered at the August term, 1800. This decision involved the construction of the act of Congress June 28, 1798, and the subsequent act of March 2, 1799, as to amount of salvage allowed on recapture of a vessel belonging to citizens of the United States or to citizens and subjects in amity with the United States.

The question involved in this case, so far as it is applicable to the validity and justice of these French spoliation claims, was "whether France was an enemy of the United States," and if so, "whether she was a general and public enemy," or "whether the war was a partial and limited war, confined to particular classes of persons, or to some particular locality." Now, in view of this statement of the question, what did the court decide in the case of Bass vs. Tingey?

Mr. Justice Washington, in his opinion, says:

It may, I believe, be safely laid down that by contention, by force between two nations in external matters under the authority of their respective governments is not only war, but public war. If it be declared in form it is called solemn, and is of the perfect kind, because one whole nation is at war with another whole nation, and all the members of the nation declaring war are authorized to commit hostilities against all the members of the other in every place and under every circumstance. In such a war all the members act under a general authority, and all the rights and consequences of war attach to their condition. But hostility may subsist between two nations more confined in its nature and extent, being limited as to places, persons, and things, and this is more properly termed imperfect war, because not solemn, and because those who are authorized to commit hostilities act under special authority, and can go no further than to the extent of their commission.

And this learned justice further says—

That such a declaration (of war) by Congress might have constituted a perfect state of war, which was not intended by the Government.

Mr. Justice Chase, who presided in the circuit court which tried the case of Bass vs. Tingey, is more explicit and precise in his decision of the case. He says:

What, then, is the nature of the contest subsisting between America and France? In my judgment it is a limited, partial war. Congress has not declared war in general terms; but Congress has authorized hostilities on the high seas, by certain persons, in certain cases. There is no authority given to commit hostilities on land, to capture unarmed French vessels, nor even to capture French armed vessels lying in a French port; and the authority is not given indiscriminately to any citizen of America against any citizen of France, but only to citizens appointed by commissions, or exposed to immediate outrage and violence. So far it is unquestionably a partial war. But nevertheless it is a public war, on account of the public authority from which it emanates.

There are four acts, authorized by our Government, that are demonstrative of a state of war. A belligerent power has the right, by the law of nations, to search a neutral vessel, and upon suspicion of a violation of her neutral obligation, to seize and carry her into port for further examination. But by the acts of Congress an American vessel is authorized—

First. To resist the search of a French public vessel;

Second. To capture any vessel that should attempt by force to compel submission to a search;

Third. To recapture any American vessel seized by a French vessel; and Fourth. To capture any French armed vessel wherever found on the high seas.

This suspension of the law of nations, this right of capture and recapture, can only be authorized by an act of the Government, which is in itself an act of hostility. But still it is restrained or limited hostility, and there are, undoubtedly, many rights attached to a general war which do not attach to this modification of the powers of defense and aggression.

Mr. Justice Patterson, in delivering his opinion in the case of Bass vs. Tingey, says:

The United States and the French Republic are in a qualified state of hostility. An imperfect war or a war as to certain objects and to a certain extent exists between the two nations, and this modified warfare is authorized by the constitutional authority of our country. It is a war quoad hoc. As far as Congress tolerated and authorized the war on our part, so far may we proceed in hostile operations. It is a maritime war, a war at sea, as to certain purposes. The national armed vessels of France attack and capture the national armed vessels of the United States; vessels of the United States are expressly authorized and directed to attack, subdue, and take the national armed vessels of France, and also to recapture American vessels. It is therefore a public war between the two nations, qualified on our part in the manner prescribed by the constitutional organ of our country.

It will thus be seen that all the judges delivering opinions in this case agreed that there was a limited and restricted condition of hostilities, and not an open and declared and solemn war; and France herself, by the solemn admission of her plenipotentiaries, agreed that these were just and valid claims of the private citizens of America against the French Government, and in order to get rid of these claims agreed to give up the claims which she held by virtue of the treaties of 1878, and the United States then used the private claims of her citizens for public purposes and became liable to her citizens for the private property thus taken for public uses.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there were other spoliations committed by the French armed vessels under the Berlin and Milan decrees issued by the French Government, for which France made payment at a subsequent period.

Every act of our Government and every acknowledgment of the French Government and all the public declarations of our plenipotentiaries show that our citizens have been spoliated of large amounts of property, destroyed on the high seas by French armed vessels, and that the owners of this property and their descendants have never ceased to demand their rights, in the only way that they could demand them—by humble petition for justice to their own Government; and when that Government, after nearly a century of delay, has by solemn act of Congress at last created a tribunal to pass upon these long-deferred claims and that tribunal has made its decision in favor of these claims we are met with the plea, first, that these claims never had any commercial value; and, secondly, that they are hoary with age, and therefore the Government of the United States should repudiate them. It is a plea, Mr. Chairman, dishonorable to and unworthy of this great Government dealing with its own citizens. Justice, right, and equitable dealing demand that these long-deferred claims shall be settled now and forever.

Mr. BURNES. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER].

The CHAIRMAN. For what time?

Mr. BURNES. I do not think it necessary to limit him now.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations, having the responsibility for the larger part of our expenditures, have placed in the general deficiency bill, now pending in the Committee of the Whole, an item for the payment of certain French spoliation claims; but the majority of that committee, sitting on this side of the Hall, have stated that they placed these claims in the bill simply out of respect to what they regarded as a peremptory instruction from the House, adopted in December last; and they submit a very able argument against the propriety of the payment of these claims at all.

A bill proposing to grant in these cases, on the recommendation of the Attorney-General, the privilege of an appeal from the Court of Claims, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and just half of the members of the committee acting upon the case, and consisting of gentlemen who sit on this side, have recommended that before any of these claims are paid the principles on which they stand should be determined by the Supreme Court of the United States.

When it is considered that the Government, under the act of 1885, has been sued for over $40,000,000 in these cases, we ought to give some heed to these admonitions from those who have been officially charged with the duty of investigating the subject, and who as members of the majority are responsible to the country. When the history of these spoliations was known of all men Congress could not be induced to provide for their payment. When they had grown old and the facts became obscure, and the claimants had multiplied and replenished the United States, a bill passed appropriating $5,000,000 in final satisfaction of these claims; but Mr. Polk vetoed the bill. A similar bill passed Congress during the administration of Mr. Pierce, but it was vetoed by the President.

By the act of January 20, 1885, these claims were referred to the Court of Claims with the proviso "that they shall decide upon the validity of said claims according to the rules of law, municipal and international, and the treaties of the United States applicable to the same." And it was further provided that the finding and report of the court should be taken to be merely advisory as to the law and facts found, and should not conclude either the claimant or Congress. And out of abundant caution it was further provided that nothing in the act should be construed as committing the United States to the payment of any such claims.

I deny, sir, that that court has determined these claims on the principles which were defined as the rules to regulate their jurisdiction. That court insists that the jurisdiction conferred on it was peculiar and unprecedented in the history of the Government, and that according to the principles of municipal and international law and of the treaties to which reference was made no liability could be attached to the Government; and it took refuge under the idea that by the act of reference political functions were devolved on that tribunal, and it was in some sort made a substitute for Congress to determine the validity and binding effect of these claims on the Government. I cite from the case of William Gray, administrator, vs. United States:

So we reach the end of this opinion as unlike the usual judicial expression in its form and supporting authorities as are the cases before us unlike those ordinarily submitted to a tribunal of the law. We are, however, for the moment invested with some of the powers and jurisdiction belonging to the political branch of the Government, and upon us is imposed an examination not usually or naturally committed to a judicial body. We have been required, not to investigate legal rights, based upon the doctrines and principles of the common law, but to inquire into and to report upon the ethical rights of a citizen against his Government, rights which are never enforceable except by the consent of the sovereign—in this country the legislature—as whose substitute we act to the limited extent prescribed and marked out by the remedial statute.

I insist that the court has transcended the jurisdiction which Congress conferred on it, and instead of making up its judgment on the lines defined by Congress, it has taken upon itself an authority which we never gave it, and has attempted to define the obligation of the Government from a political standpoint.

And, sir, in order to determine this thing the judges of this court have undertaken to give as reasons for this political judgment the opinions of public men here in Congress. They refer to numerous reports of special committees made in the House and in the Senate. They refer us to the opinions of Webster, Clay, Marshall, and Sumner, adducing these political utterances and political authorities as reasons why these claims should be paid.

Congress asked the advice of the court upon the law, and the court has replied with the opinions of Congressmen! We desired law, and they gave us politics. We asked for bread, and they gave us a stone! If I am to follow politicians in this matter, I prefer to follow Wright, and Benton, and Calhoun.

But it may not be unprofitable to glance at the facts ourselves before we decide this most important matter.

It has been claimed that France had grievances against the Government of the United States, and that our citizens had grievances against the Government of France, and that there was such a settlement of conflicting claims as to devolve on the Government of the United States by a sort of political equity the obligation to pay the claims of our citizens.

I deny it, sir. I say after a careful study of all the history of this subject, and of all the precedents upon which I could lay my hands, that I do not believe the Government is under any obligation, legal, equitable, or moral, to pay these claims.

I propose to demonstrate, in the first place, that France had no claims against this Government, and in the second place to show that these claims of private citizens of the United States grew out of acts of war on the part of France for which no redress could be had under any law, municipal or international. It can not be contended that any damages accruing to a citizen out of a state of war can be made the subject of indemnification as a matter of duty on the part of the government to which the citizen owes his allegiance. Denial of such indemnity has been the uniform practice of the United States towards its own citizens. It is the policy we have always maintained in our dealings with our citizens who have suffered, for instance, at the hands of Indian tribes. In 1836 a portion of the Creek Nation of Indians, situated in Alabama, broke from their reservation, pillaged and devastated a few counties in that State and in the adjacent State of Georgia.

The President of the United States appointed a commission to go down to this wasted territory and take proof of the damages which the citizens had suffered; and the report of this commission was made to the Secretary of War involving damages to the extent of a million or two of dollars; and when the Legislature of the State of Alabama met a most eloquent memorial was framed and sent to the Congress of the United States bearing upon the subject. It went to the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives, and that committee, after a careful and learned investigation, in the year 1838, reported to the House that the outrages had been committed in a state of war between the United States and the Creek Nation, and consequently being war damages the Government could not pay them. I cite the report:

> The Government is equally bound to protect the property of our citizens employed in commerce as it is to give protection to those whose capital is employed in agriculture. If the Malays, or pirates, should seize a vessel, murder the crew, and take the cargo to their use, no one would say the United States were bound to remunerate the loss. A misunderstanding may exist between this Government and a foreign power, by which the millions employed by our citizens in commerce and navigation may be swept from the ocean, and rendered valueless; and yet no one would remunerate the sufferers from the Treasury of the United States. Thousands of such sufferers now exist and they have combated poverty for years without relief.

The proposition laid down in that report has always been, so far as I know, adhered to by Congress. See a similar report from the Committee on Claims of the Senate in American State Papers, volume Claims, page 223. As late, sir, as the administration of General Grant, when the claim of Milton Best from the State of Kentucky had passed both Houses of Congress, the President vetoed the bill upon the ground that the damages Best suffered were inflicted during a state of war, and that no country could afford to pay war damages.

It is the principle not only of municipal law, but also the law of the American Congress and the political departments of the Government, and the same principle has been of universal recognition in every country in the world.

And it has been conceded that if these spoliations by the French were acts of war, no indemnity could have been recovered from France, and the treaty devolved on this Government no liability to the claimants.

But the argument is that our Government had incurred liabilities to France by infractions of the treaty of 1778, and then by the treaty of 1800–1801 settled these liabilities with the claims of our citizens against France, and the existence of war between the two countries during the period of the depredations is denied.

It must be borne in mind that but a short period had elapsed since the successful termination of the war for American independence, but the people of New England, who at that time loved an unfettered commerce, had sent their cruisers all over the world. They had a magnificent merchant marine and as gallant tars as the world had ever seen. They carried their vessels into every sea between the poles. They were the common carriers of that period, when other maritime countries were involved in disastrous war.

The United States became the granary for the great powers that contended for supremacy on the continent of Europe, and hence it was under these favoring conditions that these sailors of America acquired domination on the sea.

And the merchants of Boston, Providence, Baltimore, and Philadelphia, in restoring their commerce with the Old World, very naturally sought that country which spoke the same language as themselves, and with which they had had close relations prior to the Revolution. A very prosperous trade with England ensued during this era so auspicious for American merchants. But in 1793 the terrible events of the French revolution began. The government with which the United States had made a treaty of alliance in 1778 went down in utter ruin, the King and the Queen of France were put to death and the capital of that great country was ruled by a mob. Lafayette fled from France and his son was sent to General Washington for protection.

Anarchy, the mob, the directory, the guillotine, Robespiere, Marat, and Danton ruled in Paris for years. How was it possible to maintain diplomatic relations with such a country? Genet, the first minister accredited by the revolutionary government to the United States, treated Washington and the Government of this country with open contempt and defiance. At the same time our merchantmen on the high seas were seized, searched, and pillaged by French cruisers. War was raging between France on the one hand and England and other powers of Europe on the other. Under these extraordinary circumstances the Government of the United States had to take care of its own rights and the rights of its citizens as best it could. George Washington himself, through his Secretary of State, Timothy Pickering, in 1797, made an elaborate defence of his administration against the charges which the French minister made against our Government. It is too long for me to read, but of this document, which Washington commended as the plain truth, I quote a concluding paragraph:

> From the foregoing statement we trust it will appear that there has been no attempt in the Government of the United States to violate our treaty or weaken our engagements with France; that whatever resistance it has opposed to the measures of her agents, the maintenance of the laws and sovereignty of the United States, and their neutral obligations, have rendered indispensable; that it has never acquiesced in any acts violating our rights or interfering with the advantages stipulated to France, but, on the contrary, has opposed them by all the means in its power; that it has withheld no succors from France that were compatible with the duties of neutrality to grant; that as well by their independent political rights as by the express provisions of the commercial treaty with France, the United States were at full liberty to enter into commercial treaties with any other nation, and consequently with Great Britain; that no facts manifesting a partiality to that country have been, and I add that none such can be, produced.

I insist, when gentlemen arraign this Government for its liabilities to France and its treatment of the French people, that some attention at least ought to be paid to the defense of this Government which the first President himself gave to the Congress and to the world.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask my friend if our Government through her representatives did not offer France eight millions of francs on account of the injuries done her by failure to fulfill our treaty stipulations.

Mr. BURNES. No, sir.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. The gentleman from Massachusetts has got his facts somewhat mixed. Mr. Ellsworth and the other commissioners suggested something of that kind to the French commissioners; but it had not been authorized by our Government, and was at once rejected. To insist that the United States had damaged France would be an impeachment of Washington's veracity.

The French cruisers seized and plundered our ships, alleging that the ships carried goods of the enemy, although the treaty of 1778 contained the distinct stipulation that free ships should make free goods. That was a violation of the treaty of 1778, which, according to all codes, municipal and international, and according to the decision of the Court of Claims itself, entitled the Government of the United States to regard the treaty of 1778 as no longer binding.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], who argued this case with so much plausibility, insisted that one party to a treaty could not annul the treaty without the consent of the other. Mr. Chairman, that learned and able gentleman has not read the opinion of the Court of Claims, on which he lays the chief stress for the support of these claims, for that court distinctly held that either party could, for any violation, consider the treaty as at an end. I cite a paragraph of the opinion of the Court of Claims in the case of William R. Hooper, administrator, vs. The United States:

> A treaty which on its face is of indefinite duration and which contains no clause providing for its termination may be annulled by one of the parties under certain circumstances. As between the nations it is in its nature a contract, and if the consideration fail, for example, or if its important provisions be broken by one party, the other may at its option declare it terminated.

Mr. LONG. And take the consequences, of course.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia (continuing the reading):

> The United States have so held in regard to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as to which Mr. Frelinghuysen, then Secretary of State, wrote Mr. Hall, minister in Central America, July 19, 1884: "The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was voidable at the option of the United States. This, I think, has been demonstrated fully on two grounds: First, that the consideration of the treaty having failed, its object never having been accomplished, the United States did not receive that for which it covenanted; and second, that Great Britain has persistently violated her agreement not to colonize the Central American coast."

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I wish to ask the gentleman if that proviso is not of the same nature as a contract with a mortgage, where the party of the first part agrees to pay the party of the second part, say, $5,000 in one year and $5,000 in two years, with a proviso that is he fails in his first payment there shall be an option to declare the entire amount due. Now, the courts hold that unless affirmative action is taken on that option the contract is binding, even though there is a failure to make the first payment.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Now, what is the gentleman's question?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. My question is whether this case is not precisely like that, and whether the Government of the United States did not fail to declare the abrogation of the treaty?

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, my honorable friend from Illinois is endeavoring to treat this controversy between nations according to the standard which prevails in the courts of a country governed purely by municipal law. In these matters of dispute between nations, each nation is treated as a sovereign, bound only in its honor to the observance of the treaty, for the enforcement of which there is no international tribunal. Each nation is the judge of the measure of its own rights under the treaty; taking, of course, the alternative of that last resort which every nation has for the infraction of a treaty. But it has always been held in every civilized country on earth that a sovereign which is a party to an international compact can, for a plain violation of the terms of that compact, either go to war with the nation violating it, or else acquiescing in its annullment, treat it as null and void.

The principle I have stated is the principle which governs in international matters, but not in matters subject to municipal law.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. But the point I was making was this, that taking your position to be correct, that France did violate the treaty, still if the United States Government afterwards recognized the treaty as an existing one, that is affirmative proof that it is still in existence notwithstanding the action of France.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. The gentleman cites no facts upon which to base the assumption made in his interrogatory, and the facts do not justify it. In 1798 there was a bill which passed both Houses of Congress and was approved by the President, which declared that on account of these infractions of that treaty by the French Government the treaty was null and void. It was declared to be null and void for the very reasons which I have given, and, Mr. Chairman, the Court of Claims, in the Hooper case to which I have referred, distinctly stated, in addition to the principle which I have already cited, that the courts were absolutely concluded by the declaration of the political department of the Government that those treaties were no longer of any force or effect in this country. In support of this proposition I cite again the opinion of the Court of Claims in the Hooper case:

We are of the opinion that the circumstances justified the United States in annulling the treaties of 1778; that the act was a valid one not only as a municipal statute but as between nations, and that thereafter the compacts were ended.

Inasmuch as we owed nothing to France, we could not have appropriated these claims of our citizens to any public use as claimed, and we therefore owe them no compensation under the Constitution. It was not an appropriation of private claims to the public use, because the Government of France had no claims against us.

Mr. NUTTING. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. If the gentleman will ask me a very short question, I will yield.

Mr. NUTTING. I wish to ask the gentleman a short question; and he being a lawyer, it is a legal question. The Government used these claims to settle with France—used them as a consideration——

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. The gentleman has not heard my argument. He assumes what I utterly deny; and therefore I think he had better forbear the question.

Mr. NUTTING. Well, I assume that the Government in its settlement with France used these claims as a consideration; and having done so——

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. That I deny; and if there were any claims against the Government, it would be very proper for the gentleman to demonstrate that fact.

Mr. NUTTING. Perhaps the gentleman will agree with me on this proposition: If the Government did use these claims as a consideration in the settlement, it is estopped from saying they had no value.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I had not said that these private claims had no value; but I deny that there is any such principle as estoppel in this matter. I deny entirely the principle which the gentleman assumes as the basis of his question; I will not entertain an argument on any such line.

Mr. NUTTING. Does the gentleman deny that the question of estoppel applies as well between nations as between individuals?

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I do. I say that the principle of estoppel applies to no sovereign Government on earth; and if the gentleman is familiar with the rules of law, he will himself assent to my proposition on reflection,

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Let me ask whether there is a single circumstance here which would justify the application of the doctrine of estoppel in a case of this kind, even against a private individual and on the narrow basis adopted in a court of law?

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I think not; but I do not propose to argue the case on that principle.

Mr. NUTTING rose.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I hope my friend will allow me to proceed. He can reply to me in his own time.

Mr. NUTTING. Of course I will not interrupt the gentleman without his consent. I think he is wrong, however, about the question of estoppel. I know he is.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I rest the defense of this Government against France on the vindication of the Government made during the administration of our first President. I now turn to the question whether our citizens had claims against the Government of France, for which indemnity was due to our citizens as a matter of law, municipal or international. I have attempted to show that damages committed during a state of war are never paid for except as a matter of grace; that no government pays damages of that character to its own citizens. It only remains for me, therefore, to show that a state of war existed between the United States and France through the period during which these spoliations were committed.

Gentleman say there was no war. I say there was war. The French commissioners, who were cognizant of the acts of the French Government towards our people and our commerce, stated distinctly in one of their notes to the American commissioners that war was flagrant between the two countries, and that to terminate it there would have to be a treaty of peace between them. And they added that "the rights of war acknowledge no obligation to repair it ravages." So much for the French view of it. John Adams said that one of the decrees of the French Government was itself an open and palpable declaration of war. And during that same administration, when George Washington was called from his retirement, when troops were mustered and enrolled and ships were being built, in his order announcing his assumption of command of the Army, he declared that France was making "war on our defenseless commerce." The Attorney-General said that there existed with France "an actual maritime war authorized by both nations," and the Supreme Court expressed the same opinion. (4 Dallas, 37.) And the American commissioners spoke of the peculiar state of hostility as the "present war."

The CHAIRMAN. The forty minutes which, as the Chair understood, were yielded to the gentleman, have expired.

Mr. BURNES. I yield to the gentleman ten minutes more.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Passing from the political literature of that day, let us look, as a lawyer would say, at the facts from which a state of war might follow as a conclusion. It was during that period, Mr. Chairman, that American merchants banded together in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and other cities, and under official sanction subscribed hundreds of thousands of dollars to build and man and equip men-of-war for the use of the Government. Three hundred and sixty-five ships thus built were accepted by the Government, and they were at once employed in the active defense of our commerce. The Government of the United States then laid the foundation of all the glory and honor which the American Navy has attained. Then it was that Decatur, father and son, Porter, Rogers, Barry, Bainbridge, Nicholson, Sterrit, Jones, Stewart, Truxtun, and Hull won for the American Navy imperishable renown. [Applause.]

Who does not remember the Constitution, the Boston, the United States, the Constellation, the Experiment, the Enterprise, the Delaware, and other famous cruisers of the American Navy of that early period? Who does not remember with pride that six French privateers, numbering fifty-nine guns and three hundred and sixty-seven men, struck to the Enterprise alone in a single year? The Boston engaged the corvette Le Berceau, and in two hours the first lieutenant, the master, the boatswain, the gunner, and thirty of the crew of the French ship lay dead on her deck. The Constellation, flying Commodore Truxtun's pennant, engaged L'Insurgenet, a taut frigate of forty guns, and the swiftest sailer the French navy could produce. When the battle had lasted one hour and a quarter, and sixty-seven killed and wounded lay upon his deck, the French commander struck his colors to this gallant young American.

It ought to be admitted that these occurrences look like war. Our intrepid Navy gave us again prestige on the ocean, and prepared the way for the treaty of 1800. It also looks like war when it is remembered that over two thousand of our merchantmen had been seized, and our commerce had been spoliated to the amount of $40,000,000.

I assume now that I have shown that these spoliations were committed during a state of war, and are therefore irremediable, according to all the authorities. I think I have also shown that the United States owed no damages to France and therefore could not have paid France with these claims of our citizens. Any other view would make Washington a traitor to France and Adams a traitor to New England.

The treaty of 1800–1801, its famous second article, and the history of its amendment and ratification, have already been sufficiently presented in the report of the committee and in the remarks of gentlemen who have preceded me.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] contends that because our commissioners presented these claims to the French Government and represented them as valid, Congress can not now deny their validity.

I want to call his attention to a decision of the Court of Claims upon one of these very cases, which I feel sure the gentleman himself has not read, or he would not have assumed that position. This court says in the Hooper case:

Because the President urged a claim upon France it did not necessarily become as between France and the United States a "valid" claim. The rule, as to the effect of Executive decision, applies as well in France as in the United States; France, resisting the claim, may contend with equal force that her position is correct, and yet one of the parties to the dispute must be wrong.

There is no man to whom I would sooner submit a public question than to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] if untrammeled by sentiment and tradition; but when I heard him quote on this subject his predecessor, Henry Clay, and William C. Preston, I concluded that he, WILLIAM C. PRESTON BRECKINRIDGE, has come to his conclusion by succession and by inheritance. [Laughter.]

That gentleman deprecates the reference of these claims to the Supreme Court and says that this question does not belong to the judicial department of the Government; and he urges with great force that the essence of the argument for such reference plainly is that Congress is an imbecile body. And I am myself inclined to distrust any court when it decides political questions. And yet that gentleman, illustrating how a great mind will drift on the shallows when it forgets its constitutional moorings, after deprecating a decision by the highest court in the world, commends a judge of the Court of Claims as another Daniel come to judgment! [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia, I hope, will permit me, before he takes his seat, to recall the question I asked him a few moments since.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. LONG. I will yield a minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts for that purpose.

Mr. DAVIS. During the course of the argument of the gentleman from Georgia, I asked him the question why if our Government owed nothing to France, she was willing, through her representatives, to pay 8,000,000 francs to France to secure a release. The statement embodied in the question was denied by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES], and I only ask now to furnish the official evidence of the correctness of my statement. I ask to print an extract from an executive document bearing directly upon the point.

Mr. LONG. You have the right to do so under a general leave.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. The gentleman ought to state it himself if he expects any reply from me. A mere publication in to-morrow's RECORD will preclude any reply on my part.

Mr. LONG. In my own time I will state to the gentleman from Georgia that it is claimed by my colleague from Massachusetts that this Government instructed its representatives in France to offer 8,000,000 francs by way of a settlement and——

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Has the gentleman the documentary evidence?

Mr. LONG (continuing). To release the United States from the claims of France against us.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I am perfectly willing to take the gentleman's own statement as to the facts, but I should like the evidence before undertaking to reply.

Mr. DAVIS. My colleague is not quite correct in his statement.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I did not think that he was.

Mr. DAVIS. The plenipotentiaries on the part of our Government made that offer and agreed to pay that sum of money, as is evidenced by the citation I shall publish in this connection.

The document referred to by Mr. DAVIS is as follows:

[No. 378.]

The envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States to France to the ministers plenipotentiary of the French Republic.

PARIS, August 29, 1800—7 o'clock p. m.

CITIZEN MINISTERS: * * * It is agreed that the United States shall pay to the French Republic, within seven years from the date of exchanging the ratifications of the treaty of ——, 8,000,000 of francs in money or such securities as have been or may be issued to citizens of the United States for indemnities under the said treaty, together with interest hereafter at the rate of — per cent. per annum until the principal shall be discharged. And that as a consideration of such engagements the United States shall forever be exonerated of the obligation on their part to furnish succors or aid under the mutual guaranty of the eleventh article of the treaty of alliance of the 6th of February, 1778; and the rights of the French Republic under the seventeenth and twenty-second articles of the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date shall be forever limited to such as the most favored nation shall in these respects enjoy.

The French Republic will accept the same, or if the French Republic shall at any time within that term offer such an article the United States will accept the same. And in either case the article so offered shall become part of the present treaty.

To such a stipulation in connection with the first, fourth, fifth, and sixth propositions offered by the American envoys in their note of the 20th of the present month they would agree, so great is their desire to terminate without further loss of time the present negotiation.

They pray the ministers plenipotentiary of the French Republic to accept assurances of their high consideration.

OLIV. ELLSWORTH.
W. R. DAVIE.
W. V. MURRAY.

Mr. DIBBLE. There is no doubt that Ellsworth made the offer.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; Ellsworth and his colleagues as well.

Mr. MACDONALD. Upon whose responsibility?

Mr. DAVIS. They were acting for our Government. And not only that, but Mr. Pickering himself offered to pay a certain sum of money to secure the same end.

Mr. LONG. I now yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JACKSON], and eight to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN].

[Mr. JACKSON withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. BURNES. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10896) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1888, and for prior years, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Sundry messages, in writing, from the President of the United States were announced by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

MRS. ANNA BUTTERFIELD.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 8761, entitled "An act granting a pension to Mrs. Anna Butterfield."

It is proposed by this bill to pension the beneficiary therein named as the "dependent mother of James A. B. Butterfield, late a sergeant in the Second Illinois Cavalry."

The records show that the son of this beneficiary enlisted in the regiment mentioned in August, 1861, and was mustered out August 13, 1864. No claim is made in any quarter that he incurred the least disability during this service, and there is no dispute in regard to the date of enlistment or discharge, nor does there seem to be any definite claim that he again entered the military service.

The report of the committee states that his mother is advised that after his discharge her son still remained in the service of the Government, and was killed by an explosion on board of the steamer Sultana, in April, 1865.

Her claim for pension is now pending in the Pension Bureau awaiting testimony which seems to be entirely wanting to support the allegation that at the time of his death the deceased was in the service of the Government in any capacity.

This evidence ought not to be difficult to obtain. Though the mother seems to have saved something from which she draws a small income, her advanced age and the honorable service of her son would make the allowance of a pension in her case, upon any fair and plausible justification, very gratifying.

ELIZA SMITH.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President; which was read, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill 2140, entitled "An act granting a pension to Eliza Smith."

The husband of this beneficiary was a second lieutenant in an Indiana regiment, and was discharged from the service in April, 1864. It is proposed in the bill herewith returned to pension the beneficiary as the widow of a first lieutenant.

The deceased was pensioned for a gunshot wound in his left arm, under the general law, and his pension was increased by a special act in 1883.

He died away from home at a hotel in Union City, Ind., on the 18th day of December, 1884, and it was determined at the time, and is still claimed, that his death was the result of an overdose of morphine, self-administered.

It is represented that at times the wound of the deceased soldier was very painful, and that he was in the habit of taking large doses of morphine to alleviate his suffering.

Two days before his death he was at the house of one Moore, in Union City; he complained of pain and asked for a dose of morphine, but it does not appear that he obtained it.

On the same day he went to a hotel in the same town and remained there until his death. On the second evening after his arrival there he complained of asthma and pain in his arm and retired about 9 o'clock p. m. In the afternoon of the next day the door of his room was forced open and he was found prostrate and helpless, though able to talk. Medicine was administered, but he soon died.

His family physician testified that the deceased did not suffer from asthma; that, when his wound was suppurating he had difficulty in breathing, and that at such times he was in the habit of taking morphine in large doses, and that at times he was intemperate, especially when suffering from his wound.

It seems to me it would establish a very bad precedent to allow a pension upon the facts developed in this case.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 9, 1888.

STEPHEN A. SEAVEY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President; which was read, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 7510, entitled "An act granting a pension to Stephen A. Seavey."

This beneficiary served in a Maine regiment from November 11, 1861, to August 17, 1862, when he was discharged upon a surgeon's certificate of epilepsia and melancholia. The surgeon further stated in his certificate that the soldier had been unfit for duty for sixty days in consequence of epileptic fits, occurring daily and requiring the constant attendance of two persons during the past thirty days.

In 1879 he applied for a pension, alleging that he incurred a sunstroke on July 20, 1862. This was within the sixty days during which he was unfit for duty and also within the thirty days during which he required the constant attendance of two persons.

He succeeded in securing a pension and drew the same until December, 1885, when information was received at the Pension Bureau which caused an examination of the merits of the case.

This examination developed such facts as led the Pension Bureau to the conclusion that the condition of the soldier was then identical with that before enlistment, and that his disability existed before he entered the service. His name was accordingly dropped from the rolls.

The object of the bill herewith returned is to restore the pensioner to the rolls.

An examination of the facts satisfies me that the act of the Pension Bureau in dropping this name from the pension-rolls was entirely correct and should not be reversed.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 9, 1888.

SARAH A. CORSON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President; which was read, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 6307, entitled "An act granting a pension to Sarah A. Corson."

Joshua Corson, the husband of the beneficiary named in this bill, enlisted in August, 1862, for nine months, was wounded by a ball which passed through the lower part of each buttock, and was discharged June 29, 1863. He was pensioned for his wound and died December 12, 1885.

The cause of death is stated to have been femoral hernia by a physician who attended him shortly before his death. The official record of his death attributes it to a malignant tumor.

The widow filed a claim for pension in 1886, but furnished no evidence showing when or how the hernia originated. No disability of this description is shown by any service record, nor was it ever claimed by the soldier. It is stated in the report of the committee of the House of Representatives to whom this bill was referred that the hernia first made its appearance about four years prior to the soldier's death.

The claim of this beneficiary for pension was rejected by the Pension Bureau upon the ground that there was no possible connection between the soldier's wounds and the hernia from which he died.

I am forced to the conclusion that the case was properly disposed of, and base my disapproval of the bill herewith returned upon the same ground.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 9, 1888.

MANUEL GARCIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 3521, entitled "An act granting a pension to Manuel Garcia."

From the records it appears that the beneficiary named in this bill enlisted as a substitute August 6, 1864, and was transferred to the Eighth New Jersey Volunteers; that he is reported absent sick, and never joined his regiment, and was discharged from a hospital July 2, 1865.

He filed a claim for pension March 4, 1880, alleging that in October, 1864, at Alexandria, Va., he became lame in both legs, and that subsequently his eyes became inflamed. His hospital record shows that he was treated for pneumonia.

The board of examining surgeons in 1883 found no such evidence of varicose veins, which seems to be the disability claimed, as would justify a rating, and there appears to be no proof of the existence of any disability between the date of discharge and the year 1867.

The application of this beneficiary is still pending in the Pension Bureau awaiting any further proof which may be submitted in its support.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 9, 1888.

MENHADEN FISHERY.

Mr. HATCH, by unanimous consent, offered the following; which was referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That a subcommittee of three members of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries be appointed to investigate and report upon the effect of the menhaden fishing on the Atlantic coast, on the destruction and supply of food-fish, and all questions relating to this subject now pending before said committee; and that the subcommittee so appointed be authorized to visit any point on the coast deemed important to such investigation, be authorized to administer oaths and send for persons and papers, and to employ a stenographer and clerk; the expenses of such investigation to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

REPORT OF BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

Mr. HATCH also, by unanimous consent, offered the following joint resolution (H. Res. 213); which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That there be printed 50,000 copies of the fourth annual report of the Bureau of Animal Industry for the year 1887, of which 13,000 copies shall be for the use of members of the Senate, 27,000 copies for the use of members of the House of Representatives, and 10,000 copies for the use of the Commissioner of Agriculture; the illustrations to be executed under the supervision of the Public Printer in accordance with the directions of the Joint Committee on Printing; the work to be subject to the approval of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 645) granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret B. Todd;

A bill (S. 915) granting a pension to Susan Edson;

A bill (S. 1122) granting an increase of pension to William Collinsworth;

A bill (S. 1325) for the relief of John McKernan;

A bill (S. 1542) granting a pension to John W. Reynolds;

A bill (S. 1609) for the relief of James McLaughlin;

A bill (S. 2206) granting a pension to David H. Lutman;

A bill (S. 2253) granting a pension to Mrs. Avis J. Hockey;

A bill (S. 2370) granting a pension to Sarah C. Anderson and children under sixteen years of age;

A bill (S. 2579) granting a pension to Mrs. Maggie A. Weed, formerly Miss Maggie A. Eagan;

A bill (S. 2616) granting a pension to James E. Kahler;

A bill (S. 3038) for the relief of P. E. Parker;

A bill (S. 3248) for the relief of John W. Durr; and

Joint resolution (S. R. 100) directing the Secretary of War to investigate and report the amount due to the State of South Carolina for the rent of the Citadel Academy.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK, PORTLAND, OREGON.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. THOMPSON, of California, in place of Mr. BIGGS (unable to serve on account of sickness) as one of the conferees on the part of the House upon the bill (H. R. 1761) for the relief of the First National Bank of Portland, Oregon, for money advanced the Oregon Iron Works for building the United States revenue-cutter Thomas Corwin.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will not the gentleman from Tennessee withdraw that motion and allow me to call up a bill which will take only a moment? It is a public bill——

Mr. DIBBLE. I rise to present a conference report.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If my bill takes more than a moment, I will withdraw it.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SIOUX CITY, IOWA.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] states that he rises to make a conference report. This is privileged, even during the pendency of a motion to adjourn. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 288) for the erection of a public building at Sioux City, Iowa, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same.

SAMUEL DIBBLE,
C. NEWTON,
P. S. POST,
Managers on the part of the House.

JOHN C. SPOONER,
JAMES F. WILSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The following statement of the House conferees, submitted in accordance with the rule, was read:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., August 8, 1888.

The managers on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 288) for the erection of a public building at Sioux City, Iowa, respectfully submit the following statement:

The bill provided for a limit of $250,000, and the House, by amendment, reduced the limit to $150,000. The effect of the adoption of the conference report is to fix the limit at $150,000, in accordance with the amendment of the House.

SAMUEL DIBBLE,
C. NEWTON,
P. S. POST,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report of the committee of conference was adopted.

Mr. DIBBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I now renew my motion that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, there being—ayes 37, noes 25; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. W. C. P. BRECKINRIDGE: A bill (H. R. 11129) for the relief of Francis Ford—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11130) for the relief of E. C. Bainbridge—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BOOTHMAN: A bill (H. R. 11131) granting a pension to Robert Caskey—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. THOMAS WILSON: A bill (H. R. 11142) granting a pension to Martha Severson—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. DUNHAM: Petition of P. J. Gannon and 91 others, citizens of Lake, Ill., urging amendments to the interstate-commerce law—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HATCH: Petition of citizens of Macon County, Missouri, for certain amendments to the interstate-commerce law—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. LAFFOON: Petition of A. T. Masencup, of A. T. Masencup, administrator, and of Mrs. P. B. Day, for relief—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. MARTIN: Petition of McCulloch & Co., B. N. Baker, and 45 others, citizens of Texas, in favor of pure food—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. O'DONNELL: Petition of George E. Walworth and others, citizens of the Third district of Michigan, for prohibition in the District of Columbia—to the Select Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, August 10, 1888.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by Rev. C. B. RAMSDELL, of the city of Washington.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

APPOINTMENTS IN CLASSIFIED SERVICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Civil Service Commission, transmitting, in reponse to a resolution of May 1, 1888, a complete list of all persons who, under certification by that Commission, have received probationary and absolute appointments to positions within the classified service at Washington, D. C., since March 4, 1885; which, on motion of Mr. SPOONER, was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Select Committee to Examine into the Condition of the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 11118) to authorize the construction and operation of a street railway and wagon-bridge across the Rio Grande, between the city of El Paso, Tex., and Paso del Norte, Mexico, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The following bill and joint resolution were read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 11045) for the relief of Sam Rice Post, No. 6, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Iowa; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 176) granting permission to the park commissioners of New York City to improve and beautify Governor's Island in connection with a public park to be laid out on said island and on land adjoining and connecting therewith.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of American manufacturers of glycerine, located at Cincinnati, Ohio, and other places, praying that the Mills bill be amended by fixing the duty on crude glycerine at 3 cents and on refined at 5 cents a pound; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BROWN. I hold in my hand a petition signed by several hundred citizens of the United States who are persons of color engaged in the culture of rice on the Ogeechee River in Georgia. The petition relates to the culture in which they are engaged, and sets forth that they have been, most of them, born and raised on the rice plantations, and they regard a reasonably high tariff as indispensable to the success of their business, that it should not be dispensed with or reduced. As the petition is a short one I ask that it be read, or without reading be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Finance. Probably the latter course will be the proper one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks that the petition presented by him may be read or printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BROWN. I do not ask that the names be printed, simply the body of the petition. It is a short petition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRIS. I object to its going in the RECORD.

Mr. BROWN. Then I will read it.

Mr. HARRIS. I object to its being read.

Mr. BROWN. Then I will condense it and bring myself within the rule as I will state the substance of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When the reading of a paper is objected to, the question must be determined by the Senate without debate. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] objects to the reading of the paper presented by the Senator from Georgia. Shall he be permitted to read the same? [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it. The ayes have it. The Senator will proceed.

Mr. BROWN. As I am rather feeble this morning, I will ask the Secretary to read the petition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRIS. It goes into the RECORD upon the reading, and therefore I will withdraw the objection to the printing of it, and it can go in without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be printed in the RECORD without reading, unless objection be made.

Mr. HARRIS. Without the signatures?

Mr. BROWN. It was my request that it go in without the signatures. Of course I do not want them to go in the RECORD, as they are numerous and would take up too much space in the RECORD.

Mr. HARRIS. The petition ought to go to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BROWN. That was my request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be printed in the RECORD without the signatures and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The petition is as follows:

To the honorable the Senators and Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

Your petitioners, subscribers hereto, are all persons of color, living on or near the plantations of the Ogeechee River, in the State of Georgia.

Your petitioners state that they were nearly all born upon the rice plantations of that river and have resided all their lives upon or near these plantations, and with some few exceptions have engaged in no other occupation than rice planting.

They further state that being left by the war free, they have been able by hard labor to make a livelihood out of these plantations and now in nearly every instance each can point to a small home supported and maintained by their wages as laborers in the rice fields or by business indirectly springing therefrom.

Your petitioners comprise the whole laboring population of that river; they are poor, but sober and industrious, and all that they ask from any one is the possibility of their making their daily wages in their old homes.

Your petitioners earnestly represent, that if they were better off than they are, and if they owned the land upon which they labor, it would be impossible for them to plant rice in competition with foreign rice, free of duty.

In fortunate years they might make a livelihood upon their own land, if their rice could produce 4 cents a pound and if they were able to keep the property in repair; but constant disaster from floods and storms happen to rice planting, and your petitioners know that it will be impossible for them to procure money for the repair of banks, flood-gates, and all the other expensive necessaries to the planting of a single acre of rice on tide-water lands. The other lands adjacent are so poor and so far from market that they will not yield a bare support, and your petitioners see clearly that if the present duty on rice be diminished to any real extent the inevitable result will be that the lands will he thrown out by the owners, and that your petitioners can not make a support upon them, either as laborers, tenants, or owners. Your petitioners will then be forced to emigrate and to cast their lot with strangers, without money or property, or to die of starvation at home. They earnestly beg you to spare them these misfortunes, and to make such provision by duty on rice as will permit them to remain in humble and honorable labor in the places which are the only ones that they know.

And your petitioners will ever pray, etc.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BLAIR presented a memorial of District Assembly 97, Knights of Labor, a memorial of the Federation of Labor of the District of Columbia, and a memorial of District Assembly, No. 66, Knights of Labor, favoring the passage of Senate bill 1471, providing that no per diem employé of the United States Government shall receive less compensation than $2 per day; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. DOLPH presented a petition of citizens of Benton, Oregon, praying speedy action on the subject of protection to the wool-growing and woolen-manufacturing industries of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Douglas and a petition of citizens of Coos County, Oregon, praying for certain amendments to the interstate-commerce act; which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 8931) for the relief of Samuel E. Wilson;

A bill (H. R. 4792) to pension J. W. Porter;

A bill (H. R. 9824) for the relief of Albert Watson;

A bill (H. R. 5503) granting a pension to Charles Walster; and

A bill (H. R. 7508) granting a pension to Julia E. Ambrose.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7785) for the relief of the attendants on the insane at Hospital for the Insane in the District of Columbia, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. FARWELL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7864) to reappropriate to pay for alley condemned in square numbered 493, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 674) for the relief of Felix Marcinkowski, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3420) authorizing the Secretary of War to ascertain what amount of money has been expended by the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada for military purposes in aid of the Government of the United States during the war of the rebellion, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SABIN, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3391) granting the right of way to the Pensacola and Memphis Railroad Company over and through the public lands of the United States in the States of Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, and Tennessee, and granting the right of way to said railroad company over and through the United States naval and military reservations, near Pensacola, in the State of Florida, asked that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. PASCO. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5212) for the relief of Andrew J. Newgent, to report it adversely.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that that bill be placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3395) to amend chapter 184 of the laws of 1885, entitled "An act to prohibit the importation and migration of foreigners and aliens under contract or agreement to perform labor in the United States, its Territories, and the District of Columbia," as the same was amended by chapter 22 of the laws of 1887, approved February 23, 1887, reported it with amendments.

Mr. VANCE. On the day before yesterday a House bill to incorporate the Georgetown and Tennallytown Railway Company was passed by this body. I am now directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to report adversely the bill (S. 1055) to incorporate the Georgetown and Tennallytown Railway Company of the District of Columbia, and move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE introduced a bill (S. 3431) for the erection of a public building at the city of Kalamazoo, Mich.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. FAULKNER introduced a bill (S. 3432) for the erection of a public building at Martinsburgh, W. Va.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CALL introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 102) appropriating $200,000 to suppress infection in the interstate commerce of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

AMENDMENTS TO GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. BLAIR. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the general deficiency appropriation bill, and move that it be referred, in the first instance, to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. There is attached to the amendment a petition of perhaps ten lines of printed matter, which I should like to have printed with the amendment, to explain it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REGISTRATION AND ELECTIONS IN NEW YORK.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I offer a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all correspondence and communications passing between the Department of Justice, or any officer thereof, and any officer under the Government of the United States in the State of New York, since the 1st day of January, 1887, on the subject of registration, elections, or any matters connected therewith, or with the conduct, duties, or powers of any such officer in respect of registration or election matters.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Has it just been introduced?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It has just been introduced at this moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been submitted by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. COCKRELL. I would rather see it in print before we act upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over under the rules and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 288) for the erection of a public building at Sioux City, Iowa.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 645) granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret B. Todd;

A bill (S. 915) granting a pension to Susan Edson;

A bill (S. 1122) granting an increase of pension to William Collinsworth;

A bill (S. 1325) for the relief of John McKernan;

A bill (S. 1542) granting a pension to John W. Reynolds;

A bill (S. 1609) for the relief of James McLaughlin;

A bill (S. 2206) granting a pension to David H. Lutman;

A bill (S. 2253) granting a pension to Mrs. Avis J. Hockey;

A bill (S. 2370) granting a pension to Sarah C. Anderson and children under sixteen years of age;

A bill (S. 2579) granting a pension to Mrs. Maggie A. Weed, formerly Miss Maggie A. Eagan;

A bill (S. 2616) granting a pension to James E. Kabler;

A bill (S. 3038) for the relief of P. E. Parker;

A bill (S. 3248) for the relief of John W. Durr; and

Joint resolution (S. R. 100) directing the Secretary of War to investigate and report the amount due to the State of South Carolina for the rent of the Citadel Academy.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, that order is closed; and the Calendar under Rule VIII being in order, the Secretary will report the first bill by title.

The SECRETARY. Order of Business 1777, a bill (S. 1818) to grant to the town of Moscow, in Idaho Territory, certain lands for cemetery purposes.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT EVANSVILLE, IND.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 1321, which I reported a few days ago from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill whose title has just been reported by the Secretary being in order, the Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the order be laid aside to enable him to move the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1321) for the erection of a marine hospital at Evansville, Ind. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the twenty-first line of the print, which is obviously incomplete.

Mr. SPOONER. I move to amend by inserting after the word "except," in line 21, the words "the administration of;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Indiana shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPOONER. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. SPOONER, Mr. QUAY, and Mr. PASCO were appointed.

LANDS FOR CEMETERY PURPOSES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first bill on the Calendar in regular order will now be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1818) to grant to the town of Moscow, in Idaho Territory, certain lands for cemetery purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 3, after the word "that," to insert "the south half;" so as to make the section read:

That the south half of the northwest one-fourth and the north half of the southwest one-fourth of section 16, in township 39, range 5 west of Boisé meridian, in Idaho Territory, be, and the same is hereby, granted to the town of Moscow, in the Territory of Idaho, for cemetery purposes, on condition that the same shall be held and maintained by said town for that use; and if at any time any portion of the said land shall be diverted from such use it shall revert to and become the property of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add as a new section:

SEC. 2. When the section of country embracing said lands hereby conveyed shall be included within the boundaries of a State, the State may select for school purposes an amount equal to the amount hereby conveyed to the town of Moscow.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES MILLINGER.

The bill (S. 602) for the relief of James Millinger was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay James Millinger, of New Jersey, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $19,893.75, for property taken from him for the use of the United States Army at Nashville, Tenn., in the year 1862; the said sum being the amount reported as just and right to the Secretary of War, under an order of General Dana, Quartermaster-General United States Army, appointed to investigate the same; which sum shall be in full of all claims against the United States by said Millinger.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOWMAN & CO.

The bill (H. R. 6491) for the relief of Lowman & Co. was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Lowman & Co., of Long Glade, Augusta County, Virginia, $271.80, in full for internal-revenue tax collected from them on certain stamps for distilled spirits on or about the 15th of October, 1878, the spirits having been destroyed by fire before the proper stamps had been affixed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN A. GRIFFEY.

The bill (H. R. 6783) to place the name of John A. Griffey on the pension-roll was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of John A. Griffey, dependent father of —— Griffey, late private of Company D, Second North Carolina Regiment.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move to fill the blank in line 5, before "Griffey," by inserting "James."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF J. J. PULLIAM.

The bill (S. 751) for the relief of the estate of J. J. Pulliam, deceased, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That bill had better go over. It opens a very wide question, and it is one of a great number.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator to let it pass over without prejudice. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who reported it, is not in his seat at this moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to that course if the bill will not be called up in my absence.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Massachusetts has just come in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The bill can go over without prejudice.

Mr. HARRIS. Very well; let it go over without prejudice.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will require more than the five-minutes rule to debate it, I think, on the principle involved in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. HOAR subsequently said: I propose to ask the Senate to go back to Senate bill 751, but I shall not do so in the absence of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. I think on a simple statement he will see that the bill merely proposes to correct a clear mistake which was made by one of the officers of the Treasury, and that it is to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to re-examine the matter. I should like when the Senator who objected comes in again to ask the Senate to go back to that bill, but I shall not ask it in his absence.

SONE AND FLEMING MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

The bill (S. 992) for the relief of the Sone and Fleming Manufacturing Company, Limited, of the city of New York, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. HOAR July 11, 1888:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 992) for the relief of the Sone and Fleming Manufacturing Company, Limited, of the city of New York, have considered the same, and respectively report:

The claim has been considered and favorably reported by this committee in the Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, and Forty-ninth Congresses. It is fully set forth in a report made by Mr. TELLER, from this committee, in the Forty-seventh Congress, which we append for the information of the Senate.

We recommend the passage of the bill.

[Senate Report No. 177, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 31) for the relief of the Sone and Fleming Manufacturing Company, Limited, of the city of New York, having duly considered the same, make the following report:

That the Sone and Fleming Company were refiners and exporters of petroleum during the years 1876-'77, carrying on their business at the city of New York, and it appears from the evidence that it was their habit to pack the oil for exportation in cans manufactured from imported tin. At the time of the exportation, under the provisions of section 3019, United States Revised Statutes, they were entitled to the drawback duties on said imported tin; but in order to obtain this drawback it was necessary to enter the tin for drawback.

The Sone and Fleming Company had at that time in their employ a clerk whose duty it was to file these drawback notices in the New York custom-house and to pay the small fee required for its entry. It appears from the evidence that the clerk so employed had long attended to his duties faithfully, ingratiating himself into the confidence of the company. During a term of about three months the clerk drew the notices, had them verified by the treasurer of the company, and obtained the several amounts from the cashier of the company necessary to pay these small fees, then left the office for the express purpose of filing the notices of drawback and to pay the fees for the same, but he never filed the notices and he embezzled the fees.

The collector, in a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, says "the exporters called at this office, as customary, to sign the bonds," but inasmuch as their clerk had never filed the entry papers and never paid the fees, no bond had been given. Immediately upon the discovery of these facts the company applied to the collector for relief, and the matter was referred to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary held that his power in the premises was limited by section 3037 of the United States Revised Statutes to such cases as have been "entered" for drawback and some subsequent formality has been omitted, while in this case the clerk did not file the notices of entry, and that there was no law which empowered the Secretary of the Treasury to authorize the payment of the drawback money. The original landing certificates, signed by the United States consul or vice-consul at the several ports of landing, are in evidence, covering the fourteen lots of tin cans, also the original entry certificates drawn by the company. The amount of the drawback duties which under the Revised Statutes the company was entitled to is $5,265.73.

Congress has considered it appropriate to give relief in similar cases in several instances. (See page 467, chapter 231, first session Forty-fourth Congress, approved July 25, 1876; page 437, chapter 124, first session Forty-fourth Congress, approved June 12, 1876; page 529, chapter 112, second session Forty-fifth Congress, approved May 25, 1878.)

The bill provides for the payment of money by the Government to the claimants which fairly belongs to them. The evidence is clear that the Government is to-day in possession of the money by a mere technicality of the law. The high standing of this company is mentioned in the letter of the collector of the port at that time—Mr. Arthur—to the Secretary of the Treasury, on file with the papers, and it seems hard that they should lose so large an amount on account of the embezzlement of a few dollars of their own money by a long-trusted clerk.

Your committee are of the opinion that the money of the company at present withheld from them on account of their failure to file drawback notices justly belongs to them, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment: Strike out, in line 7, the words "in gold coin of the United States," and in lines 7 and 8 strike out the words "in currency."

Mr. HOAR. There is a House bill to the same effect which I should like to have brought forward as a substitute and passed instead of the Senate bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Massachusetts indicate the Calendar number?

Mr. HOAR. The House bill is before the Committee on Finance. It was referred to that committee. I should like to have the committee discharged and the House bill considered, if the clerks will find it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator consent to have the matter informally passed over and the Calendar proceeded with?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly; I was about to suggest that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore subsequently said: The bill (H. R. 3859) for the relief of the Sone and Fleming Manufacturing Company, Limited, of the city of New York, having been brought to the desk, the Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Committee on Finance be discharged from its further consideration. It will be so ordered if there be no objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to the Sone and Fleming Manufacturing Company, Limited, of the city of New York, $5,265.73, being the amount of drawback of duties due to them on certain tin cans exported by them, but which were not entered for drawback within the time fixed by law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill (S. 992) for the relief of the Sone and Fleming Manufacturing Company, Limited, of the city of New York, will be indefinitely postponed.

A. M. ANDERSON AND OTHERS.

The bill (H. R. 5222) for the relief of A. M. Anderson and others was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay an amount sufficient to adjust and settle the accounts of A. M. Anderson, Hall Caldwell, A. C. Bryan, and C. C. Crumpler, special deputy collectors employed by J. J. Mott, then collector of the sixth collection district of North Carolina, during and for the months of January and February, 1879, to each, or to his legal representative or heirs at law, the pay of a special deputy collector for the two months mentioned, they having been employed by the collector of the district on that duty and never having received any compensation therefor.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN LAND PATENTS.

The joint resolution (S. R. 98) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to accept the surrender of and cancel land patents to Indians in certain cases was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 1, to strike out the word "Resolved," and insert "Be it enacted."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 1, to strike out the word "and;" in line 5, to strike out the word "heretofore;" in line 7, after the word "belongs," to insert "under treaty or existing laws;" and in line 11, after the word "patent," to strike out the words "and allow;" so as to read:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, and whenever for good and sufficient reason he shall consider it to be for the best interest of the Indians, in making allotments under the statute aforesaid, to permit any Indian to whom a patent has been issued for land on the reservation to which such Indian belongs, under treaty or existing law, to surrender such patent with formal relinquishment by such Indian to the United States of all his or her right, title, and interest in the land conveyed thereby, properly indorsed thereon, and to cancel such surrendered patent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 11, after the word "Provided," to insert "That;" in line 12 to strike out "to" and insert "shall;" and in the same line, after the word "selection," to insert "in lieu thereof;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the Indian so surrendering the same shall make a selection, in lieu thereof, of other land and receive patent therefor, under the provisions of the act of February 8, 1887.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill (S. 3433) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to accept the surrender of and cancel land patents to Indians in certain cases."

DISTRICT LAND SUBDIVISIONS.

The bill (H. R. 3329) to regulate the subdivision of land within the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, in section 7, line 10, before the words "of said District," to strike out "engineer commissioner" and insert "commissioners;" so as to read:

That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to make and publish such general orders as may be necessary to regulate the platting and subdividing of all lands and grounds in the District of Columbia; and no such plat of subdivision made in pursuance of such orders shall be admitted to record in the office of the surveyor of said District without an order to that effect indorsed thereon by the commissioners of said District.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VANCE. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. VANCE, Mr. CHACE, and Mr. FARWELL were appointed.

TAX SALES OF PROPERTY IN THE DISTRICT.

The bill (H. R. 10060) prescribing the times for sales and for notice of sales of property in the District of Columbia for overdue taxes was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall prepare a list of all taxes on real property in the District subject to taxation upon which taxes are levied and in arrears on the 1st day of July, 1888, and each year thereafter, including all taxes due to the late corporations of Washington City, Georgetown, the levy court of the county of Washington, and the District of Columbia; and the commissioners shall publish the same, with a notice of sale, in a pamphlet, of which not less than 5,000 copies shall be printed for distribution to taxpayers applying therefor. The commissioners shall, on the first Tuesday in September, 1888, and of each year thereafter, give notice, by advertising twice a week for three successive weeks in the regular issue of two daily newspapers published in the District, that the pamphlet has been printed, and that a copy thereof will be delivered to any taxpayer applying therefor at the office of the commissioners, and that if the taxes due, together with the penalties and costs that may have accrued thereon, shall not be paid prior to the day named for sale the property will be sold, under the direction of the commissioners, at public auction, at the office of the collector of taxes, commencing three weeks after the first publication of the notice and continuing on each following day, Sundays and legal holidays excepted, until all such delinquent property is sold.

Mr. FAULKNER. In accordance with the suggestions of a number of Senators, made some days ago, I move to amend, in section 1, line 13, after the word "therefor," by inserting:

And a list of said property shall be published once in a daily newspaper published in the District of Columbia, at a cost not to exceed the sum of 15 cents for each parcel of property so advertised.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move that the Senate request the House of Representatives to grant a conference on the bill and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. FAULKNER, Mr. SPOONER, and Mr. RIDDLEBERGER were appointed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT JACKSON, MICH.

Mr. SPOONER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8592) for the erection of a public building at Jackson, Mich., having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and agree to each of the same with an amendment by way of substitute, as follows: Strike out the words "seventy-five," in lines 9 and 17, and insert in lieu thereof the word "sixty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

JNO. C. SPOONER,
T. W. PALMER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

SAMUEL DIBBLE,
C. NEWTON,
P. S. POST,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SIOUX CITY, IOWA.

Mr. SPOONER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 288) for the erection of a public building at Sioux City, Iowa, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same.

JOHN C. SPOONER,
JAMES F. WILSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

SAMUEL DIBBLE,
C. NEWTON,
P. S. POST,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

INSTITUTE OF THE ASSOCIATION FOR WORKS OF MERCY.

The bill (H. R. 3168) regulating admissions to the Institute of the Association for Works of Mercy in certain cases, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIANS OF FORT BERTHOLD AGENCY, DAKOTA.

The bill (S. 1950) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Indians of Fort Berthold agency, in Dakota, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest when we come to the names there, they being Indian names, that out of consideration and compassion to the clerks they be omitted. There is no occasion for reading them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the names will be omitted, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was to strike out section 2, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of carrying out the terms of said agreement the sum of $80,000 is hereby appropriated, to be immediately available.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 2. That lands to which the right of the Indians is extinguished under the foregoing agreement are a part of the public domain of the United States and are open to the operation of the laws regulating homestead entry, except section 2301 of the Revised Statutes, and to entry under the town-site laws and the laws governing the disposal of coal lands, desert lands, and mineral lands; but are not open to entry under any other laws regulating the sale or disposal of the public domain.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section:

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of carrying out the terms of said agreement the sum of $80,000 is hereby appropriated, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

GERMAN EVANGELICAL CHURCH AT MARTINSBURGH, W. VA.

The bill (S. 2740) for the relief of the trustees of the German Evangelical Church in Martinsburgh, W. Va., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to the trustees of the German Evangelical Church, at Martinsburgh, W. Va., of $2,500, on account of the destruction of their church building and its furniture on the 17th of February, 1863, while the same was in the possession of a portion of the military forces of the United States, and through their carelessness.

Mr. FRYE. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is.

Mr. FRYE. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. FAULKNER July 16, 1888:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2740) for the relief of the trustees of the German Evangelical Church, of Martinsburgh, W. Va., have examined the same, and respectfully report:

The committee find that all of the facts in this case are clearly and fairly stated in the report made by the Committee on Claims of the Senate during the first session of the Forty-third Congress, and have therefore adopted said report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The report is as follows:

"The German Evangelical Church at Martinsburgh, W. Va., was composed of Germans and citizens of German descent, mostly laboring people, attached to the Government of the United States, many of whom proved their loyalty by entering the Union Army during the war of the rebellion. The house in which they worshiped is valued by the witnesses at $3,500. On the night of the 17th of February, 1863, it was destroyed by fire. It was securely locked, and had not been used for religious worship for eighteen months previously to that time; the disordered condition of the country and the absence of many of the members who had been driven from home and found employment in the service of the United States as soldiers or otherwise, and of their preacher, who was a chaplain in the Union Army, having rendered their regular worship impracticable.

"On the evening in question (February 17, 1863), Capt. G. W. Hicks, of the Ninth Virginia Infantry, arrived in Martinsburgh, having in charge about sixty men, who escorted a Government train from Winchester to that post. They were quartered in this church by order of the post-adjutant (Lieutenant Hyatt). A stove stood on the eastern side of the building, and a fire was kindled in it. The pipe became disjointed at or near the ceiling. It was joined again, or supposed to be, and the fire again started. The night was stormy, the soldiers wet and cold, and a quick fire made from the dry pine seats created such heat that the ceiling took fire near where the break in the stove-pipe had occurred. This is one account.

"Another states that the stove was moved by the soldiers to the open space in the front part of the church, and the pipe detached from the chimney and run up as far as it would reach into the dome or cupola. The blaze of the fire out of the top of the pipe ignited the wood-work. The stove was so moved in order to give the soldiers more space to hang and dry their clothes, wet from rain and snow.

"But, whichever account is the true one, it seems that the building was discovered to be on fire at 7 o'clock in the evening, and, all efforts to stay the progress of the flames proving ineffectual, the building was burned to the ground.

"It appears that those living in the neighborhood of the church refused to extend any aid to extinguish the fire, though appealed to for buckets and assistance.

"Possession of the building was obtained by the soldiers entering at the windows and opening the door from the inside.

"Such, in brief, are the facts:

"First. The soldiers were quartered in the church by order of the officer in command.

"Secondly. They were so quartered for purposes of shelter, warmth, and rest.

"Thirdly. The building was violently entered without the consent of the owners.

"Fourthly. It was dedicated to religious uses and used for no other purpose than the worship of God.

"Fifthly. The humble owners were, to a man, loyal to the United States, and many of them doing service in its armies.

"Sixthly. Its value was $3,500, and the congregation have not had the means to replace it up to this time, and the prayer of the memorial is to compensate them for the loss.

"Martinsburgh is situate in Berkeley County, which furnished many conspicuous instances of loyalty during the war.

"On the 16th day of August, 1861, President Lincoln, by proclamation, declared the inhabitants of certain enumerated States to be in a state of insurrection against the United States, and commercial intercourse between the same was prohibited; but he excepted from the operation of this proclamation the inhabitants of that part of Virginia lying west of the Alleghany Mountains, and such other parts of that State and other States as might maintain a loyal adhesion to the Union and the Constitution, or might be, from time to time, occupied and controlled by forces of the United States engaged in the dispersion of the insurgents.

"At a later date, on the 1st of July, 1862, another proclamation declared that Virginia, except certain enumerated counties, not embracing Berkeley, were in a state of insurrection and rebellion, so that the law for the collection of taxes there could not be executed.

"Again, on the 2d of April, 1863, another proclamation declared that the inhabitants of Virginia, except the forty-eight counties designated as West Virginia, were in a state of insurrection against the United States.

"Except for a short time during the war, Martinsburgh was never in the enemy's lines. The troops of the United States had almost continuous and uninterrupted possession, and held such possession when this accident occurred. Shortly after the admission of West Virginia into the Union as a State, the counties of Berkeley (in which Martinsburgh is situated) and Jefferson were, by a vote of the inhabitants, attached to the new State, and have been regarded as a part ever since.

"The committee are of opinion that the trustees of the church should be allowed $2,500 for the loss of the church and furniture, and report herewith a bill, and recommend its passage."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANDREW GLEESON.

The bill (H. R. 2592) for the relief of Andrew Gleeson was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 4, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$289.17" and insert "$264.07;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Andrew Gleeson the sum of $264.07, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full payment for furnishing and grading materials (earth, soil, and gravel) upon the grounds south of the Executive Mansion, in the city of Washington, D. C., during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

JAMES GRACE.

The bill (S. 3328) for the relief of James Grace was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $155 to James Grace, of Washington, D. C.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

J. J. PULLIAM.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Chair what was the order in regard to Calendar No. 1813, the bill (S. 751) for the relief of the estate of J. J. Pulliam, deceased?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was passed over without prejudice.

Mr. HOAR. It stands on the Calendar then?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It stands on the Calendar subject to call hereafter.

JACOB KERN.

The bill (S. 2068) for the relief of Jacob Kern was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that it has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Finn vs. The United States, numbered 1008, October term, 1887, that the Court of Claims has not jurisdiction of claims which have been transmitted to that court by heads of Departments, under section 1063 of the Revised Statutes, where such claims have not been presented to the proper Department for payment within six years from the time they accrued; and that prior to this decision of the Supreme Court it was held by the Court of Claims, in the case of Green and others vs. The United States, that "even if the claim had not been presented to the Department within six years after it accrued, it was not at all clear that that fact would deprive this court of jurisdiction;" and it is admitted by the claimant that the claim of Jacob Kern for army wagons alleged to have been furnished by him to the quartermaster of the United States at St. Louis, in the years 1864 and 1865 (which claim was referred, prior to the decision of the Supreme Court, by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Court of Claims, and is now pending therein), was not presented for payment within the statutory time because of the sickness of the claimant and the loss of his vouchers, which vouchers (he alleges) he did not find until after the expiration of the six years from the delivery of the wagons as aforesaid.

The bill therefore proposes to direct the Court of Claims to proceed to consider and adjudicate upon its merits the claim of Jacob Kern, now pending in that court, any statute of limitations to the contrary notwithstanding.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

THOMAS BECTON, DECEASED.

The bill (H. R. 8956) for the relief of S. B. West, administrator of Thomas Becton, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to S. B. West, administrator of Thomas Becton, deceased, of Lenoir County, North Carolina, $1,585 for stores and supplies taken and used by the Army of the United States during the late war, as found by the Court of Claims.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SAMUEL TATE.

The bill (S. 100) for the relief of Samuel Tate was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 5, after the words "one thousand," to strike out "one hundred and forty-four dollars and fifty cents" and insert "dollars;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Samuel Tate $1,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full satisfaction for the rent of his house in what is known as the Gayaso Block, in the city of Memphis, Tenn., for three months and thirteen days, from the 30th of May, 1865, to the 13th of September, 1865, at the rate of $333.33½ per month, the contract price agreed upon on the 13th of September, 1865.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT BROOKE MILITARY RESERVATION.

The bill (S. 3340) for the donation of Fort Brooke military reservation at Tampa, Fla., for free schools and other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I have an amendment to propose to that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator who reported the bill, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands [Mr. PLUMB], is not present.

Mr. COCKRELL. It does not make any difference about his being absent. We can consider the bill anyway.

Mr. CALL. I have just sent for a copy of the bill. Let it be passed over informally, and I will call it up as soon as the copy comes.

Mr. PADDOCK. We can not hear the Senator over here. I would like to know what his suggestion is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator proposes that the bill be informally passed over on the Calendar until he obtains a copy of it. Does the Senator propose to amend the bill?

Mr. CALL. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator forward his amendment to the desk?

Mr. SAWYER. I suggest that the bill be passed over while the Senator is preparing his amendment, and we can return to it again.

Mr. CALL. I move to amend the bill by adding as a new section——

Mr. HAWLEY. We can not hear a word on this side.

Mr. SAWYER. I will object to the consideration of this bill for the present.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will not object.

Mr. SAWYER. I do it without prejudice, so that the Senator from Florida may have time to draught his amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will not object. This is a bill that the people there feel a great deal of interest in, and there has been much consideration given to it. It has been upon the Calendar ever since the 17th day of July. I am in favor of giving the Senator from Florida the opportunity of a little time to write out his amendment.

Mr. SAWYER. That is just what I proposed, to give him time, and let him call up the bill afterwards. If the Senator has his amendment prepared I have no objection to going on.

Mr. CALL. I move to amend the bill by adding as section 4 what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section:

SEC. 4. That the proceeds of the sales of lots shall be donated to the city of Tampa for the support of an industrial school.

Mr. CALL. This reservation lies immediately adjacent to the town of Tampa. It has been made valuable entirely by the people who have settled in that town and made it into a city with a future before it. It has now a population probably of between five and seven thousand persons. This little tract of land, about 140 acres, is in the immediate suburb of the town and comprises the land most eligible for a park and for the extension of the town as it increases in population. I do not know under the circumstances in which those people are placed of any better or more equitable disposition of this property, which has become valuable entirely because of their investments and their settlement there, than to provide a perpetual fund the interest of which shall be applied to the education of the people of that community and the adjacent country. They are largely people of very limited means, and not far removed from the Indians, who are nomadic or roaming through that portion of the peninsula not far removed from this place. All these people would have the privilege of education at an institution of this kind.

A very large majority of this body have on different occasions voted the donation of the public lands for the education of the people in the different States. We have given to every State a portion of the public lands, and a part of the proceeds of sales for the purposes of education. A majority of this body on both sides have voted for a bill appropriating the proceeds of all the public lands to the education of the people of this country, under the authority and control of the several States. It seems to me to be eminently proper that this little property, which obtains its value solely because of the occupation and the residence and the labor and the investments of the people there, should have a like destination.

The Committee on Public Lands of the Senate reported at the last session a bill donating this land to the town of Tampa with a provision somewhat similar to this, and at this session of the Senate this bill has been introduced, which provides for the sale and the placing of the proceeds of the sale in the Treasury of the United States, reserving a portion of it as a park, with the privilege of occupancy at any time by the United States when they desire. The amendment that I propose gives the proceeds of the sale of these lots to the town for education, for industrial education, and it would be a perpetual monument, as there are such monuments in every State, of the good and wise policy of the General Government in fostering the education of the people when it can be done without any constitutional objection.

Now, I believe that upon this subject of the donation of the proceeds of the public lands the most rigid interpreters of the Constitution upon the narrowest basis acknowledged that there is no objection to the exercise of the power, and there certainly can be no objection to the beneficent exercise of it in this instance for the people who have made that locality what it is, a country which has been without inhabitants for a long time and is now being developed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has spoken five minutes.

Mr. CALL. I hope the five-minute rule will be waived so far as the consideration of this bill is concerned, and I will ask unanimous consent to that effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent that he may be allowed to proceed for five minutes longer. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CALL. That is the question now as briefly presented by the amendment that I have submitted; the question whether or not the Government will take the proceeds of the sale of this land and put it in the Treasury and give to the town of Tampa the privilege of the occupancy of 20 acres as a park, reserving 5 acres for a public building, or whether we will donate the entire proceeds, making the reservation for the park to the town of Tampa under such conditions as Congress may impose for industrial education. I do not think I need to say anything further about it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand there is no report in this case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is an original bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CHANDLER. I was not able to gather from the statement made by the Senator from Florida what different disposition is made of the proceeds of this land by the bill and by the amendment which he proposes.

Mr. CALL. The bill puts the proceeds into the Treasury of the United States. The amendment gives the proceeds of the sale to the town as an industrial educational fund.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I understand the bill as reported from the committee does not propose to give away the proceeds?

Mr. COCKRELL. It does not.

Mr. CHANDLER. But to place them in the Treasury?

Mr. CALL. It proposes to place them in the Treasury.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I am unable to understand why the title of the bill is "A bill for the donation of Fort Brooke military reservation at Tampa, Fla., for free schools and other purposes."

Mr. COCKRELL. That is simply a mistake in the title.

Mr. CHANDLER. The title is certainly a misnomer, and I should like to hear from some member of the Committee on Public Lands the reason why this bill was reported.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator will permit me to say that the original bill was introduced by the Senator from Florida to donate this land to the town of Tampa for school purposes, and the bill now pending was reported as a substitute for that bill. I presume the title was not changed. This is really a substitute. There is a donation in this bill of 20 acres for a park in the town of Tampa, as reported from the committee. The remainder is to be sold to the highest bidder and the proceeds covered into the Treasury of the United States. That is the bill as it comes from the Committee on Public Lands.

While I am on the floor it occurs to me that if the amendment of the Senator from Florida is to be adopted there ought to be a provision of some kind defining the character of the school. The mere use of the words "industrial school" or any similar expression in connection with this gift, it seems to me, is rather an indefinite way of disposing of the public money.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has already spoken once on this subject.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is an inquiry in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can proceed only by unanimous consent.

Mr. COCKRELL. He can make an inquiry, can he not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. I shall be glad to answer any inquiry the Senator from New Hampshire may make.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senate will indulge me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from New Hampshire proceeding further?

Mr. COCKRELL. It comes out of my time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like the Senator from Missouri, who I understand is upon the Committee on Public Lands and now has the floor, to inform the Senate whether or not the proposition was considered by the committee of not only donating a certain quantity of the reservation for a public park, but also of donating the proceeds of the sale of the remainder to the city of Tampa, and what conclusion, if any, the committee came to upon that point?

Mr. COCKRELL. I will answer the question with pleasure. There has been a long controversy over this military reservation. When it was restored to the public domain under the law of 1884, quite a number of persons made claims to it under the homestead law and some attempted to pre-empt it, and an old soldier came in and claimed that he had settled upon it long before it was even public land practically. All these contests were precipitated into the Land Office and sundry bills were introduced. We took up the whole question; we had all these claimants and their attorneys, some three or four different sets of attorneys, before us presenting their claims, and after a thorough investigation we found that none of them had even a shadow of title to the land, and that it belonged absolutely to the United States. Then we considered all the different propositions in regard to its disposition and we determined to dispose of the land—to reserve 3 acres for a public building, a court-house, custom-house, etc., then to reserve 5 acres for a marine hospital, and then to give 25 acres, containing the live-oak trees, to the city of Tampa for a park, reserving the fee in the United States, if necessary to reclaim it, and then determined that as a matter of justice, equity, and right the balance of the proceeds should go into the Treasury of the United States.

I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida has spoken once upon this subject and can proceed only by unanimous consent. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CALL. I wish to say that I am informed that at this session of Congress a block of ground covering a considerable space in the city of Austin, Tex., has been donated by Congress to the city for the purposes of education, and I hope that this amendment will not be voted down, as there is a precedent for it, not only in a case certainly not so meritorious, because the State of Texas has a great fund of public land of her own, but also in the case of Fort Smith, Ark. I hope the amendment will not be voted down, but will be sustained by the Senate. We have a population there many of whom are extremely poor, a population some from Old Spain and the West Indies, the Bahamas, and from Cuba, some of them colored people. They all earnestly desire education and have less means of obtaining it than other people. Some of them are the fishermen, of whom we hear so much, scattered up and down the coast, who earn their living by sponging and fish and oysters. They are an excellent class of people and they ought to have education and industrial education, and the proceeds of this sale as a permanent fund of $50,000 or $60,000 perhaps will do more for establishing a permanent industrial school for all the people than anything that has been done or can be done for them or for the country at large by the proceeds of sale.

I hope, therefore, that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. COKE. The donation to the city of Austin having been referred to, I will state that it comprised a quarter of a block of ground, valued at about $3,000, to be used for educational purposes. It was the old arsenal ground of the Republic of Texas, which under the articles of annexation went into the possession of the United States. The United States Government having no use for it, having discontinued any military operations on it, it was granted back to the State of Texas for the purposes indicated in the bill, to wit, educational purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes have it.

Mr. CALL. I ask for a division.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 15, noes 19.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum not being present, the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that the yeas and nays may be taken on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks that the yeas and nays on the amendment be entered on the Journal.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLACKBURN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON].

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL].

Mr. PAYNE (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague [Mr. SHERMAN]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. PLATT. I was paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], and being uncertain whether he thinks that the pair still continues I refrain from voting.

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE].

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I wish to announce again a general pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], who was called away by sickness in his family. He is chairman of the committee that reported this bill, and in order to make a quorum I shall vote "nay."

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], but this not being a party question I have concluded to vote upon it. I vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BERRY. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. JONES, of Arkansas] is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. PASCO. I have transferred my pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], who is absent. I vote "yea."

Mr. FAULKNER. I have transferred my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BLODGETT], and therefore I voted when my name was called.

Mr. EDMUNDS (after having voted in the negative). I voted, but I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH]. He is not in the Chamber, and I think it my duty to withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont withdraws his vote.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to announce the pair of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], and also the pair of the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. RANSOM. I announced my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE], but this is not a party question of any character, and I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. VANCE. I have a general pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER], who is not present. As this is not a party question, I will permit my vote in the affirmative to stand.

Mr. BROWN. May I inquire how the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] voted. I am paired with the other Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH]. I should vote "yea" on this question if not paired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Both the Senators from Oregon have voted, one in the affirmative and one in the negative.

Mr. BROWN. I vote "yea" then.

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Bate,	Dawes,	Hoar,	Stewart,
Brown,	Faulkner,	Mitchell,	Turpie,
Call,	George,	Pasco,	Vance,
Colquitt,	Gray,	Ransom,	Wilson of Md.
Davis,	Hampton,	Sawyer,

NAYS—20.

Allison,	Cockrell,	Frye,	Reagan,
Beck,	Coke,	Hale,	Saulsbury,
Berry,	Cullom,	Hawley,	Vest,
Chace,	Dolph,	Ingalls,	Walthall,
Chandler,	Evarts,	Morgan,	Wilson of Iowa.

ABSENT—37.

Aldrich,	Farwell,	Manderson,	Sabin,
Blackburn,	Gibson,	Morrill,	Sherman,
Blair,	Gorman,	Paddock,	Spooner,
Blodgett,	Harris,	Palmer,	Stanford,
Bowen,	Hearst,	Payne,	Stockbridge,
Butler,	Hiscock,	Platt,	Teller,
Cameron,	Jones of Arkansas,	Plumb,	Voorhees.
Daniel,	Jones of Nevada,	Pugh,
Edmunds,	Kenna,	Quay,
Eustis,	McPherson,	Riddleberger,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. I have another amendment. I move to strike out, in line 13, of section 2, the word "one-fourth" and insert the word "one-fifth;" so as to read:

The purchasers at such sales may, at their option, pay one-fifth the purchase price in cash at the date of sale and stipulate for payment of the remainder thereof in three equal annual installments bearing interest at 6 per cent. per annum.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to ask the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], who represents the Committee on Public Lands in this matter, to a veto sent in by the President, the veto of Senate bill No. 1870, entitled "A bill granting the use of certain lands in Pierce County, Washington Territory, to the city of Tacoma, for the purpose of a public park." The language used in the bill vetoed and in this bill is practically identical.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no comparison whatever between the two cases.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will read and see:

And 25 acres which is hereby granted to the city of Tampa for a public park, as shown upon the map hereinafter mentioned, which the said town shall cause to be improved, kept in order, and open to the public, with the right to erect thereon a permanent exposition building, not to occupy more than 5 acres; and the United States hereby reserves to itself the fee and the right forever to resume occupancy of all or any portion of said park whenever it shall be required for public uses.

The lines to which I ask special attention are these:

Hereby granted to the city of Tampa for a public park.

And these:

And the United States hereby reserves to itself the fee and the right forever to resume occupancy of all or any portion of said park whenever it shall be required for public uses.

In vetoing the bill making a similar grant to Tacoma, the President—I will not read the whole of his veto—said:

The expediency of granting any right to the occupancy of this land is in my opinion very doubtful. If it is done it should be in the form of a mere license, revocable at any time, for the purposes used by the officers to which its use and disposition are now subject.

I think myself that the veto is without foundation, because the word "granted" is immediately followed by a reservation of the fee to the United States, with a right to resume at any time possession for military or naval purposes, or for such disposition as Congress may choose. That is not the expression here, but in the other bill the right is reserved to the War Department to resume possession for military and naval purposes, which was the original dedication of the land. Anything further than that—the right to any other use than that—would have to be given by statute of Congress. So I think the Tacoma bill in that respect was better than this. Now, suppose the word "allotted" be used instead of the word "granted," if that serves any better to remove the scruples of the President, if he may have any in the matter? All that is given, in my judgment, in either bill, is a mere license to occupy, subject to repossession at any time.

Another difference between the two bills is also in favor of the Tacoma bill, which Tacoma bill has these words, that the repossession shall be—

Without any claim for compensation to said city for improvements thereon or damages on account thereof.

It is a matter for the discretion of Congress as to whether they, reserving the right to repossess, shall or shall not say that they will or will not compensate the city for its expenditure.

I move to strike out the word "granted," in line 14 of section 1, and substitute the word "allotted."

EXPIRATION OF MORNING HOUR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It being now 1 o'clock, the Chair asks the Senate to decide whether the consideration of the Calendar, when the Senate meets at 11 o'clock in the morning by standing order, shall conclude at 1 o'clock or be continued until 2. It is an open question under the precedents. If the morning hour closes at 1 o'clock, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest that the consideration of the Calendar be continued until 2 o'clock to-day.

Mr. HOAR. I think the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] who has charge of the fisheries treaty on this side of the Chamber expected that the fisheries debate would proceed at 1 o'clock to-day.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I consulted with the Senator from Maine and I did not understand him to interpose any objection to the consideration of the Calendar continuing till 2 o'clock.

Mr. FRYE. There are many cases on the Calendar, and it was proceeding with a good deal of harmony, and I thought it better on the whole to let it go on until 2 o'clock to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would relieve the Chair greatly if the Senate would decide whether when the Senate meets at 11 o'clock, the morning hour defined by the rules is to continue until 2, or is to cease at 1. It is the duty of the Chair whenever the morning hour ceases to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, or the Senator representing it has the right to call the attention of the Senate to it. At previous sessions, where the Senate has met at 11, changing the hour from 12, it has been held that the morning hour closed at 1. That has been usually done, however, by an order.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that it be ordered that after to-day the morning hour be considered as terminating in two hours from the time of opening the session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that after to-day the morning hour shall close in two hours from the time of meeting.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to have the time continued until 2 o'clock to-day.

Mr. HOAR. It will give you three hours to-day.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Is it the understanding that to-day the Calendar shall be continued until 2 o'clock?

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, the motion is that after to-day the morning hour shall terminate in two hours from the opening of the session, which would be 1 o'clock, leaving it to go on for to-day until 2 o'clock.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Very well; that is satisfactory to me.

Mr. PASCO. I hope we may proceed with the consideration of the bill before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. MORGAN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama objects to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Massachusetts to make the motion?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that after to-day the morning hour close at the expiration of two hours from the time of meeting.

Mr. MORGAN. Is that motion in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. CHANDLER. I call for the reading of the rule.

Mr. MORGAN. Is it in order under the rule?

Mr. HOAR. I understand it has been the universal practice.

Mr. MORGAN. I am willing to go back to 12 o'clock as the hour of meeting, but I am not willing to agree to any arrangement which cuts off the Calendar before 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts would change the rule, and that therefore one day's notice must be given. The Secretary will read the opening clause of Rule VIII.

The Secretary read as follows:

At the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless upon motion the Senate shall at any time otherwise order, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar of bills and resolutions, and continue such consideration until 2 o'clock.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose that unless unanimous consent be given to put the motion it can not be put now for several reasons. One is that something else is before the Senate. It would require unanimous consent unquestionably to put the question at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No matter what may be before the Senate at the time when the morning hour expires, that is interrupted, and the Chair is required by the rule to lay before the Senate the unfinished business. The Chair desired to be instructed for the purpose of facilitating the business of the Senate, and for no other reason.

Mr. CHANDLER. When this question was up before the Chair was understood to say that he would make inquiry as to what the previous rule and practice of the Senate had been. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who raised the question, said that in his opinion the previous rule and practice ought to govern. I desire to ask whether the Chair has examined the precedents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has made the examination suggested, and finds that on previous occasions when the hour of meeting has been changed from 12 o'clock to 11 o'clock it has been accompanied by an order providing for the close of the morning hour at 1 o'clock, but unless there is some change of the standing order of morning business under the rule it would continue until 2 o'clock, as that hour is specified in the rule.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to ask permission to make a remark about this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama will proceed, if there be no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. MORGAN. I think we made a mistake in fixing the hour of meeting at 11 o'clock just when we did. Before all the committees of which I am a member a good deal of the most important business that we have had to consider at this session is now pending. In every one of them there is very important business, and when the time is cut off an hour in the morning from our committee work we can not get time to attend to it. I think that it is very much better that the committees should be allowed to work on and prepare their business, so that if it can not be considered at this session it will go over until the December session and be then in a state of preparation. That is very obvious indeed.

I think the result is very admirable that the Senate does much the larger part of its work entirely through committees. We hold our committees up to a pretty severe responsibility, and they ought to be held to a close and narrow examination of every question that comes before them. The result is that when we get into the Senate here with our business, the committees have examined into the matters, and we pass a great many bills without debate. We are a long way ahead of the other House, as we all know, although debate here is entirely unlimited. It is an immediate result of the fact that business is matured in committee. I think we are injuring the whole business of the Senate by limiting, as we are now doing practically, the committee work of a morning to one hour. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has prepared and handed me a resolution. I am not quite sure that it is in order. It reads:

Resolved, That from and after this date the regular hour of meeting of the Senate shall be 12 o'clock meridian.

I do not know whether it is in order. Will the President state whether it is in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Plainly.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the resolution as a substitute for the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

I wish to say one more word about this matter. I think that no body of legislators in the world deserve more credit for their fidelity to public work than the Senators of the United States. They work systematically and thoroughly and conscientiously. I must say that I think in the main there is as much wisdom in the legislation prepared by this body as in any body that has ever existed in the world; and I repeat, it is due to the fact that our committees have time to consider questions, and that they do consider them maturely.

I wish to call the attention of the Senator for just one moment to an instance. On Thursday morning the Committee on Indian Affairs met. We had before us a bill that came to us from the House of Representatives to provide a commission for the consideration of Indian depredation claims. In regard to the question of the liability of the Government of the United States for Indian depredations, whether we consider it as a legal question, an equitable question, or a moral question, there is considerable doubt and difficulty. The House of Representatives has acted. Great pressure is brought to bear upon the committee and upon the Senate that we should move immediately into legislation upon that very important topic. Already claims have accumulated probably to the amount of $13,000,000 or $14,000,000 upon examined cases, the record of the history of which is preserved now in the Department of the Interior, and a much larger number remain unexamined. We could not consider that question in one hour's work. We know that great pressure is brought to bear upon the Senate in pushing our work right ahead. We are at it continually during this torrid season and hardly suspend at all. Even at the dinner hour we are found working here continually.

I hope that the Senator from Massachusetts will reconsider his thought of having the Senate meet at 11 o'clock, and let us go back to our original rule, 12 o'clock.

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave to say a word in reply to the Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HOAR. I think I came into the Senate at the same time with my honorable friend from Alabama, nearly twelve years ago, and I had some means of observation for a good many years before that time, being a member of the other House; and it has been the universal practice of the Senate ever since I have known it, that whenever the latter part of a session approached, when the important measures had got ripe, the Senate provided for meeting at 11 o'clock or at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, thereby enlarging the portion of the day assigned to the Senate and diminishing that assigned to committees for their work, while in the earlier part of the session the larger portion of the morning was assigned to committees.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the fact that that is not the situation now in the Senate, because we have virtually passed all our appropriation bills, and the remaining part of the session is to be devoted to general legislation.

Mr. HOAR. The general legislation is ripe. We have a Calendar. We have the fisheries treaty ripe for discussion.

Mr. MORGAN. That discussion will be short now, I think.

Mr. HOAR. I did not hear the Senator's answer.

Mr. MORGAN. I say I think the fishery discussion will not be prolonged after this time.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Alabama gratifies me, and will gratify the Senate, I am sure, with his statement that he thinks the fishery discussion will not be long after this time. I am very glad indeed to hear that suggestion. Still the tariff will unquestionably be here in a few days and there are other important matters on the Calendar, so much so that there is some question about their order of consideration in reference to each other.

We have now reached a period later than the limit of the longest session of the Senate known since the close of the war, or certainly since the close of President Johnson's administration, with two exceptions. Once the session ended on the 7th of August and once on the 15th; and I do not believe there can be found in the history of the Senate a year when it did not before this date change its regular hour of morning meeting from 12 to 11 o'clock. So the resolution passed by the Senate the other day is in the line of its uniform precedent and example.

It seems to me that the work of the committees, what remains to be matured there, is very unimportant, except what is going on in the Finance Committee, as compared with what remains to be done here in the open Senate. I hope that the Senate will not reverse its deliberate action of the other day. I am quite certain that the Senator from Alabama, although he has good reason, as he is pretty apt to have for anything he avers or thinks, will defer in this matter, as we all or us have to do, to the judgment of the majority of his brethren, whatever that may turn out to be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution offered by the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HOAR. I think the two propositions had better be considered together. I will make no objection to the Senate considering the honorable Senator's resolution if there is no objection to considering mine at this time. I will inquire of the Senator from Alabama if he has any objection to having both these questions now considered by the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. No, I shall make no objection.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that if the hour of meeting should be restored to 12 o'clock, the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts would be disposed of by the rule, the rule now providing that the morning hour shall conclude at 2 o'clock. The Chair understood the Senator from Massachusetts to move that the morning hour should conclude in two hours from the time the meeting of the Senate commenced.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose that must go over and be accompanied by pointing out the particular rule it affects.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Massachusetts to ask for unanimous consent.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that that matter and the resolution of the Senator from Alabama may both be considered at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? ["None."] The Chair hears none. The resolution proposed by the Senator from Alabama will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That from and after this date the regular hour of meeting of the Senate shall be 12 o'clock meridian.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts did not submit his proposition in writing, but the Chair understands it to be that the morning hour shall close at the expiration of two hours from the hour of meeting.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose the resolution of the Senator from Alabama will properly be considered first, because if his is adopted it is evident that mine becomes unimportant.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question then will be, if there be no objection, upon agreeing to the resolution offered by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HOAR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE].

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BLODGETT], and vote "yea."

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. BERRY (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, was called). My colleague [Mr. JONES, of Arkansas] is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PAYNE (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. VANCE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER].

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], who is absent. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. COLQUITT. I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], but transfer my pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], and vote "yea."

Mr. VEST (after having voted in the affirmative). It has been suggested to me that this is a party question, and I withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri withdraws his vote.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Bate,	Cockrell,	Gray,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Coke,	Hampton,	Walthall.
Berry,	Colquitt,	Morgan,

Eustis,	McPherson,	Riddleberger,	Wilson of Iowa,
Farwell,	Morrill,	Sabin,	Wilson of Md.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum not having voted, the Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Coke,	Hawley,	Reagan,
Bate,	Colquitt,	Hoar,	Sabin,
Beck,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Sawyer,
Berry,	Dolph,	Jones of Nevada	Spooner,
Blair,	Evarts,	Manderson,	Stewart,
Bowen,	Farwell,	Mitchell,	Vance,
Brown,	Faulkner,	Morgan,	Vest,
Call,	Frye,	Paddock,	Walthall,
Chace,	George,	Pasco,	Wilson of Iowa.
Chandler,	Gray,	Payne,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Ransom,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-two Senators have answered to their names upon the roll-call—more than a quorum. If there be no objection, further proceedings under the call will be dispensed with and the roll will be again called upon agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE].

Mr. EDMUNDS (when his name was called). With the consent of my friend from Missouri [Mr. VEST], I have transferred my pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has transferred his pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], so that we are both at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I have transferred my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BLODGETT]. I vote "yea."

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PAYNE (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague [Mr. SHERMAN]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. Otherwise, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. I have transferred that pair to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER], and vote "nay."

Mr. VANCE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER], but am assured that he would vote "nay," and for the sake of making a quorum, I vote "nay" also.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PUGH. On this vote, I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. PAYNE. My pair having been transferred, I vote "yea."

Mr. PADDOCK. I understand that my pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] has been transfered to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. Therefore I vote "nay."

Mr. MANDERSON. If not paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Bate,	Coke,	Hampton,	Vest,
Beck,	Colquitt,	Morgan,	Walthall.
Berry,	Faulkner,	Pasco,
Brown,	George,	Payne,
Cockrell,	Gray,	Reagan,

NAYS—22.

Allison,	Dawes,	Hoar,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Dolph,	Ingalls,	Spooner,
Bowen,	Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Stewart,
Chace,	Evarts,	Mitchell,	Vance.
Chandler,	Farwell,	Paddock,
Cullom,	Hawley,	Sabin,

ABSENT—37.

Aldrich,	Cameron,	Gibson,	Hiscock,
Blackburn,	Daniel,	Gorman,	Jones of Arkansas,
Blodgett,	Davis,	Hale,	Kenna,
Butler,	Eustis,	Harris,	McPherson,
Call,	Frye,	Hearst,	Manderson,
Morrill,	Quay,	Stanford,	Wilson of Iowa,
Palmer,	Ransom,	Stockbridge,	Wilson of Md.
Platt,	Riddleberger,	Teller,
Plumb,	Saulsbury,	Turpie,
Pugh,	Sherman,	Voorhees,

So Mr. MORGAN'S resolution was rejected.

EXPIRATION OF MORNING HOUR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs upon the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. HOAR. I have put it in writing. I hope it will not be necessary to have any division on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That after to-day, unless otherwise ordered, the morning hour shall terminate at the expiration of two hours after the meeting of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection to the present consideration of the resolution, the question is on agreeing to the same.

The resolution was agreed to.

THOMAS H. SAULSBURY.

Mr. GRAY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Miss Mary E. Saulsbury, sister of Thomas H. Saulsbury, deceased, late clerk to the Committee on Engrossed Bills, the sum of $1,095, being an amount equal to six months' salary at the rate per diem allowed by law to the clerk aforesaid; said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

FORT BROOKE RESERVATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3340) for the donation of Fort Brooke military reservation at Tampa, Fla., for free schools and other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], in line 14, section 1, to strike out "granted" and insert "allotted."

Mr. WALTHALL. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut if he thinks the substitution of the word "allotted" for the word "granted" in the first section of the bill will in the least degree affect the sense and legal effect of the section. I make the inquiry in view of the concluding sentence in the section, which is in these words:

And the United States hereby reserves to itself the fee and the right forever to resume occupancy of all or any portion of said park whenever it shall be required for public uses.

In view of these qualifying words, it occurs to me that the substitution of the word "allotted" for the word "granted" will not affect the sense of the clause.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will only say that I understand the subsequent reservation; but I am speaking now not so much of my own judgment in the matter as by reason of the President's veto of a precisely similar bill as to language, and because the word "allotted" came to me, with the sanction of a lawyer of the very highest standing, as meaning a mere setting apart and conveying no shadow of a title, especially with the qualifications.

Mr. WALTHALL. Does the Senator think that if the word "allotted" had appeared in the Tacoma bill it would have met the President's objection?

Mr. HAWLEY. I am rather inclined to think it would.

Mr. EVARTS. It may be perhaps an unnecessary refinement, and it is not certainly one that I should suggest; but in consequence of the President's refinement on the subject it is quite important that we should avoid any conflict in future consideration.

The objection is as to the use of the word "grant," which is, as held by the law-books, a very large word in the law, that it would convey by that force the fee; but as there is subsequently a reservation of the fee and of the right of resumption of occupancy at the mere will of the United States, it seems unnecessary to create a question of real-estate law as to repugnancy between grant and reservation of fee; that is, to turn the operation of the reserved fee into a forfeiture instead of having any consonance with the original estate allowed.

It will be seen that the United States purposes to sell its reservation excepting "3 acres reserved for a building for the United States; 5 acres for a marine hospital, and 25 acres which is hereby granted to the city of Tampa for a public park; as shown upon the map hereinafter mentioned." Then the qualifications upon that fee are that the improvement and use by the town shall only be of the public nature which is described; and then the reservation is an express reservation of the fee and the right.

As, then, in disposing of this public reservation as it now is, the allotments are made and the 25 acres are marked off, by the use of the word "allotted" for the uses, the reservation does not take the shape of a forfeiture when we resume it, but is entirely consistent with the fact that there never has been anything but a marking off for specific purposes for the use of the city. That is the foundation of this qualification.

Mr. WALTHALL. I will ask the Senator for my own information whether he thinks the use of the word "granted" in the first section of the bill would stand in the way of the right to resume the occupancy of the land described, as provided for in the last clause of the section?

Mr. EVARTS. I have pointed out the only obstacle to that. It is raising a question of repugnance between a grant and a reservation of a fee which is the opposite of a grant. A grant means, unexplained and unqualified, the fee. You grant a fee and then you make a reservation. Then the question is whether the reservation is not in the nature of a reservation of a forfeiture, and Congress would be put in the condition of forfeiting a grant by taking possession after there had been this expenditure and this enjoyment which is intended to be freely accorded, I admit, to the city.

If the Senator asks my opinion as to what the consequences of the use of grant in the outset, and reservation of fee, and resumption of occupancy in the latter clause accomplishes, I agree that it accomplishes a reservation of the fee; but I do not know but that the same opposition or repugnance that has been suggested in regard to Tacoma Park by the President may be brought up here.

Therefore, if the point is of any significance, I wish that our allotment of these acres for special use and occupation, the fee being always ours and the right of resumption at our free will, shall not raise a question as to whether a grant is to be terminated by a forfeiture and not merely by an exercise according to the purpose of the original estate.

Mr. DOLPH. Allusion has been made to the President's veto of an act granting the use of certain lands in Pierce County, Washington Territory, to the city of Tacoma for the purposes of a public park. I perhaps shall have an opportunity hereafter to discuss that veto, but just at this time I propose to call the attention of the Senate to the difference between the grant in the bill under consideration and the grant in the bill vetoed by the President.

By the bill under consideration, as it was reported from the committee, 25 acres of land are granted to the city of Tampa for a public park, and it is provided that "the United States hereby reserves to itself the fee and the right forever to resume occupancy of all or any portion of said park whenever it shall be required for public uses." Here is a grant in express terms of the land, of the title, except as modified by the subsequent provision. That proviso is that the United States may "resume occupancy of all or any portion of said park."

I have an impression that under this provision it would require an act of Congress to authorize the occupancy of the land to be resumed by the Government, because it is the United States that is to act, and the United States in such a matter, I presume, can only act through the legislative department of the Government.

In the bill which was vetoed by the President there was granted to the city of Tacoma, in the county of Pierce, in the Territory of Washington, not a tract of land or a certain number of acres of land, but "the right to occupy, improve, and control, for the purposes of a public park for the use and benefit of the citizens of the United States, and for no other purposes whatever, the following described pieces or parcels of land." Then follows a description of a portion of a military reservation near the city of Tacoma, and then it is provided as follows:

Provided, That the United States reserves to itself the fee and the right forever to resume possession and occupy any portion of said lands for naval or military purposes whenever in the judgment of the President the exigency arises that should require the use and appropriation of the same for the public defense or for such other disposition as Congress may determine, without any claim for compensation to said city for improvements thereon or damages on account thereof.

If there be, as claimed by the President, objection to the character of this grant, it must be to the granting words in the bill, or to the provision for the resumption of the possession of the land by the United States. There are stronger objections both to the granting words and to the provision for the resumption of title in the bill which is under consideration.

But I think the veto of the President upon its face is frivolous. It will be observed, as I said before, that it is not the title to the land which was granted to the city of Tacoma by the bill. It was merely "the right to occupy, improve, and control it for the purposes of a public park." The President says in his message:

The Chief of Engineers suggested an amendment to the bill providing that the mere permission to use this land for a park should be granted.

I should like to know what further right was granted by the act to the city of Tacoma than a mere license to occupy and improve and control for the purposes of a park. Then the President quoted apparently from the report of the Chief of Engineers, which was made to the Secretary of War and transmitted by the Secretary of War to the Senate Committee on Public Lands.

I will remark, in passing, that the bill which was introduced by myself and referred to the Committee on Public Lands was referred to the Secretary of War, and by him to the Lieutenant-General of the Army and to the Chief of Engineers, and was favorably recommended by them and transmitted with favorable recommendation by the Secretary to the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate, and that committee undertook to make the bill comply with the recommendations of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers, and for that purpose inserted the proviso which I have read. The Chief of Engineers in the portion of his communication quoted recommended—

That this permission—

That is, the permission to the city of Tacoma to use this land—

be given with the full understanding that the United States intends to occupy the lands or any part of them for military or other purposes whenever its proper officials see fit to order the same and without any claim for compensation or damage on the part of said city of Tacoma.

I will again read the proviso of the bill which was vetoed, and I should like some astute lawyer to point out to me in what particular the committee failed to comply with the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers. The proviso is as follows:

Provided, That the United States reserves to itself the fee and the right forever to resume possession and occupy any portion of said lands for naval or military purposes whenever in the judgment of the President the exigency arises that should require the use and appropriation of the same for the public defense or for such other disposition as Congress may determine, "without any claim for compensation to said city for improvements thereon or damages on account thereof."

In the first place, the United States has no use and never will have any use for this reservation. It was made before the subject had been properly examined as to what lands were necessary for fortifications and other defenses upon Puget Sound. If there are ever any fortifications on Puget Sound, they will be put further down the Sound, down near the present port of entry, Port Townsend, at Point Wilson, and Admiralty Head. There fortifications on both sides of the channel would secure the defense of the entire Sound and all the cities along its shores. This land under consideration is near the city of Tacoma, so near that the city proposes to use it for a park. It is so near that any fortification erected upon it would be entirely useless for the protection of the city; and then, if an expensive fortification were erected upon it, it would only be of use in defending the one city, while all the rest of the Sound would be left exposed.

I repeat that it is a piece of land for which the United States have no use for purposes of fortification; but supposing that, as is thought possible by the Chief of Engineers, it might hereafter be required for such purposes, the bill which was vetoed by the President was so worded that the land could be resumed at any time by the United States and used for the purposes of fortifications, or for any purpose authorized by Congress.

At present it is an unimproved parcel of land near a growing city, an unsightly place, a camping ground for tramps who congregate there, over which the local authorities can exercise no control. If the bill had been allowed to become a law, it would have been improved and beautified, and would then have become an ornament to the city, and whatever expenditure was made upon the land would have inured to the benefit of the Government whenever the United States saw fit to take possession of it.

I was not here when the veto message came into the Senate. I think it has been referred to the Committee on Public Lands. I shall probably take occasion hereafter to discuss it in connection with the bill. I simply now desire to supplement the statement of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], that if there were objections to that bill either as to the granting words or as to the reservation to the United States of the right to reoccupy the ground, there are greater objections to the bill which is under consideration.

Mr. WALTHALL. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon, who is a member of the Committee on Public Lands, which reported this bill, as I am myself, whether he thinks that the adoption of the proposed amendment, which is simply to strike out the word "granted" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "allotted," would change the legal effect of the first section of the bill?

Mr. DOLPH. No, I do not think so. I think that an act containing a grant must be construed under the familiar rule by which a deed is construed. That rule has been tersely stated to be that you must take it up by its four corners and examine it. Therefore, when a court comes to consider a grant like the one contained in this bill or the one contained in the bill which was vetoed by the President, every portion of it must be examined together, and no matter what the granting words are, if there is a reservation contained in the bill of the title, the fee, to the United States, the fee will not pass. I do not myself think that any advantage would be gained by adopting the amendment which is proposed.

Mr. WALTHALL. As there seems to be a general agreement that the insertion of the word "allotted" in place of the word "granted" would not affect the sense of the section, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. EVARTS. If I may be allowed to say a word——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York can proceed by unanimous consent, having already spoken once on the bill.

Mr. WALTHALL. I will withdraw the motion so as to allow the Senator from New York to be heard.

Mr. EVARTS. We have not the agreement of the President that there is not a difference between granting and allotting. All the evidence we have on the subject is that he does draw a distinction between a grant and a lesser title.

Mr. WALTHALL. Now, Mr. President——

ADMISSION OF WASHINGTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi will pause. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEWART. That bill is in the way of all other business, and I am exceedingly anxious that it shall be disposed of. I understand there is not much further time to be occupied on it. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] desire to make a few remarks, and it may be that some other Senators do, but the debate I understand has been practically closed with those exceptions. I ask unanimous consen that the vote be taken on it on Wednesday next at half past 12 o'clock. In the mean time those gentlemen will arrive, and if they should want to occupy a little time in the morning hour they may be allowed to do so, and that will dispose of the measure.

Mr. FRYE. I shall be obliged to object, as at present advised.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the fisheries treaty in executive session with open doors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed in open executive session to the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from Maine will allow the Fort Brooke military reservation bill to be proceeded with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent to say a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from Maine will withdraw his motion and allow the consideration of the Fort Brooke military reservation bill to go on. The Senate is about ready to take a vote upon it, and it will occupy very little more time.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator refers to the bill which was under consideration on the Calendar?

Mr. CALL. Yes; the bill which was under consideration when 2 o'clock arrived.

Mr. FRYE. I have no objection to that, if there is not to be any extended debate.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is bound to be debate. I can say that.

Mr. FRYE. I think, then, I shall have to press my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE.]

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now in open executive session. If there be no objection, the reading of the Journal of the last open executive session will be dispensed with. The Executive Clerk will report the treaty by its title.

The EXECUTIVE CLERK. Treaty between the United States and Great Britain, concerning the interpretation of the convention of October 20, 1818, signed at Washington February 15, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs upon the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to postpone the further consideration of the treaty until the Wednes after the first Monday in December next.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to explain to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] my objection. I objected to the proposition which the Senator from Nevada made and it is something very unusual for me to enter an objection to any proceeding in the Senate. But it has seemed best for those who are opposed to the ratification of the treaty and desire that there shall be a termination of the matter, to go into executive session on Monday morning immediately after the reading of the Journal, and from day to day next week, to the exclusion of all other business, until a conclusion is reached on the matter. That is the reason why I entered an objection to the Senator's proposition.

Mr. STEWART. Then, if that course is pursued, I give notice that I shall insist upon the disposition of the Washington Territory bill immediately thereafter, without having any intervening order. It will take but a short time to dispose of it when we can once proceed to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on the motion of the Senator from Alabama that the further consideration of the treaty be postponed until the Wednesday after the first Monday in December next?

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Alabama, I see, is not in his seat, and I would prefer that the question be postponed until that Senator can be present.

Mr. VEST. The understanding was that the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] was to proceed to-day.

Mr. HARRIS. That is what I understood to be the arrangement this morning.

Mr. CALL. I have not made any arrangements to speak to-day, and I prefer not to do so.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Alabama will be in the Chamber in a moment. I ask that no vote be taken until after his arrival.

Mr. VEST. I have a suggestion to make to the Senator from Maine. I understood him to say that he proposed in behalf of the majority of the Senate to call up the treaty on Monday immediately after the reading of the Journal. He certainly does not mean to exclude all morning business. As he knows very well, on Monday morning there is an accumulation of routine business in the morning hour, especially when we adjourn over, as we shall do this afternoon, without a session of the Senate on Saturday. I suggest to him that he modify his motion or his declaration in that respect.

Mr. FRYE. I think I shall do that for Monday morning. I recognize the force of the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. VEST. Extend it on Monday morning at any rate, until we get through with the morning business; otherwise there will be a lock on the morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question upon the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] that the further consideration of the treaty be postponed until the Wednesday after the first Monday in December next?

Mr. MORGAN. I supposed that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] was prepared to take the floor this morning. He desires to reply to the remarks of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Alabama will allow me to say that I had not expected to take the floor this morning. Indeed, I had no definite expectation of taking the floor at all, but I understood the Senator from Florida desired to submit his views on the motion of the Senator from Alabama before it was disposed of, and I presume he will do so to-day or at some time more convenient to him.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Maine to allow this matter to go over until Monday. It is true that I desire to address the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida appeals to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Maine, inasmuch as he proposes to take this matter up and proceed with it on Monday, to allow it to go over until Monday. I do desire to address the Senate, but I am not altogether ready with the references I wish to submit, although I have no very elaborate preparations to make. If the matter is to be pressed on Monday, as I understand it is his purpose to press it, I see no reason why it should not be passed over until then.

Mr. FRYE. I would inquire if any Senator is prepared to go on to-day in favor of the treaty or in favor of the proposition of the Senator from Alabama. If not, of course I am not going to insist that a vote shall be taken now. If no Senator is ready to go on, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. I take it that I have given sufficient notice that on Monday morning, after the morning business is through, the Senate will be asked to proceed with the consideration of the treaty.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2116) to provide aid to State homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 8592) for the erection of a public building at Jackson, Mich.; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

ADMISSION OF WASHINGTON.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. CULLOM to the substitute reported by the Committee on Territories.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] has, I think, already left the Chamber, supposing that the discussion of the treaty would go on. I think it was his purpose to address the Senate on this subject when taken up again. I hope the Senator from Nevada will allow the bill to be informally laid aside for to-day.

Mr. STEWART. If there is no Senator present who desires to address the Senate on the bill to-day, I ask that it be again informally laid aside and that the Senate proceed with the Calendar, with the expectation, as I again give notice, that immediately after the fishery treaty is disposed of I shall ask for a vote on the pending bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to its consideration at any time, except that the Senator from Nebraska has left the Chamber not expecting the bill to be taken up to-day.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BECK. I do not know exactly what motion to make. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed with the Calendar under Rule VIII for to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the pending business be informally laid aside, and that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the Calendar under Rule IX.

Mr. HARRIS. Rule VIII was what the Senator said.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Rule IX is in order after 2 o'clock.

Mr. HARRIS. Rule VIII is what the Senator suggested.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Rule VIII expires at 2 o'clock, and the consideration of the General Calendar of Orders would then be resumed.

Mr. HARRIS. But it can be done by unanimous consent. That is what was asked.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asks the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the Calendar, under Rule VIII, for the remainder of this day. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. That means the unobjected cases.

Mr. BLAIR. Here is an unexpected break in the proceedings, and I should like in such parliamentary way as is necessary to get up the Army nurses bill, which, having been partially discussed, was arrested by an objection from the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] some two or three months ago. Since that time the matter has been somewhat examined, and an amendment has been brought to me by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], which I have examined, and which he seemed to think was entirely satisfactory. I should be glad, as I think it would end controversy, to have the bill taken up, the amendment adopted, and the bill passed. It will take but a few minutes probably.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will first submit the request of the Senator from Kentucky, who asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed for the remainder of this day to the consideration of the Calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAIR. May I be allowed by common consent to make an inquiry? Should objection be made, would a motion be in order that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Army nurses bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would.

Mr. BLAIR. I then object, and make that motion.

Mr. COCKRELL. On that I shall call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BECK. Before that is done, allow me to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I have no desire to postpone the matter to which he refers, but I have not my papers here, and I should like to see the proposed amendment before the bill is considered.

Mr. BLAIR. Very well; I do not wish to press it in the absence of any preparation, but I should like to have it understood that I intend to press it at the proper time.

Mr. BECK. I will vote to take up the bill at any time when I have the papers here.

Mr. BLAIR. I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky that the Senate proceed for the remainder of this day with the consideration of the Calendar under Rule VIII? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 8th instant approved and signed the following bills and joint resolution:

An act (S. 64) to authorize the juries of the United States circuit and district courts to be used interchangeably and to provide for drawing talesmen;

An act (S. 143) to provide for the issuing and recording of certain commissions in the Department of Justice;

An act (S. 183) requiring notice of deficiency in accounts of principals to be given to sureties upon bonds of United States officials, and fixing a limitation of time within which suits shall be brought against said sureties upon said bonds;

An act (S. 190) for the relief of W. H. Tibbits;

An act (S. 2316) restoring the right of pre-emption to Jesse A. Corn; and Joint resolution (S. R. 77) providing for a duplicate of the compilation of the reports of the Senate and House of Representatives from 1815 to 1887.

The message also announced that the President had on the 9th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 196) to cancel certain reservations of lands, on account of live-oak, in the southwestern land district of the State of Louisiana;

An act (S. 856) to provide for the holding of the district court of the United States at Salina, Kans.;

An act (S. 928) in relation to marriage between white men and Indian women;

An act (S. 1782) to authorize the leasing of the school and university lands in the Territory of Wyoming, and for other purposes; and

An act (S. 2009) to restore the homestead right of M. F. Vance, of Akron, Colo.

The message further announced that the President had this day approved and signed the act (S. 2624) to provide for the enlargement of the dimensions of the wharf at Fortress Monroe.

ESTATE OF J. J. PULLIAM.

Mr. HOAR. I am authorized by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to state to the Senate that he has examined Senate bill 751, which was passed over under his objection this morning, and makes no further objection thereto. I ask the Senate, therefore, to go back to that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Would the Senator desire to interfere with the bill which had been partially considered when the hour of 2 o'clock arrived?

Mr. HOAR. This bill will take but one moment. It is a short matter. It is an act of absolute plain justice to which nobody will object.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill has been read and it was passed over without prejudice.

Mr. HOAR. It has been read. If the Senate will listen to me one moment, I will state the whole story.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 751) for the relief of the estate of J. J. Pulliam, deceased.

Mr. HOAR. The Senate is aware that what is known as the 4th of July bill for certain Southern claims which we, under our established principles, are in the habit of paying for Army supplies is made up in this way: An officer in the Quartermaster's Department examines the claims and applies to them the well-settled principles upon which they are allowed. They then are reported and are passed in one bill, in which frequently there are several hundred claims of this character.

The chairman of the Committee on Claims in the Senate, as well as the chairman of the committee in the House, goes over the bill, examines each case to find that it corresponds with the Quartermaster-General's report, and looks enough into the evidence to see that the claim comes within that general class, and then we pass the claims without further examination. After that bill had been made up in the other House two or three years ago, the Comptroller, to whom the report goes from the Quartermaster-General, sent a communication to the Senate, saying that a mistake had been made by the officer in the Quartermaster's Department, and that a larger sum ought to have been allowed to Mr. Pulliam, and said he would have allowed it himself if he had had the authority to revise the Quartermaster's decision. Thereupon the Senate committee proposed to amend the bill by increasing the amount, but we found it was so near the end of the session that if we amended the bill and sent it back to the other House, the whole bill, involving a great many hundred claims, would fail.

Thereupon we made a report from the Committee on Claims, stating the facts, saying that we did not amend the bill in that particular because the result would be injustice to others, and that a separate bill would be brought in at a future Congress to remedy that.

This bill simply authorizes the re-examination of that claim, and authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay it, if he finds on the re-examination any further amount due. That is the whole story.

Mr. COCKRELL. There ought to be an amendment, I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts, in line 12. The bill reads:

> And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum that may be found due said estate.

I propose to insert at that point the words:

> First deducting any sum heretofore paid.

Mr. HOAR. There is no objection to that. Of course an amount is not due if it has been heretofore paid; but if it satisfies the Senator, very well.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think it had better show that.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not see any necessity for such an amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill itself does not recognize any former settlement.

Mr. HARRIS. The records show that there has been a payment; but there is no particular objection to the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose, as the bill authorizes the payment of what is due, that what has been paid would not be included in that amount. It is, however, a question of mere phraseology, and I shall not object to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). The amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] will be stated from the desk.

The SECRETARY. After the word "estate," in line 12, it is proposed to insert "first deducting any sum heretofore paid."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT BROOKE MILITARY RESERVATION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill in order will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3340) for the donation of Fort Brooke military reservation at Tampa, Fla., for free schools, and other purposes.

Mr. CALL. Let that bill be informally passed over without losing its place on the Calendar. Several Senators who took part in the discussion and vote have gone away on necessary engagements, and I therefore request that the bill be passed over informally, retaining its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the bill will be passed over without prejudice. The Chair hears no objection.

RATES OF POSTAGE.

The bill (S. 3329) to reduce the postage on fourth-class mail-matter was announced as next in order.

Mr. BECK. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk as a substitute for the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

That on and after January 1, A. D. 1889, the rate of postage on all mail matter now known as first-class, shall be 1 cent for each ounce, or any fractional part thereof.

Mr. SAWYER. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to. I ask that the bill go over until the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] who reported it is present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be passed over without prejudice, if there be no objection.

COMMERCE BY TELEGRAPH.

The bill (S. 1688) to regulate commerce carried on by telegraph was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 6, before the word "messages," to strike out "electricity" and insert "telegraph;" so as to read:

That the term "telegraph company," as used in this act, shall include any person or persons, or corporation or corporations engaged in the business of transmitting, for hire, by telegraph, messages from one State or Territory of the United States, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 8, after the word "whatsoever," to insert:

Or to charge any more for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line.

So as to read:

That it shall be unlawful for any telegraph company, subject to the provisions of this act, to give any unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or class of business, in any respect whatever, or to subject any particular person, company, firm, corporation, locality, or class of business to any unreasonable discrimination or disadvantage, in any respect whatsoever, or to charge any more for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line.

Mr. BECK. This is a very important bill, as I judge from the reading of it so far, and I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if it is the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. CULLOM. I believe it is the unanimous report of the committee. Every member who was present favored it.

Mr. BECK. I do not know anything about it, but the five-minute rule allows a very short time to consider and debate such a bill.

Mr. CULLOM. There was no disagreement whatever in committee about the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BECK. No, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 10, after the word "afford," to strike out "reasonably;" so as to read:

Every such telegraph company shall afford equal facilities for the receiving, forwarding, transmitting, and delivering of messages to and from their several lines and those connecting therewith, and shall not discriminate in their rates and charges between such connecting lines.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, line 3, before the word "telegraph," to strike out "other" and insert "competing;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any such telegraph company to enter into any contract, agreement, or combination with any competing telegraph company or companies to divide between them the aggregate or net proceeds of the earnings of such companies upon their respective lines, or any portions thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, line 10, after the word "service," to insert:

But nothing in this act shall be construed as prohibiting any such telegraph company from receiving, transmitting, and delivering messages for the United States, or for any State or municipal corporation, or for the press, intended for publication as news, at lower rates than are at the same time charged for social, business, and other messages, but no such company shall discriminate between the publishers of newspapers by allowing terms or advantages to one or more newspapers for a like and contemporaneous service, which are not allowed to other newspapers in any city, town, or place where there is, or may be, a telegraph office from which such messages may be dropped.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, line 25, after the word "said," to strike out "commissioners" and insert "commission;" so as to read:

If any such telegraph company shall neglect or refuse to file its schedule of rates with the said commission, or to give notice of changes therein as aforesaid, or to publish its schedules of rates as required by said commission, such telegraph company shall, in addition to other penalties herein prescribed, be subject to a writ of mandamus, to be issued by any circuit court of the United States in the judicial district wherein the principal office of such telegraph company is situated, or wherein such offense may be committed, and, if such telegraph company be a foreign corporation in the judicial circuit wherein such telegraph company accepts and transmits messages, and has agents and operators to perform such service, to compel compliance with the provisions of this section, and such writ shall issue in the name of the people of the United States, at the relation of said commission, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, line 9, after the word "reasonable," to strike out "counsel or attorney's" and insert "attorney," and in line 10, after the word "which," to strike out "attorney's" and insert "attorney;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That in case any telegraph company, subject to the provisions of this act, shall do, cause to be done, or permit to be done any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or declared to be unlawful, or shall omit to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, such telegraph company shall be liable, to the person or persons injured thereby, for the full amount of damages sustained in consequence of any such violation of the provisions of this act, together with a reasonable attorney fee, to be fixed by the court, in every case of recovery, which attorney fee shall be taxed and collected as part of the costs in the case.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, line 26, after the word "action," to insert:

Nor unless the same would be lawfully produced if such message were an original letter in the possession of the party to whom the same was addressed.

So as to make the proviso read:

Provided, however, That no such witness shall be compelled to produce or testify to the contents of any telegram received or transmitted by such company unless the same shall have been sent by or to the plaintiff or plaintiffs in such action, nor unless the same would be lawfully produced if such message were an original letter in the possession of the party to whom the same was addressed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 11, line 19, after the word "commission," to insert:

And such commission shall have the same jurisdiction and power over telegraph companies, in so far as may be necessary to the execution of this act, as it has over common carriers by virtue of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. I ask consent to make a formal amendment. After the amendment which has just been adopted I move to insert a period instead of a semicolon. Then in line 25 I move to strike out the word "and" and make the "a" in "any" a capital, so as to commence a new sentence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be considered as agreed to in the absence of objection.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Interstate Commerce Committee was to strike out sections 14 and 15, as follows:

SEC. 14. That sections 16, 17, 20, and 21 of the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, are hereby extended and made applicable, as far as may be, to telegraph companies, and to the business thereof, subject to the provisions of this act.

SEC. 15. That this act shall take effect and be in force from the 1st day of July, A. D. 1888.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 14. That whenever any telegraph company, as defined in and subject to the provisions of this act, shall violate or refuse or neglect to obey or perform any lawful order or requirement of the commission named in this act, not founded upon a controversy requiring a trial by jury, as provided by the seventh amendment to the Constitution of the United States, it shall be the duty of the commission and lawful for any company or person interested in such order or requirement to apply in a summary way, by petition, to the circuit court of the United States sitting in equity in the judicial district in which the telegraph company complained of has its principal office, or in which the violation or disobedience of such order or requirement shall happen, alleging such violation or disobedience, as the case may be; and the said court shall have power to hear and determine the matter on such short notice to the telegraph company complained of as the court shall deem reasonable; and such notice may be served on such telegraph company, its officers, agents, or servants in such manner as the court shall direct; and said court shall proceed to hear and determine the matter speedily as a court of equity, and without the formal pleadings and proceedings applicable to ordinary suits in equity, but in such manner as to do justice in the premises; and to this end such court shall have power, if it think fit, to direct and prosecute in such mode and by such persons as it may appoint all such inquiries as the court may think needful to enable it to form a just judgment in the matter of such petition; and on such hearing the findings of fact in the report of said commission shall be prima facie evidence of the matters therein stated; and if it be made to appear to such court, on such hearing or on report of any such person or persons, that the lawful order or requirement of said commission drawn in question has been violated or disobeyed, it shall be lawful for such court to issue a writ of injunction or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise, to restrain such telegraph company from further continuing such violation or disobedience of such order or requirement of said commission, and enjoining obedience to the same; and in case of any disobedience of any such writ of injunction or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise, it shall be lawful for such court to issue writs of attachment, or any other process of said court incident or applicable to writs of injunction or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise, against such telegraph company, and if a corporation, against one or more of the directors, officers, or agents of the same, or against any owner, lessee, trustee, receiver, or other person failing to obey such writ of injunction, or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise; and said court may, if it shall think fit, make an order directing such telegraph company or other person so disobeying such writ of injunction or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise, to pay such sum of money, not exceeding for each company or person in default the sum of $500 for every day, after a day to be named in the order, that such company or other person shall fail to obey such injunction or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise; and such moneys shall be payable as the court shall direct, either to the party complaining or into court, to abide the ultimate decision of the court, or into the Treasury; and payment thereof may, without prejudice to any other mode of recovering the same, be enforced by attachment or order in the nature of a writ of execution, in like manner as if the same had been recovered by a final decree in personam in such court. When the subject in dispute shall be of the value of $2,000 or more, either party to such proceeding before said court may appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, under the same regulations now provided by law in respect of security for such appeal; but such appeal shall not operate to stay or supercede the order of the court or the execution of any writ or process thereon; and such court may, in every such matter, order the payment of such costs and counsel fees as shall be deemed reasonable. Whenever any such petition shall be filed or presented by the commission it shall be the duty of the district attorney, under the direction of the Attorney-General of the United States, to prosecute the same; and the costs and expenses of such prosecution shall be paid out of the appropriation for the expenses of the courts of the United States.

If the matters involved in any such order or requirement of said commission are founded upon a controversy requiring a trial by jury, as provided by the seventh amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and any such telegraph company shall violate or refuse or neglect to obey or perform the same, after notice given by said commission as provided in the fifteenth section of the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, it shall be lawful for any company or person interested in such order or requirement to apply in a summary way by petition to the circuit court of the United States sitting as a court of law in the judicial district in which the telegraph company complained of has its principal office, or in which the violation or disobedience of such order or requirement shall happen, alleging such violation or disobedience as the case may be; and said court shall by its order then fix a time and place for the trial of said cause, which shall not be less than twenty, nor more than forty days from the time said order is made, and it shall be the duty of the marshal of the district in which said proceeding is pending to forthwith serve a copy of said petition, and of said order, upon each of the defendants, and it shall be the duty of the defendants to file their answers to said petition within ten days after the service of the same upon them as aforesaid. At the trial the findings of fact of said commission, as set forth in its report, shall be prima facie evidence of the matters therein stated, and if either party shall demand a jury or shall omit to waive a jury the court shall, by its order, direct the marshal forthwith to summon a jury to try the cause; but if all the parties shall waive a jury in writing, then the court shall try the issues in said cause and render its judgment thereon. If the subject in dispute shall be of the value of $2,000 or more, either party may appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States under the same regulations now provided by law in respect to security for such appeal; but such appeal must be taken within twenty days from the day of the rendition of the judgment of said circuit court. If the judgment of the circuit court shall be in favor of the party complaining, he or they shall be entitled to recover a reasonable counsel or attorney's fee, to be fixed by the court, which shall be collected as part of the costs in the case. For the purposes of this act the circuit courts of the United States shall be deemed to be always in session.

SEC. 15. That the commission may conduct its proceedings in such manner as will best conduce to the proper dispatch of business and to the ends of justice. A majority of the commission shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, but no commissioner shall participate in any hearing or proceeding in which he has any pecuniary interest. Said commission may, from time to time, make or amend such general rules or orders as may be requisite for the order and regulation of proceedings before it, including forms of notices and the service thereof, which shall conform, as nearly as may be, to those in use in the courts of the United States. Any party may appear before said commission and be heard, in person or by attorney. Every vote and official act of the commission shall be entered of record, and its proceedings shall be public upon the request of either party interested. Said commission shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed. Either of the members of the commission may administer oaths and affirmations and sign subpœnas.

SEC. 16. That the commission is hereby authorized to require annual reports from all telegraph companies subject to the provisions of this act, to fix the time and prescribe the manner in which such reports shall be made, and to require from such companies specific answers to all questions upon which the Commission may need information. Such annual reports shall show in detail the amount of capital stock issued, the amounts paid therefor, and the manner of payment for the same; the dividends paid, the surplus fund, if any, and the number of stockholders; the funded and floating debts and the interest paid thereon; the cost and value of the company's property, franchises, and equipment; the number of employés and the salaries paid each class; the amounts expended for improvements each year, how expended, and the character of such improvements; the earnings and receipts from each branch of business and from all sources; the operating and other expenses; the balances of profit and loss; and a complete exhibit of the financial operations of the company each year, including an annual balance-sheet. Such reports shall also contain such information in relation to rates or regulations concerning recovery, transmission, and delivery messages, or agreements, arrangements, or contracts with other telegraph companies, as the commission may require; and the said commission may, within its discretion, for the purpose of enabling it the better to carry out the purposes of this act, prescribe (if in the opinion of the commission it is practicable to prescribe such uniformity and methods of keeping accounts) a period of time within which all telegraph companies subject to the provisions of this act shall have, as near as may be, a uniform system of accounts, and the manner in which such accounts shall be kept.

SEC. 17. That the commission shall, on or before the 1st day of December in each year, make a report, which shall be transmitted to Congress, and copies of which shall be distributed as are the other reports transmitted to Congress. This report shall contain such information and data collected by the commission as may be considered of value in the determination of questions connected with the regulation of commerce carried on by telegraph, together with such recommendations as to additional legislation relating thereto as the commission may deem necessary.

SEC. 18. That this act shall take effect and be in force from the 1st day of November, A. D. 1888.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CULTIVATION AND MANUFACTURE OF FLAX AND HEMP.

The bill (S. 2560) to improve and encourage the cultivation and manufacture of flax and hemp was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry reported the bill with amendments, in line 6, after the words "direction of," to strike out "a commission of three, to be appointed by the President of the United States, whose salaries shall not exceed $1,000 per year, and whose term of office shall be for three years, which commission" and insert "the Commissioner of Agriculture. Said Commissioner;" and in line 11, before the word "investigation," to strike out "its" and insert "his;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $25,000 is hereby appropriated to aid in making improvements in the cultivation and manufacture of flax and hemp, to be made by and under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture. Said Commissioner shall from time to time report the result of his investigation to Congress.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BUREAU OF HARBOR AND WATER WAYS.

The bill (S. 1448) for the establishment of a bureau to be known as the bureau of harbor and water ways, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. CULLOM. That bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce without recommendation. It was not expected, I think, by that committee that the bill would be considered at the present session. Therefore I ask that it be passed over, leaving it upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar, if there be no objection.

Mr. PLATT. It might as well go under Rule IX.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over to the Calendar under Rule IX.

JOSEPH W. M'CLURG.

The bill (H. R. 2611) for the relief of Joseph W. McClurg was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Joseph W. McClurg, of Missouri, $2,500 in full payment and satisfaction of all claim for goods, wares, and merchandise and supplies furnished officers and men in the military service of the United States in the late war of the rebellion under McClurg as colonel by the firm of Tobert & Co., of which company McClurg is sole surviving member.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

C. M. SHAFFER.

The bill (S. 3015) for the relief of C. M. Shaffer was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Claims reported an amendment, in line 6, after the words "sum of," to strike out "twenty-one" and insert "fifteen;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to C. M. Shaffer, of Berkeley County, West Virginia, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,500, in full payment for rent and occupation of his warehouse in the town of Martinsburgh, in the said county and State, as a commissary storehouse during the war of the rebellion.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLEMENT A. LOUNSBERRY.

The bill (H. R. 2524) for the relief of Clement A. Lounsberry was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Clement A. Lounsberry, late postmaster at Bismarck, Dak., $1,214.51, being the amount expended by him in the payment of clerks necessarily employed in his office from April 1, 1881, to June 30, 1882, and for rent, fuel, light, and other expenses from July 1, 1883, to the 30th of September, 1885, and which amount was disallowed in the settlement of his accounts.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NEW YORK, LAKE ERIE, AND WESTERN RAILROAD.

The bill (S. 779) for the relief of the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad Company was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Court of Claims shall, notwithstanding the lapse of time, be authorized to take jurisdiction of and adjudge the claim of the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad Company for the transportation of the mails of the United States from January 1, 1874, to June 30, 1877, upon routes (old numbers) numbered 1201, 1207, and 1208, said claim being based upon contracts between the United States of America (acting in that behalf by their Postmaster-General) and the president of said railroad company, signed and acknowledged by John A. J. Creswell, Postmaster-General, on the 10th day of January, 1874, and by P. H. Watson, president of said company, on the 20th day of April, 1874.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear some explanation of that bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would call the attention of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT] to the inquiry as to this bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. COLQUITT July 18, 1888:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 779) for the relief of the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad Company, report:

That the committee, after examination of the papers submitted by the Postmaster-General and the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad Company, find that they are controverted questions of law and fact which may, in justice to the Department and the company, be submitted to judicial investigation and determination. For the pending bill the committee recommend as a substitute a bill to authorize the Court of Claims to take jurisdiction of and adjust the claim of the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad Company.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have some explanation of this bill. This report does not explain it at all. It seems to me that the contract was a written contract, and why the parties can not go into court on a written contract and adjust all the difficulties between them I do not understand. I see no occasion for passing this bill.

Mr. COLQUITT. The point in controversy involves a question of fact. There are many documents in connection with it. If it is necessary to inform Senators, I will say that the reason the committee of the Senate made this substitute for the House bill, and proposes it as an amendment, was that there was a doubt as to the facts and the committee could not arrive at a conclusion on them, and hence, as there were involved questions of equity which the committee thought deserved investigation, they were willing to refer the matter to the Court of Claims for inquiry.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why did not the parties go into the Court of Claims while they had the opportunity and the right to do so?

Mr. COLQUITT. That I am not able to say. They expected to get their claim by means of an act of Congress, and that was the idea of the House bill, but the Senate committee thought it better to have the matter go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think we had better let the bill pass over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire it to pass over without prejudice?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

SUPPLIES TO INDIANS.

The bill (S. 3191) to amend section 4 of the act of March 3, 1875, as amended in section 2 of the act of March 3, 1877, in relation to the issue of supplies to Indians, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to further amend section 4 of the act of March 3, 1875, as amended in section 2 of the act of March 3, 1877, by adding thereto:

Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may, at his discretion, by written order, approve issues of subsistence which have been made to heads of tribes or bands, in place of to heads of families, and in future may except any tribe or portion of a tribe from the operation of section 4 of the act of March 3, 1875, as amended by section 2 of the act of March 3, 1877, when, in his judgment, the farming interests of the Indians demand it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE W. GRAHAM.

The bill (H. R. 6922) for the relief of George W. Graham was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLATT. What is the amount involved in that bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no amount mentioned in the bill.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] explain how much this bill carries?

Mr. STEWART. It carries a very small amount of money. I have not figured up the amount. The case is clearly a meritorious one. The reason why the man was not mustered in was that there was no mustering officer. It was carefully considered by the committee and is undoubtedly correct. The accounting officer can settle the amount.

Mr. HAWLEY. The sum can not be very large. It is about four and a half months' pay as second lieutenant, deducting what the man received as an enlisted man, and about eight months' pay as a captain, deducting what he may have received otherwise for that period.

Mr. STEWART. The accounting officer can fix the amount without difficulty.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is not perhaps what would make a year's pay of a second lieutenant taking it altogether. It is less than that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs will be read.

The amendment was read, being, in line 10, after the word "to," to strike out "September 18" and insert "July 1;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sum as will cover the regulation pay and allowances of a second lieutenant of infantry from June 15, 1863, to November 1, 1863, and of a captain of infantry from November 1, 1863, to July 1, 1864, to George W. Graham, of Campbell County, Tennessee, in full satisfaction of his claim against the United States as a lieutenant and captain in the Eighth Tennessee Volunteer Infantry: Provided, however, That any sum he may have received as an enlisted man during the period he served as second lieutenant and as captain shall be deducted by the proper disbursing officer in making the payments provided for in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate insist on its amendment, and ask for a conference with the House of Representatives thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. STEWART, Mr. DAVIS, and Mr. BATE were appointed.

JOHN J. COUGHLIN.

The bill (H. R. 5539) for the relief of John J. Coughlin was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to John J. Coughlin of $631.13, being difference of pay from laborer, at $1.25 per day, to skilled laborer, at $4.00 per day, for two hundred and twenty-nine and one-half days, in arranging, cataloguing, and classifying bound volumes of newspapers in the Library of Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passsed.

ALFRED J. WORCESTER.

The bill (S. 2163) for the relief of Alfred J. Worcester was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, in line 4, to strike out the word "late" and insert "so as to show him to have been the;" and in line 6, after the word "volunteers," to strike out:

According to the terms and provisions of the act to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces, approved June 3, 1884; and the said Worcester shall have all the benefits of that act, notwithstanding his commission bears date July 3, 1863, instead of prior to June 20 of that year.

And to insert:

From December 23, 1863, to June 11, 1864; and the Secretary of the Treasury is directed and required, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, to pay him the pay and allowances of first lieutenant of said company from December 23, 1863, to June 11, 1864, deducting therefrom any and all sums of money paid to him during said period.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to correct the muster-roll of Alfred J. Worcester so as to show him to have been the first lieutenant of Company G, Fourteenth Regiment of Illinois Volunteers, from December 23, 1863, to June 11, 1864, and the Secretary of the Treasury is directed and required, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, to pay him the pay and allowances of first lieutenant of said company from December 23, 1863, to June 11, 1864, deducting therefrom any and all sums of money paid to him during said period.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM H. FENTON.

The bill (S. 3139) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of William H. Fenton was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, in line 7, after the word "and," to strike out "that" and insert "to grant;" in line 8, after the word "discharge," to strike out "be granted" and insert "to;" in line 9, after the word "Fenton," to insert "as of a private of said company as of the date of May 27, 1864;" so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to cause the records of the War Department to be so amended as to remove the charge of desertion from the service record of William H. Fenton, late a private in Company G, Nineteenth Ohio Infantry Volunteers, and to grant an honorable discharge to the said William H. Fenton as a private of said company as of the date of May 27, 1864.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. COKE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from Texas to withhold that motion for a moment in order that I may ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider a little House bill, being Order of Business No. 2028, and if it takes three minutes I will not insist upon it.

Mr. MANDERSON. While that is being looked up I ask leave to present a conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive it.

STATE SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. MANDERSON submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2116) "to provide aid to State homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 2 and 3.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, and agree to the same.

CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
JOS. R. HAWLEY,
WADE HAMPTON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
R. W. TOWNSHEND,
LEVI MAISH,
JAMES LAIRD,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

JOHN T. ROBESON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] asks the consideration of the bill which will be reported.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 5494) for the relief of John T. Robeson.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to John T. Robeson, late consul at Beirut, Syria, Turkey, $600.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COKE. At the request of several Senators who desire to run a little further along with the Calendar I withdraw my motion to go into executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business is withdrawn.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SMYRNA.

The bill (S. 2863) to provide for the erection of a public building in the town of Smyrna, Del., was announced as next in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would like to have the bill explained. I should like to know something as to the population of Smyrna, how large a town it is, etc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was reported by the Senator from Wisconsin, who does not appear to be now in his seat.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then let it stand over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator who has had charge of the next bill would like to get it off his mind. While I would like myself to have the Senate go into executive session, I hope the Senator will kindly wait a moment. The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] was good enough to yield.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I withdraw it for five minutes.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would like to have another bill disposed of.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us go on for the suggested five minutes anyway.

CHARLES G. SAWTELLE.

The bill (S. 2998) for the relief of Lieut. Col. Charles G. Sawtelle, deputy quartermaster-general, United States Army, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the proper accounting officers, in settling and adjusting the accounts of Lieut. Col. Charles G. Sawtelle, deputy quartermaster-general, United States Army, to credit said Sawtelle with $126.40, being the amount of internal-revenue tax due from employés of the United States, employed by Maj. Gen. E. R. S. Canby, at the city of New Orleans, La., in the secret service, in the year 1865, and paid by Lieutenant-Colonel Sawtelle, the same amount appearing to have been withheld from these employés, but no receipt of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue being presented for the amount as required by law, and which amount is now suspended against Sawtelle by the accounting officers of the Treasury in the settlement of his accounts, the funds having been withheld from the employés, and stolen or embezzled from Sawtelle, as he believes, without his default, at the city of New Orleans, in the year 1865.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTHER A. KEYSER.

The bill (S. 1620) for the relief of Esther A. Keyser was announced as next in order.

Mr. PASCO. I am requested by the Senator from Maryland, who would like to be here when that bill is brought up, to ask that it be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over without prejudice.

RED CROSS ASSOCIATION CONFERENCE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State, accompanied by a report of the delegate on the part of the United States to the fourth international conference of the Red Cross Association, held at Carlsruhe, in the Grand Duchy of Baden, in September last.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, August 10, 1888.

JOHN R. REYNOLDS.

The bill (S. 1917) for the relief of John R. Reynolds was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John R. Reynolds the sum of $35,996, and to the personal representative of James M. Reynolds, deceased, the sum of $35,996, the same to be accepted in full payment, satisfaction, and discharge of all claim of the said John R. Reynolds and James M. Reynolds upon and against the United States for property sold to or taken and used by the United States Army during the war by or from said parties or either of them in the State of Mississippi.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Pending the consideration of that bill, I renew my motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PAYNE. It can be considered and passed in five minutes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That bill will not pass in five minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seventeen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate (in pursuance of a concurrent resolution of the two Houses) adjourned until Monday, August 13, 1888, at 11 o'clock a. m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate August 10, 1888.

Dodd, a resident of Indiana; Harry E. Rumsey, a resident of Wyoming Territory; Ryland D. Tisdale, a resident of Kentucky; Samuel M. Strite, a resident of Maryland; Friend W. Jenkins, a resident of Pennsylvania, and George F. Cooper, a resident of Georgia, all graduates of the Naval Academy, to be ensigns in the Navy, from the 1st of July, 1888, to fill vacancies in that grade.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 10, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

REFERENCE OF SENATE BILLS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House bills of the Senate; which were read twice, and referred, as follows:

The bill (S. 3136) to amend section 1014 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to fugitives from justice—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (S. 2430) supplementary of an act entitled "An act to settle certain accounts between the United States and the State of Mississippi and other States, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill (S. 2783) for the relief of the sureties of George W. Hook, deceased—to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (S. 110) for the relief of Horace A. W. Tabor—to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (S. 685) for the relief of Royal M. Hubbard—to the Committee on Claims.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WILKINS, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. HOGG, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. OSBORNE, for one week, on account of business engagements.

To Mr. CUTCHEON, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. COX, for ten days.

To Mr. RUSSELL, of Connecticut, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. BAKER, of New York, for ten days.

APPOINTMENT OF A CONFEREE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint as a manager on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill H. R. 4659, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON] in place of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who is absent from the city, and therefore unable to serve.

Mr. WILKINSON. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. ROBERTSON] is also absent temporarily.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] to act in that capacity.

WATER RESERVE LANDS, WISCONSIN.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill S. 1880 and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all lands in the State of Wisconsin described in and withdrawn from sale by the proclamations of the President of the United States issued March 22, 1880, April 5, 1881, and November 28, 1881, for the reason that said lands would be required for or subject to flowage in the construction of dams, reservoirs, and other works proposed to be erected for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River and certain of its tributaries, be, and the same are hereby, declared to be, and to have been at all times heretofore, subject to the provisions of a certain act of Congress, entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States," approved March 3, 1875, as fully, effectually, and to the same extent as though said lands had not been described in said proclamations, or withdrawn from sale thereby, but had remained with the body of public lands subject to private entry and sale: Provided, however, That any and all parts of said lands acquired by any railroad company under said act of Congress shall at all times be subject to the right of flowage which may at any time become necessary in the construction or maintenance of dams, reservoirs, or other works which may be constructed or erected by or under the authority of the United States for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River or its tributaries: Provided further, That the railroad companies availing themselves of this act shall, in addition to filing the maps now required by law to be filed, also file maps of definite location of their proposed lines of railroad, over said water reserve lands, in the office of the Secretary of War, and until the approval of said maps by the Secretary of War no right to occupy said lands shall vest in such companies; and no location shall be permitted which takes for right of way or stations lands needed for the use of the present reservoir system, or in the construction of dams or other works, or any proposed or probable extension of the same, or which will obstruct or increase the cost of the present or prospective reservoir system; or shall any railroad company be permitted to take material for construction from any of said reservoir lands outside the right of way granted herein.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that inasmuch as this seems to be quite an important bill, and has not yet been considered by the Public Lands Committee, that the matter be postponed until some day during the week after next, after the morning hour, and then unanimous consent can be given that it be taken up for consideration.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have no objection to fixing the consideration of the bill on the morning of the 23d, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. WEAVER. Not to interfere with the consideration of the Oklahoma bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have no objection to excepting that bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the Oklahoma bill could not be considered immediately after the reading of the Journal. It can only be reached after the morning hour has been disposed of.

Mr. WEAVER. But if this bill suggested by the gentleman from Ohio is taken up for consideration it may occupy the entire day; and I wanted to prevent any interference with the bill named.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman shall have a chance to get his bill through by unanimous consent on that day, and that he may be recognized to ask unanimous consent. But I do not want to consent to anything that may interfere with the Oklahoma bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask that the bill be fixed for consideration on the 23d, after the reading of the Journal; not to interfere with the Oklahoma bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope consent will be given.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

PUBLIC BUILDING, SAGINAW, MICH.

Mr. TARSNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9049) for the erection of a public building at the city of Saginaw, Mich., and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. CANNON. Let the report be read in that case.

Mr. TARSNEY. I hope the report will be read. I shall be very glad to have the House to understand the merits of this question.

The report was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. CANNON. The other day the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], who is now absent from the city, asked for the consideration of the bill for a public building at Kalamazoo. I am not acting at his request at all; but there was objection made on the other side to that bill. I am not disposed to object to the present request; but I ask that these two bills be coupled together and considered.

Mr. TARSNEY. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CANNON. And that unanimous consent be given now to take up both cases.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks that unanimous consent be given that the Kalamazoo bill be taken up and considered at the same time. Is there objection?

Mr. TARSNEY. Both bills are meritorious and ought to be passed.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not think we should go into the business of erecting public buildings by wholesale in this manner. It is sufficient, it seems to me, to take them up one at a time for consideration. I do not like to be bulldozed into the consideration of any measure.

Mr. CANNON. Another bill was reached a few days ago when the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] was present on the floor, and prompt objection came from that side of the House. I am not, as is well known, much in favor of the erection of these public buildings unless there are courts; but I think there ought to be a kind of comity, at least, existing between the two sides of the House in such matters.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not know how others may feel, but as for myself I have not been actuated, I wish to say to the gentleman, by any disposition to be captious or to make individual objections on either side of the House. But I will not, under any circumstances, be bulldozed into the consideration of a bill on any of the calendars of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Then I will ask the gentleman from Michigan to withdraw his request for the present, and let this bill be taken up and considered at the same time unanimous consent is given to consider the bill for Kalamazoo.

Mr. TARSNEY. I want to say one word in relation to this bill. In the Forty-ninth Congress a bill was passed through the House and through the Senate providing for a public building at East Saginaw. At that time the cities of Saginaw and East Saginaw were separate. Since that time the Legislature has ordered a consolidation of those cities, and there is to-day a population of 60,000, with two Presidential post-offices and one fourth-class post-office. It is now proposed to abolish one of the Presidential post-offices and establish one centrally and have the free-delivery system.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; I object unless we can have the other also.

Mr. SPINOLA and others. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

STATE HOMES FOR DISABLED SOLDIERS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask leave to present a privileged report.

Mr. LANHAM. The gentleman has the right to present a privileged report at any time; and if it is to take any time in discussing I shall antagonize it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is a report of a conference committee.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2116) to provide aid for the State homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 2 and 3.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, and agree to the same.

R. W. TOWNSHEND,
LEVI MAISH,
JAMES LAIRD,
Managers on the part of the House.

CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
JOS. R. HAWLEY,
WADE HAMPTON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The managers on the part of the House of the disagreeing votes on said bill submit the following statement as required in Rule XXIX of this House in explanation of the amendments mentioned.

The conferees agree that—

1. The provisions of the act should extend to Territories as well as States. So the Senate conferees agree to the House amendments numbered 1, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, and agree also to amendment of the title as suggested by the House of Representatives.

2. Do not agree to amendment 2—"or which support wholly and in part." The language is clearly surplusage because the allowance is for "every disabled soldier or sailor who may be admitted and cared for in such home at the rate of $100 per annum." If it is designed to have the effect that if the home is supported by private parties with aid by way of contribution or appropriation from the States it shall receive the aid provided for in this bill it is clearly objectionable. The aid should only be extended to homes that are wholly under State control.

3. Do not agree to amendment 3—"and the orphans of soldiers and sailors." The bill should conform to the law governing national homes. Orphans are not received there. It is too late for such bounty. It opens too wide a door for expenditure. The object of the bill is to reach toward support of disabled and dependent soldiers and sailors only.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move the adoption of the report.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before that is done I hope the gentleman will give us a more comprehensive statement than that which has just been read.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I think the statement is full, but for the information of the gentleman from Indiana, I will state that the bill as it passed the House was amended so as to include homes established by Territories as well as States. The Senate accepts that amendment, agreeing to extend the provisions to Territories as well as States. The bill was also amended in the House so as to provide that the orphans of soldiers and sailors should also be cared for in those homes. The Senate does not agree to that amendment, for the reason that there is no such provision in the law in regard to national homes; and it was intended to make this bill conform to the law relating to the national homes. It is not believed to be wise now to open the doors of the soldiers' homes to the orphans as well as to the sailors. The other amendment as it passed the House provided that homes which are partially aided by States as well as those established by States should receive the benefits of this law.

The committee of conference on the part of both Houses were unanimously of the opinion that it is in the first place a surplusage if it is intended to apply to homes where disabled soldiers are provided for by the States, because the bill already provides that any State home which provides for the disabled soldier or sailor shall receive the benefits of this law. It was also proposed that private homes which have partial help from the State shall be established on the same footing as if wholly supported by the State. The conferees are of the opinion that it ought not to be adopted, and therefore the House amendments were non-concurred in. These were the only amendments of any importance on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was adopted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GENERAL SHERIDAN'S FUNERAL.

The SPEAKER announced that he had appointed Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, as a member of the committee of the House to attend the funeral of General Sheridan, vice Mr. GROSVENOR.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, the regular order is the call of committees for reports on private bills.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports to present be allowed to file them with the Clerk.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

WILLIAM T. HURDLEY.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9680) for the relief of William T. Hurdley; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM L. BRADFORD.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (S. 3178) to remove the political disabilities of William L. Bradford; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LANHAM. I move that the call of committees be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. LANHAM. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to get this day for the consideration of the bill to provide for the organization of the Territory of Oklahoma, but in deference to the wishes of gentlemen who are interested in pending private bills, I will not antagonize the motion just made by the gentleman from Texas. I give notice, however, that I shall ask the House to consider the Oklahoma bill not later than Tuesday or Wednesday next.

Mr. HOOKER. And I give notice that, in consequence of the excessive heat of the weather, I shall object to the consideration of that bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman's objection will not avail, because the Oklahoma bill will be the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. SHAW. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHAW. What position does the Oklahoma bill occupy on the Calendar?

The SPEAKER. The Oklahoma bill is not before the House.

Mr. SHAW. That is what I supposed; and I wish to inquire why it is brought up here so ofter in antagonism to other measures.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not inform the gentleman.

Mr. SPRINGER. It was not brought up in antagonism to this motion.

Mr. SHAW. It comes up in connection with nearly every motion that is made.

Mr. SPRINGER. Because it is the regular order. That is the reason.

The motion of Mr. LANHAM, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. The Clerk will report the first bill.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I desire, before we proceed to the regular business, to ask consent to take from the Private Calendar the bill (S. 2563) for the relief of Mrs. Larimer. This lady has been here all this session of Congress, as she has been for several sessions of Congress, asking for the consideration of this bill. The bill has passed the Senate——

Mr. WISE. I demand the regular order, but I will withdraw the demand to let the gentleman complete his statement.

Mr. PERKINS. This is an Indian depredation claim. This lady was captured by the Indians while crossing the plains more than twenty years ago and had all her property taken from her. She has been here pressing this claim year after year. The bill has passed the Senate and has been reported favorably by the House. It will cause no debate, and I ask its present consideration. As is known by every member of the House, almost all of these Fridays for the consideration of private claims have been devoted to war claims, and I now ask, on behalf of this poor woman, that her bill may be considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2563)——

Mr. WISE. I must object, Mr. Chairman, and demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The Clerk will report the first bill upon the Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 26) for the relief of William J. Poitevent.

Mr. WISE. That is not the bill that was under consideration at the adjournment on last Friday. The bill last under consideration was the Norfolk Ferry bill, and the adjournment took place during the reading of a paper which was submitted by my friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to find out from the Journal of the House the condition of business at the time the committee rose.

Mr. OATES. The last time the House was engaged upon the Private Calendar the bill under consideration at the time of the adjournment was a bill for the relief of Samuel Noble.

The CHAIRMAN. As soon as the Chair can have the Journal examined he will state the condition of business at the adjournment.

Mr. OATES. All I desire is that that bill may be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar. I do not ask for its consideration at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1067) to amend the war record of Albert H. Thomas, deceased.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. What has become of the first bill reported by the Clerk, the bill (H. R. 26) for the relief of William J. Poitevent?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has had read the bill which was pending in the Committee of the Whole when the committee last had this Calendar under consideration.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Does that take precedence of the Calendar as we find it to-day?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I had the floor in the committee at its last session when the motion was made to rise, and, if I recollect rightly, the bill that was then under consideration was a bill for the relief of Samuel Noble.

Mr. OATES. The gentleman is mistaken in that, and I was mistaken in the statement I made awhile ago, because——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read from the RECORD.

Mr. OATES. I desire, in order that I may set myself right, to complete the sentence I was uttering.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama will suspend until the Clerk can read from the RECORD.

Mr. OATES. That will simply cut my sentence in two; and in that case I do not care to finish it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read from the RECORD part of the proceedings of the last sitting of the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

ALFRED H. THOMAS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1067) for the relief of Alfred H. Thomas, deceased.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask that this bill be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. DIBBLE. I object.

Mr. LANHAM. I again move that the committee rise. The committee has been continuously in session for four hours.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] moves that the committee rise.

Mr. CANNON. I hope not.

The motion of Mr. LANHAM was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending bill.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. CANNON and others. Regular order!

Mr. NELSON. I do not think any objection will be made to my proposition.

Mr. CANNON. I shall have to call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying this bill aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. DIBBLE. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin) was read, as follows:

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. DIBBLE obtained the floor.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, it is manifest we are going to do nothing more in Committee of the Whole this afternoon. We have already passed a number of bills, and I do think the best thing we can do is to rise. I do not believe we can reach the bill which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] desires to reach.

Mr. CANNON. Let me make a suggestion which I think will be satisfactory. Let the report be printed in the RECORD. I understand it is exhaustive. Then let the bill go over till the next private-bill day.

Mr. DIBBLE. I have no objection to that, but there is plenty of evidence in addition to that report, and I think it would be as well to print that evidence with the report of the committee. Let them both be printed at the same time; and that agreement can be made when the bill is called up. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to have that evidence printed.

Mr. CANNON. I only ask to have printed what is of record, and that is the report of the committee.

Mr. LANHAM. I will state in the hearing of the gentleman from Illinois that it will be absolutely impossible to reach the bill this afternoon. It is three below the one we have been considering. There are a number of bills to be reported to the House for passage, and they ought to be taken up and passed. So far as printing the report is concerned I have no objection to it. Let it go into the RECORD.

Mr. CANNON. If that can be done, I do not object to the committee rising.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the printing of the report of the committee in the RECORD?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The report (by Mr. BROWER) from the Committee on War Claims is as follows.

Mr. DIBBLE. I have not yet heard the Clerk read any statement of what bill was under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The unfinished business when the committee rose was the bill (H. R. 1067) to amend the war record of Alfred H. Thomas, deceased; and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to know whether, after the consideration of the pending bill, the Committee of the Whole will go back to the consideration of House bill No. 26.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide that question when it comes up. The Clerk will now report the pending bill.

ALFRED H. THOMAS.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to amend the records in the War Department of the United States to show the name of Alfred H. Thomas duly enlisted and mustered into Company D, Seventh Regiment Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers, on the 1st day of February, 1864, for three years' service; taken prisoner at Union City, Tenn., on the 24th day of March, 1864, and died a prisoner of war, while in the service of the United States, at Savannah, Ga., on the 1st day of December, 1864.

Mr. DIBBLE. I ask that the report in this case be read.

The report (by Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1067) for the relief of Alfred H. Thomas, respectfully report as follows:

The facts out of which this claim for relief arises will be found stated in House report No. 190 of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Forty-seventh Congress, a copy of which is hereto annexed for information.

Your committee adopt the said report as their own, and report back the bill and recommend its passage.

[House Report No. 190, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a bill to amend the war record of Alfred H. Thomas, deceased, submit the following report:

It appears that the said Alfred H. Thomas enlisted on or about the 1st day of February, 1864, in Company D, Seventh Regiment Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers; that the exigencies of the service called this company into active duty in the field before muster; that on the 24th day of March, 1864, the said Thomas, while in the line of duty, was captured with his entire company; that he was held a prisoner of war from that time to the time of his death, early in December, 1864, at Savannah, Ga. The above facts are conclusively established by the affidavits of two officers and several enlisted men of his regiment, and make a strong case for the relief asked, and the passage of the bill is therefore recommended.

Mr. DIBBLE. I hope that under the circumstances this bill will be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. GLASS. The report in this case shows a conclusive state of facts in favor of the applicant; and as no one appears desirous to address the House in opposition to the bill, I move that it be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, at the last sitting of the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of private business a number of bills were passed over informally, not to lose their place on the Calendar. It seems to me it would now be proper to return to the beginning of the Calender and take up the bills in their order for consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so instructed the Clerk.

Mr. COMPTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. Two weeks ago to-day I made the point of order which I propose to renew now. I did not press it at that time because the gentleman from Alabama raised the point that the unfinished business was the first thing in order. I now propose to renew the point of order.

There is now on the Calendar a bill reported in the Forty-ninth Congress, and also in this Congress, from the Committee on War Claims, there having been a favorable report also from the Court of Claims. I maintain that this bill under the provisions of the Bowman act, and under the ruling of the Speaker, is entitled to-day to preference on this Calendar. Early in the session my colleague [Mr. MCCOMAS] made the point that bills which had been approved by the Court of Claims were entitled to priority of position upon the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. To what bill does the gentleman refer?

Mr. COMPTON. The bill (H. R. 6347) for the relief of Alexander Moffitt. It is on page 56 of the Calendar.

As I was stating, my colleague [Mr. MCCOMAS] made the point of order that under the Bowman act bills of this character were entitled to precedence on the Calendar. The Speaker, who was then in the chair, sustained the point and ordered those bills to be so placed. This bill was given that position on the Calendar. It came up for consideration in regular order. A motion was made to refer it back to the committee. I stated at the time the motion was made that I would consent to it provided the bill would not lose its place on the Calendar. The then occupant of the chair declared that if the bill were recommitted it would require unanimous consent to have it placed where it was originally on the Calendar. I then stated—these proceedings occurred on the 16th of March—that I would consent and take my chances, reserving to myself the right to make the point of order which I now make.

Now, I claim that the recommitment of the bill to the committee does not of necessity take the bill from its place on the Calendar, but that, on the contrary, it should remain exactly where it was, because it is one of that class of bills which, under the Bowman act and under the ruling of the Speaker, are entitled to preference upon the Calendar.

That is my point. If the Chair wants reference, he will find the decision of the Speaker on page 103 of the RECORD, and he will find that decision reaffirmed on page 469 of the RECORD.

Mr. LANHAM. The Chairman will remember the point of order was elaborately discussed when the present Chairman occupied the chair. The committee rose, and the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], being the Speaker pro tempore, held, as I remember, that when these cases came from the Court of Claims under the rule they should be referred to appropriate committees. That is my recollection of the decision made on that occasion.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Under the rule this case, with others coming over from the Forty-ninth Congress, was placed upon the Calendar. This bill was reached in its regular order and taken up for consideration. There was some question raised as to the loyalty of the claimant. It was done, I believe, on motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. It went over in order to obtain the proof necessary, to come up again the next day private bills were under consideration. The purpose was, as I have stated, to supply the proof, which seemed to be lacking or which had not been furnished by the Court of Claims to the House. When that was supplied it was to be taken up. It was clearly understood the bill should not lose its place on the Calendar. I do not know, but the RECORD will show, that it was put back upon the Calendar in a different place, so that when the proof was supplied it was not reached, as was expected it would be. My opinion is, the House intended to do with that bill as it had done with the other claims which had been reported from the Court of Claims. It seems to have lost its proper place by some misapprehension; and now, in my judgment, it should be taken up and disposed of as the other bills of the same class have been. By this misunderstanding or mistake or whatever it may have been this bill has lost its place upon the Calendar and ought to be restored to where it properly belongs. Therefore I believe this bill is entitled to consideration at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has held, when bills have been reported from the Court of Claims to this House and referred to appropriate committees and reported back, they take precedence at the head of the Calendar, and the Clerk therefore will be directed to report this bill.

ALEXANDER MOFFITT.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6347) for the relief of Alexander Moffitt.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Alexander Moffitt, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $12,442.98, being amount due the said Alexander Moffitt for the use and occupation of the premises known as the National Race Course, in the District of Columbia, from the 12th day of July, 1864, to the 12th day of June, 1865, by the United States forces, as found by the Court of Claims.

The report (by Mr. STONE, of Kentucky) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. 6347) for the relief of Alexander Moffitt, having further considered of the matter, report as follows:

The property in question was situated across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River from Washington City, just southeast of the Government Insane Asylum, and distant about 600 yards on an air line from Giesborough.

After the claimant, Moffitt, had presented his claim for compensation for the loss he had been made to suffer, the Quartermaster-General constituted a board to examine and report upon the merits of the claim. This board had the most ample time and opportunity to investigate, and, after having manifestly done so, they, in their report, recommended that the claimant be allowed as rent for his property $500 per month from July 12, 1864, to June 12, 1865, eleven months, $5,500, and as compensation for rebuilding and repairing buildings and fences, the sum in block of $7,966.75, a total of $13,466.75, the same to be in full of all claims against the Government arising from the occupation, use, and consumption of claimant's property. But the Quartermaster-General, holding that he had no jurisdiction over so much of the claim as was not for rent strictly, and that it was a matter for the consideration of Congress, would allow nothing on account of this portion of the claim, and only the sum of $1,784.4 , that was paid, and the receipt in question given.

Upon the evidence adduced to the Court of Claims in respect to the giving of this receipt your committee feel themselves bound to agree with that court that it was given and received upon the understanding that it was not to conclude the claimant or preclude him from seeking in Congress the full measure of compensation he had asserted and believed to be justly his due. Such is the direct, positive, uncontradicted testimony of a competent, disinterested witness, corroborating the other testimony on this point.

Besides, the amount receipted for was so small in comparison with that then claimed, and what the evidence afterwards adduced to the Court of Claims clearly demonstrated was justly due, is, your committee believe, a circumstance strongly corroborative of the claimant's averment that the receipt was given and received only for a payment on account. This was a case of use and occupation of premises and consumption of property of a loyal citizen by an army in its own territory, and your committee do not know of any principle of law or equity that denies to such citizen just compensation from his own Government for such use, occupation, and consumption of his property. It was not a case of an army occupying, using, and consuming property of an enemy in that enemy's country, and consequently the law applicable to such cases is not applicable to this.

It is common knowledge that at the time the property was held by the United States Army the city of Washington was constantly filled with a large concourse of transient visitors, soldiers, and others, and it is too plain for argument, upon the evidence adduced before the Court of Claims, that the claimant was a heavy loser by being deprived of his property.

All the circumstances considered, your committee are constrained to concur with the findings of the Court of Claims, and have no hesitation in again recommending that the bill referred and recommitted to them do pass.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to ask the Chair whether this bill has been reached in regular order upon the Calendar?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so decided.

Mr. PERKINS. Does the Chair hold that private claims before this may be reached and passed?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides, this having been reported from the Court of Claims under the Bowman act, and referred to the Committee on War Claims and reported back favorably, it takes its place at the head of the Calendar and has precedence over other bills. This is one of that class of claims, and I believe is the last one.

Mr. PERKINS. I observe the distinction which is made, but I did not understand how this case came up.

The CHAIRMAN. It is placed in its former position where it ought to have been placed upon the Calendar, in the opinion of the Chair.

The motion of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COMPTON] is that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be passed.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I think we should know something more about this case than we do before we report it back to the House with the recommendation that it be passed. I am told copies of the report in the case are exhausted, and the House should know the facts before it is called upon to vote on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the Clerk has just completed the reading of the report in full.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. How much money was paid on this claim?

Mr. COMPTON. A very small amount.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Well, how much?

Mr. COMPTON. Something over $1,000. Exactly $1,784.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. That was taken in full, as I understand it?

Mr. COMPTON. Possibly the best explanation that could be given to the gentleman from Ohio would be the repetition of the reading of that part of the report.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Very well, then; I ask that it be read.

The Clerk again read the report.

Mr. COMPTON. I think it would be well perhaps to have the third finding of the Court of Claims read bearing upon this particular point, and I ask the Clerk to read what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Quartermaster Department in 1868 estimated the rental value of the premises during above occupancy to be $1,784.45. The claimant at first refused to accept this amount, but upon being assured by the officer making the payment that his acceptance would not preclude him from seeking the balance of his claim, he accepted it and signed a receipt in full. This receipt in full was given and received in the mutual understanding that it should not preclude the claimant from seeking in Congress the balance of the rent which he believed to be justly his due, and the payment was not a final settlement such as would stop the claimant from seeking the full value of the occupancy, and was in fact, though not in form, merely a payment upon account.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I think this claim is excessive, especially in view of the fact that the gentleman received in payment upon it a considerable amount of money and gave a receipt in full, which has just been read.

Mr. COMPTON. But that amount is deducted.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I know it is; but I think the claim as it is now is entirely excessive in amount; and I shall move to amend by reducing it just one-half. I am willing he shall have a reasonable and fair compensation; but this is a large amount in view of the circumstances surrounding the case and the value of property at that time. I ask to amend the bill by striking out, in lines 5, 6, and 7, the sum $12,442.98 and insert in lieu thereof $6,221.49.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, this bill was before the House some time ago and was discussed at considerable length.

My recollection is that it appeared, either from a statement made to the committee at the time or by some report which was read in connection with the bill, that the real use to which the property was being applied at the time that it was taken possession of by the Government for the use of the troops was that of carrying on the business of a saloon if I am not mistaken; and the owner or occupant of the property claimed that he was deprived of a very valuable privilege or right by reason of the appropriation of his property to be used in that manner by the Government.

The impression that I received from that testimony on the part of gentlemen who seemed to be familiar with the subject was that the amount proposed to be paid was greatly beyond what the property was possibly worth for any purpose. We had then a better understanding of the use to which the property was being applied.

This bill proposes, as I understand it, to pay a rental of $500 per month for the use of the property while in possession of the Government. It must indeed have been a very valuable property which at that time, and under such circumstances, would justify a rental at such an excessive rate for military purposes. Besides, it seems to me that this settlement made by the Quartermaster-General with a full knowledge of all the facts made by General Meigs, a very safe and prudent gentleman, one of the most efficient officers who ever held the position, I think one of the most thoroughly upright, just, and honest men who could be assigned to such a department—it seems to me that the conclusion he reached, with all of the facts under his eye, ought to have at least a persuasive influence upon the action of this committee.

Besides that, Mr. Chairman, the receipt has been executed in full on the part of this claimant, on receipt of something over $1,000, a receipt made in the usual form, with a statement, however, upon the part of the officer of the Government that the signing of the receipt would not preclude the claimant from going before Congress. It seems to me therefore that it is hardly sufficient on the citation of facts here to set aside a receipt of that character. If the suggestions of a public officer can thus defeat the operation of a payment and a receipt in full, Congress and the Government is fearfully at the mercy of any officer of the Government who thinks proper to make a suggestion of fact which is within his discretion in regard to any of these settlements. How could it operate as an estoppel, for instance? A party dealing with the Government is supposed to be as well informed as the officer of the Government who pays out the money of the Government and takes receipts in its behalf. This party acted upon his own knowledge as well as upon the suggestion of the quartermaster, and he knew what he was doing at the time he gave the receipt. When a receipt of this character is given in full it ought to have a proper weight with Congress, and except under very strong circumstances and in a very marked case it should be conclusive. These transactions of a quarter of a century ago are pressed upon us day after day, and it seems to be impossible to get anything definitely settled in regard to them. A receipt in full is regarded, it seems, by us as of no consequence whatever, although the Supreme Court of the United States when it comes to a judicial determination of the question has held that a receipt so given must be held as final and conclusive.

I think in any event that the claim for spoliation ought not to be considered, and I will therefore move to amend the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] so that it will allow but $5,500, which was the amount of the rent, deducting $1,784.45, being the amount which was paid.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. The amendment just offered by my friend from Indiana has my hearty approval and I hope it will be adopted.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Strike out $12,442.98 and insert $3,714.55.

Mr. COMPTON. I will not detain the House, but I think it is just to this claimant that a brief statement should be made as to the case. This case was referred to the Court of Claims by the Forty-eighth Congress. Testimony was taken by the Court of Claims, a thorough investigation made, and it was ascertained that the amount in this bill is founded on the estimates which were made by the officers of the United States Army especially detailed to examine this particular case. The Court of Claims reported it to Congress with a recommendation that it be paid. The bill went to the Committee on War Claims in the Forty-ninth Congress, was considered carefully by that committee, and reported to this House with a recommendation for payment. It then went upon the Calendar of the Fiftieth Congress, and after discussion upon this floor, when the whole case was fresh in my mind and in the mind of the committee, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] and others will remember the discussion, the bill was again referred to the Committee on War Claims, and for a second time they carefully investigated all the facts. The Committee on War Claims of this Congress reported the bill back with the recommendation that it do pass. Now, for my life I can not see the justice or the fairness of the suggestion made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that because a bill seems to them to be too large it is any justification for the amendment proposed, when they know nothing of the case except what has been heard from the reading of the report. In due deference to my distinguished friend to my right [Mr. HOLMAN], what other ground has he on which to base his estimate of what is right; what way has he of ascertaining the comparison to make the statement that this bill seems to be too large? Is justice to be affected if it is just? The gentleman will not undertake to assume such a position on this floor.

About the receipt, Mr. Chairman. Now, what was the condition of things with this man? He had his hand in the lion's mouth. He was almost hopeless and absolutely helpless. He had been impoverished, made a beggar of, by the destruction of his property, and when this $1,700 was offered him the temptation was great, and he accordingly signed the receipt on a condition, and that condition was conceded by the officer in charge, namely, that it did not debar him from his right to further payment and he had his remedy here in Congress. But, Mr. Chairman, why is it and why should it be that the will and judgment of this House shall be determined by the mere ipse dixit or simple opinion of gentlemen even so distinguished as my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] without proper justification?

Now, I do not know that I care to say anything more on this subject, but will say simply this. I have been impressed with this fact, that we are all probably amenable to the same influences when we propose a case here for an appropriation, or where any gentleman is affected or interested, and that it will not deter any man, not even my friend from Indiana, with considerations as to the amount. Therefore it is that I appeal again to this House, and ask the members to consider this bill simply and alone upon its merits as disclosed by those qualified to make an investigation and report.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. This bill, it seems to me from what I have heard of the debate, ought to be allowed. It appears that the troops took possession of a race-course in the neighborhood of this city and held it for a certain time during the war, and by occupying it destroyed the buildings which were necessary to keep that race-course in condition. By that means the owner of the track lost a good deal of money, both from the destruction of the buildings and the use he could have made of the track. Now, what is the state of affairs resulting from those circumstances? It is about like this: The party who owned the ground necessarily had the right to compensation from the Government. The Government by its officers endeavored to fix the rental price of the ground. Of course it was too low, but as the Government was in possession the man had to accept it, and the settlement was in the nature of a coercion. He could not sue the United States for the amount as he could a private individual, and the Government got him to give a receipt in full. That ought not to militate against him nor to prejudice Congress. There are thousands of cases of this kind which might be cited. Besides that, the question is presented as to whether Congress is going to reverse the action of the Court of Claims, the court to which this claimant has been sent to obtain a judgment. Then I would say to the members of this House if that is to be done we had better abolish the Court of Claims. What is it for? Is it not appointed by Congress to examine these very questions between the Government and parties and to settle the disputes between them? They have examined this case, and they reported on the testimony of the officers that we should pay the whole claim at once.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the conference committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 288) for the erection of a public building at Sioux City, Iowa.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8592) for the erection of a public building at Jackson, Mich.

ALEXANDER MOFFITT.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. If we are to bring the parties before the bar of this House to plead their own cases as is done in court, then we shall be unable to attend to any other business. The Court of Claims is organized to relieve Congress of that duty, which, in any case, it could not possibly perform, and if we are to disregard the finding of the court in this case we had better also disregard its verdict in the matter of these great spoliation claims which have been pending before Congress for one hundred years.

Mr. Chairman, I say the Government is the most cruel oppressor we have when it owes any of its citizens. When it owes a man a dollar it takes almost two dollars to get it, and I have no doubt that if this claimant gets the $12,000 which the court has decreed to him, he will have had to spend it all, or nearly all, in the effort to get what was due him. As a member of this House I believe that when the court has passed upon a claim, no matter how small it may be or how large it may be, it is our duty to indorse the action of the court and pay the claim. If that is not the case, then let us abolish the court and bring the parties in here to plead their cases before us.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, the informal way in which these findings of the Court of Claims are made is very well understood by this House. The court has no authority to render judgment in these cases, and the judges of the court understand perfectly well that the claims are to come to this House and be considered in a measure de novo. If the gentleman [Mr. WHITE, of Indiana] is correct in his position that we are bound to pay every claim of this kind that may be reported by the Court of Claims, we shall have a great obligation and a great burden resting upon us; and if he is correct, we ought to have a law explicitly providing that every finding of the Court of Claims shall be paid and paid at once without being considered at all by even the House or the Senate.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say, in addition, that I do not think this claimant is in a position to complain of hard treatment by the Government. In the first place, his land was out here a long distance southeast of the Capitol, and was used for a race-course, and I do not imagine that property of that kind was very valuable during the war. When the cloud of war hung over this capital and over this nation, we had something else to do besides running horse-races, and I am not inclined to believe that this Government is not very largely indebted to this claimant for occupying his race-course during a single year while the war was in progress. The ground was occupied only about a year, and, as I understand, for that one year's occupation this man was paid more than $1,700. He accepted that payment, and not only accepted it but gave a receipt in full. Now it is proposed that we shall pay him for a single year's occupancy some $5,000, less the amount which he has already received. It seems to me that this is acting very liberally, and is paying a very large compensation to this party for the occupation of his race-course during that year, or any year of the war.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words in relation to this matter. While it is very true that Congress is not bound by the decisions of the Court of Claims, it is also true that we should have some regard to the findings of this court as a basis of fact upon which to act. Now, sir, we not only have the opinion of the Court of Claims that this claim is just, but we have also the opinion of a board of competent United States Army officers, appointed by the Quartermaster-General at the time, who carefully investigated the facts and came to a conclusion which they put in writing in the shape of a finding, which was filed with the Quartermaster-General. They found that this party was entitled to $5,500 for rent of his premises, and to $7,965.75 for the destruction of buildings, etc., upon the land.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. When was that report made?

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. I have not the exact date at hand, but it was not a great while after the close of the war.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. By whom was it made?

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. By a board appointed by the Quartermaster-General to investigate and report the facts.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Where does that appear?

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. In the finding of the Court of Claims. The Quartermaster-General appointed a board to examine and report upon the merits of the claim and they made this finding. After this finding had been made the Quartermaster-General, without giving any reason, without saying that the amount was too large, arbitrarily tendered to the claimant $1,748.60 for rent, telling him that the Quartermaster's Department had no right to pay for damage to buildings, fences, etc. The claimant took the money, but said, "I do not want to be barred."

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Will the gentleman tell us what board it was which made this finding? How was it appointed, and where is the report of that finding?

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. If the gentleman will look at the report of the committee, and will also take time to look at the report of the Court of Claims on file with the papers in this case——

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I have both before me, I think.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. He will find that the Quartermaster-General constituted a board to examine and report upon the merits of this claim. This is what we say in the report, and we base it upon the facts:

> This board had the most ample time and opportunity to investigate, and, after having manifestly done so, they, in their report, recommended that the claimant be allowed as rent for his property $500 per month from July 12, 1864, to June 12, 1865, eleven months, $5,500, and as compensation for rebuilding and repairing buildings and fences the sum in block of $7,966.75, a total of $13,466.75, the same to be in full of all claims against the Government arising from the occupation, use, and consumption of claimant's property.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Where can a person see that report made to the Quartermaster-General so as to ascertain who were the persons making it, and upon what data they reported?

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. If these papers to which I refer are not with the papers in the Clerk's office, the gentleman will find them in the room of the Committee on War Claims. Our report was based upon the facts as returned by the Quartermaster-General, whose report, as you will find, is confirmed by the Court of Claims. The Quartermaster-General, without any authority, fixed upon this low sum of $1,784.45 as the amount to be paid for rent. The evidence is that the claimant said, "I do not want to take this amount in full;" and the Quartermaster-General replied to him, "Though you may sign a receipt in full, it shall not bind you."

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I see that statement in the report; but upon whose evidence is the statement made?

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. This was the evidence taken in the case before the Court of Claims.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Whose evidence was it? Was it the evidence of the man who makes the claim?

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. The evidence of witnesses.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. What witness?

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. I am not prepared to give the name of the witness. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COMPTON] is more familiar, probably, with the details. If I had supposed I was going to be cross-examined on this subject, I would have had all the papers before me.

Mr. COMPTON. I speak from memory; but according to my recollection, the papers having been here on the 16th of March, when this case was last under discussion, the finding was made by two officers detailed from the Quartermaster's Department to go upon the premises and ascertain the facts. I think the papers will show that to have been the case.

Mr. PERKINS. In this connection, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. I will yield in a moment; but first let me finish this statement. I undertake to say that if this receipt in full is urged, as some gentlemen appeared disposed before to urge it, as a bar against this claim, that is a most unjust thing to do.

This claim has relation to property within the District of Columbia, and so far as any connection with the war is concerned it might as well have been in the State of Kansas or Minnesota or Wisconsin or Ohio. This property was not where the enemy ever had possession. The Government arbitrarily took the property, and having acknowledged its indebtedness, it seems to me it ill becomes the Government to undertake to split the claim or to deny the equity and justice of the finding of the Court of Claims.

Mr. PERKINS. Now, if the gentleman will permit me, I would like to ask him why the Quartermaster's Department did not pay the amount which the gentleman says the representatives of that department had found due for rent. I am speaking now, not of the claim for destruction of property, but of the claim for rent. I wish to know why the Quartermaster's Department did not pay as rent the amount which, as the gentleman says, agents or representatives of that department found to be due.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. I have no reason to give. The Quartermaster-General himself gave no reason for the refusal. He seems simply to have assumed that $1,784.45 was a sufficient sum. The Quartermaster's Department in the hearing before the Court of Claims made no proof that this amount was sufficient. The Government does not show in any way that it was a sufficient amount as rent. There is, as I understand, no testimony claiming that it was sufficient.

Mr. PERKINS. Who represents the Government of the United States in these cases which are referred under this act to the Court of Claims?

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. The Department of Justice.

Mr. PERKINS. Is the Department of Justice allowed proper force so that the interests of the Government can be intelligently represented in these cases?

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. Most certainly. In this case the interests of the Government were in charge of representatives of the Attorney-General's Office.

Mr. PERKINS. Is it not a fact that clerks are detailed to go down there and look after the interests of the Government, clerks who know nothing of the circumstances of the claim, and that these cases are submitted to the court upon agreed statements of fact in which frequently the interests of the Government are virtually ignored. Is not that the practice?

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. I understand it is not. I understand it has been the practice of the Department to fight these claims as vigorously as they would any claim; that regular attorneys representing the Department, assistants of the Attorney-General, argue these questions and present on the part of the Government all the evidence that can be brought forward. As I understand, the Court of Claims insists upon this. There is no trial in which the claimant is represented and the Government not properly represented.

This is not a case, like many others, where the claim is of long standing, the amount large, and the witnesses dead. In this case, which I must say is an exceptional one, the Government, within a very short time after the destruction of the property, long before the facts could be clouded, before the property had changed hands or the witnesses died, or the appearance of things changed, appointed a board to examine the facts, and they made their report.

Can there be any question about the justice of this claim? Why should two officers of the Government, Army officers, put their hands to an award which is false and fraudulent? Has it been the practice or the custom of that kind of a board to do that sort of thing? Is it right for Congress to so judge? I think not.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Let me ask the gentleman from Wisconsin, was the Government of the United States ever represented by anybody in the Court of Claims? Does the record anywhere show that?

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. Yes, I think it does.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I should like to see it. I think the gentleman is mistaken in his statement.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. No, I do not think I am.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. The record will show it if there were any representative in behalf of the interest of the United States in the Court of Claims.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. This claim should be rejected or allowed. This man is entitled to the whole of his claim and not to one-half of it. If he is entitled to one-half, certainly he is entitled to the whole of it.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. That would double it.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. No, I think not. No one says he is claiming more than he is entitled to. The Court of Claims report shows that he is entitled to what he claims. This man received a smaller sum under protest with the understanding that he might go to the Court of Claims or come to Congress. He went to the Court of Claims and succeeded in proving his case. Justice is on his side, as justice is on the side of any man who has a claim against the Government which has not been paid.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I do not care whether this claim comes from Minnesota or South Carolina or the District of Columbia. The simple question is whether it is a valid claim, established by competent and satisfactory evidence.

Generally the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. THOMAS] is right in his conclusions, but I do not think he is at this time.

The status of this claim, as I understand it, is this: In 1864, nearly a quarter of a century ago, certain property was used by the Government. Within a short time after that settlement was apparently made and a receipt in full given for the use of that property. The sum allowed was accepted and a receipt written out showing it to be in full settlement.

In this case we must proceed on the theory that it was a full settlement unless evidence be given to show satisfactorily and clearly that it was not. If it was a full settlement then there is nothing of this claim.

It is not for the United States to prove its invalidity—it is not for it to take the affirmative of this issue—the affirmative is charged to the other side by the settlement and receipt.

Now, sir, I wish to make one remark here about the report of the Court of Claims. The argument has frequently been made on this floor that the finding of the Court of Claims is conclusive in such cases. The statute does not say so and should not say so.

There is nothing more misleading. There is nothing more calculated to do injustice. Look at this case. Between private parties, if a man making a claim like this had slept on his rights for all these years we would say at once that was the end of it. Why? Because he had waited until the knowledge of the facts had disappeared, until the witnesses had died, and there was no longer any certainty in the proof offered.

In this case, as far as any statement has been made, the party who gave the receipt in full sits by for nearly twenty years before he says one word about any additional claim. When it is to be presumed that the witnesses have gone, when all the evidence has disappeared or become obscure, he comes in and asks the Government, perhaps on his own ipse dixit or his own oath, to set aside his receipt in full and pay him this immense sum of money. He is a competent witness in the case and in the absence of any other evidence his oath would be plenary proof.

Mr. Chairman, the Court of Claims could only decide on the evidence before it.

A man, stimulated by greed, may make a claim of any such character against the Treasury, and who is to oppose him? If a receipt in full is not conclusive evidence after the lapse of so long time, what opposition can be set up? Who is the adversary party? And then as far as the United States attorneys are concerned, we are told that they appear in all such cases and represent the interests of the Government. Why, sir, every man who knows anything about the facts, who has ever had occasion to look into such questions at all, knows that there is no possibility even of the United States attorneys investigating all these cases as fully as they ought to be investigated, even if they could face the witnesses; and when gentlemen talk of the attorneys acting with vigilance in these cases, they are simply saying that which every man knows must be impossible. Of course they do the best they can, but in the great mass of matter that is submitted to them such a thing as extreme vigilance in such cases is not to be expected. And if a fraudulent claim is made after such a lapse of time, how are they to find evidence to disprove it?

In my opinion it is almost conclusive evidence against the validity of any such claim that a man sits quietly by for nearly twenty years and makes no effort to establish it, and especially after having given a receipt in full for it. And I am very sure that public policy requires that we should so hold.

Mr. COMPTON. I am sure the gentleman does not want to misstate the facts.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Permit me to conclude what I am just now saying and I will yield for a question.

Mr. COMPTON. I only wanted to correct a statement of the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Very well.

Mr. COMPTON. Because I know the gentleman does not want to do any one an injustice.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Certainly not.

Mr. COMPTON. The gentleman makes a mistake when he asserts this party simply laid upon his oars for twenty-five years. He has been fighting to secure a hearing since before the first payment was made and from that hour down to the present time.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Well, I spoke from the record, and also from the information I derived from my friend himself. I could not find the facts embodied in the report, and I asked my friend the question, when this was first inaugurated? He stated that the first he knew of it was in the Forty-eighth Congress. That is the best information I have been able to get either from the report or from anybody who knows anything of the case, and that is about twenty years after the inception of the claim.

Mr. COMPTON. When the gentleman made inquiry of me, as he states, I replied with reference to my own knowledge as to the date of the reference to the Court of Claims. Beyond that I did not undertake to answer. I have personal knowledge, however, of the fact from the lips of a Representative from my own district that previous to the Forty-eighth Congress he had introduced a bill himself; and how far beyond that it has gone I do not know.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Very well. We shall take that statement as showing the date of the making of this claim; for, as I have above said, the burden is on the claimant to show that he has not been guilty of laches and why he has so long, under such circumstances, remained silent; and since the use of the land for which this claim is made until the Forty-eighth Congress was at least eighteen to twenty years.

There is no lawyer here who does not know that claims under such circumstances come with a degree of suspicion cast on them, and that we would not allow them if it were a question as between two individuals. If it were not for the fact that these claims are against the public Treasury of the United States they would not receive a moment's consideration.

But the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. THOMAS] speaks of the existence of some conclusive testimony to the fact that this claim is valid, to wit, the testimony of a board appointed to investigate the claim, and that they investigated and allowed it. Now, I have tried to find out who constituted that board and what their findings were, but I have been entirely unsuccessful, although I have repeatedly asked the question. Whom did the Quartermaster appoint, and to whom did they report? What was the substance of their report and findings? It appears from all the information I have been able to gather that the Quartermaster-General appointed two persons, and they made a report and he set the report aside; but, notwithstanding that fact, we are to understand from the statement of my friend from Wisconsin that the testimony or report of this "board," so called, although set aside by the Quartermaster-General himself, is to have more credit given to it than the decision of the officer who appointed them and set aside their finding.

Let me suggest this illustration to the gentleman: Suppose a court appointed a referee to investigate a question, and the court saw fit to set aside the report of the referee; then in after time, and after the evidence in the case had been lost or obscured, would the report of the referee be taken in preference to the determination of the court? Is that the position? That is just the position of this question as it seems to me.

This claim is to be established by such evidence as that; and I submit to my friend from Wisconsin that instead of making for the conclusiveness of the claim it works positively against it.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Suppose a claim had been presented against you the validity of which you questioned, and you appointed two of your friends to investigate it, and they found against you; but you, still doubting the claim, proposed to pay so much, with the understanding that if it turned out afterward that more was due you would pay it. Suppose the party claiming accepted your offer, does the gentleman claim that he would be thereby estopped from presenting his demand, although you held his receipt for the sum paid?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Now, I ask the attention of members and especially lawyers to this suggestion. Is that the fact? The first question is, what was done? And my contention is that after the lapse of so long time under the circumstances the claimant should not be permitted to open this case by the allegation of facts inconsistent with his written receipt. After such a lapse of time disproof is almost impossible ordinarily. If that Quartermaster had been going to advise such a course as that and if this party reserved any such right, they would have written it in some form. It would not have been left an open, doubtful question, to be established by parol.

It is to prevent just such a state of things as this that civilized nations have adopted statutes of limitations, and say that if not prosecuted within a given time no action shall be allowed for the enforcement of such a claim; that it is to be presumed after so long a time that evidence would be lost or obscured and that injustice rather than justice would be the result of the enforcement of such claims. The wisdom of ages has said and rightly said that such stale claims shall not be tolerated. I am not only in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, but I am in favor, on the evidence before us, of not paying one dollar more in this case.

If, after such a time, receipts are to be set aside and claims paid on such evidence, good-by to all surplus in the Treasury; for the more dishonest a man is the more certain would be his success. The worse men are the more certain they would be to make a case when their claims depended on mere swearing; and I am opposed to accepting evidence countervailing that which was written so long ago. There is no reason why the rules in favor of individuals should not apply when the Government is a party. Especially in case of demands against the Government should the rule against stale claims be invoked and applied. The power of this proof is much more likely to be lost by the Government than by a private individual.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I do not propose to discuss the merits of this claim, for I have not had opportunity to examine into it; but I was somewhat amazed by the position taken by my acute and very able legal friend from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON]. He says that the Court of Claims found in favor of this bill, and states that the Court of Claims has to decide according to the evidence that is before it. That is right. But I do not understand why the evidence which is necessary for the Court of Claims to come to a conclusion should not be sufficient for him and for me. I do not know by what means this House arrives at a conclusion upon a private bill except upon the evidence that is before it. Now, if my friend has any other evidence than that before the Court of Claims then he can disparage the opinion of that court. I agree with him that the evidence taken by the Court of Claims should be absolutely conclusive. Now, the House has the right to reverse that decision, but it seems to be a wonderful position to take that the judgment of the Court of Claims should be disparaged because it decides on the evidence that is before it, and I do not know of any other ground upon which this House can confirm or reverse the opinion of the Court of Claims.

Mr. BREWER. I do not rise so much for the purpose of opposing this claim as to make some suggestions following in the line of the gentleman from Maine, the gentleman from Wisconsin, and the gentleman from Minnesota. I desire to state here that in my judgment the majority of the members of this House are lacking in confidence in the decisions or the conclusions arrived at in these cases by the Court of Claims, and I say this with all due respect to the members of that court. It is perfectly evident, if we will take and examine the reports made by that court and the findings which they send here to the House, and then compare them with the official records of the Government we will often find that they are directly opposite in the statement of facts. Now, we had a case here the other day under consideration in which that very condition of affairs existed. We had a claim here from the district of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOWDEN] in which this very condition occurred. The Court of Claims reported to this House a certain state of facts, and of course the Committee on War Claims, very naturally following that, made a report of these facts to the House and they were considered here by this committee. They went not back of that report for the purpose of finding what might be the official records of the Government. But fortunately we had here a certified record of the Government which showed an entirely different state of facts from those which were sent here by the Court of Claims.

Mr. BOWDEN. The case to which the gentleman from Michigan refers will probably be the next matter for consideration, and I do not wish to have that prejudiced by a misstatement which the gentleman is making, not intentionally. The facts are that the paper which was presented and read was all the testimony considered by the Court of Claims when they ascertained the state of facts, and if the gentleman will take the trouble to read carefully that testimony I think he will see that it rather goes to uphold the case than to damage it.

Mr. BREWER. Then, if the members of the Court of Claims had that evidence before them when they rendered their finding of facts to this House, they did a very unjust thing, because they found a state of facts existing, basing their finding upon a petition and oral evidence, when there were official records of the Government which showed a contrary state of facts.

Mr. BOWDEN. Why, sir, that testimony covered only a short period, less than a year of the time for which this compensation is asked.

Mr. BREWER. Then I do not read it correctly; but the record is before the House and gentlemen can refer to it for themselves.

Again, Mr. Chairman, there are cases that have been reported to this House by the Court of Claims where the question of loyalty has arisen, and, strange as it may seem, that court has almost universally found in favor of the loyalty of every claimant. I do not know how it comes, but that seems to be the fact. There is one case, and I presume there are more, in which the court has found the claimant loyal, and yet the testimony before the Southern Claims Commission shows as an affirmative fact by proof that can not, in my judgment, be controverted or doubted, that the party was disloyal. Now, how does this arise? I apprehend that it arises in the manner stated by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. COMPTON. I dislike to interrupt my friend, but he is debating another case instead of this one.

Mr. BREWER. I shall close in a moment. I am referring to these other cases for the purpose of showing that we ought not to place very much reliance upon the Court of Claims. It is said that the Department of Justice is represented in these cases. I do not know by whom it is represented, but if I am correctly informed, it is not by any one who holds a very responsible position in the Department, or by any one in whom this House should put great confidence. I must say, from a comparison of the records of the Government with the findings of the Court of Claims, that I have but little faith in findings of "facts" as they are sent here by that court.

Mr. COMPTON. I wish to say one word more, for the information of the House, to correct the impression which I fear has been made by the statement of the gentleman from Kansas and by that which has just fallen from the gentleman from Michigan. I find in the report of the court the following, which ought to be conclusive upon this point:

The court upon the proof and evidence, after hearing Gilbert Moyers, of counsel for the claimant, and the Assistant Attorney-General, of counsel for the defendant, find as follows.

So that the court heard the Assistant Attorney-General in this case.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I do not wish to be understood in any thing I have said about the Court of Claims as intimating that it is not an able and honest court. What I intended to say, and what I think I did clearly say, was that after the lapse of twenty years or a quarter of a century, with a party on one side stimulated by the hope of a large award or judgment in his favor, and with no person on the other side who is cognizant of the facts or directly or personally interested in presenting them, the court would in all probability have no reliable evidence before it, and that, therefore, when a case has been left to lie dormant so long as this one, and where there has been a settlement and a receipt given in full, that receipt ought to be held conclusive against the claimant, as it would be in a private litigation. If this be not so, then the older and more stale a claim is the stronger it becomes for the claimant if he is not an honest man, and the weaker for the Government.

Therefore I say that this idea that the report of the Court of Claims should be conclusive is most misleading. I hold, on the contrary, that after the lapse of such a length of time a report made on evidence presented by a claimant ought ordinarily to have but little weight; and I am opposed to removing the bar of the statute in these cases, not because I distrust the Court of Claims, but because it is impossible for the Government to procure evidence to establish the real facts or to countervail evidence presented by the claimant. In this case the fact of this claimant having given a receipt in full, and having allowed his claim to lie dormant so long, is to me more conclusive evidence as to the merits of the case than the report of the Court of Claims.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I can very easily believe that the occupation of such property as this for a considerable period of time by United States troops would result in a good deal of damage to the premises; and in this case it appears that a board of Government officers was appointed by the Quartermaster-General, who reported to him in favor of an allowance of $500 a month rent and also seven thousand and some odd dollars for injury to the property.

It is very manifest that their report was not satisfactory to the Quartermaster-General, and he determined that in regard to the general damages he had no jurisdiction; that as to rent, instead of paying $5,500, the amount claimed, he would pay $1,784.45. He must have made some inquiries. What he determined, however, if we accept the receipt as binding, would apply only to the rent, and would have no application to the other portion of the claim.

The difficulty I find is that in the report of the Court of Claims we are not informed whether they heard new testimony upon the subject, or whether they simply took as the basis of their finding of about $12,000, the old report which was made to the Quartermaster-General. If they accepted that old report and upon that undertook to override the action of the Quartermaster-General, and allow in full the claim for rent and for damages as reported by that commission or by those officers, we have no guaranty that they have not made too great an allowance. In such a state of the case, I am not ready to vote this money. Upon a report which the Quartermaster-General had condemned I would not like to undertake to overrule the judgment of the Quartermaster-General as to the rent, nor would I undertake to make an assessment of damages unless new evidence were presented to the Court of Claims or to Congress. I confess the inclination of my mind is to believe that the occupation of such premises for such a period of time by soldiers, under the circumstances which we know generally attended such occupation entailed damages upon the property; and I am ready to vote an allowance for such damages if I can be satisfied that the finding in this case did not rest entirely upon an old report from officers whose chief did not approve the report. In this state of uncertainty I believe I am willing to vote for an amendment to pay a part of this claim, for I do not feel prepared to vote against it altogether. I will vote to pay a part, but not the whole.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to discuss the merits of this particular claim at all, but I do want to call the attention of this Committee of the Whole to the situation as it has been presented here to-day. It is necessary for us to inquire, in the first place, how the Court of Claims came to have any jurisdiction in this case. This is one of a large class of cases as to which jurisdiction was conferred by act of Congress passed in 1883. When it was found that there was difficulty on the part of committees of the House of Representatives in ascertaining the facts in these cases, Congress passed an act providing that claims of this sort should be referred to the Court of Claims. Why was that act passed? If no confidence is to be placed in the findings of the Court of Claims, as has been argued here to-day by gentlemen who claim to be eminent in the legal profession, why do you continue this act upon the statute-book?

If the legal fraternity in this country has descended so low that members of the profession stand upon this floor and say to the country at large that no confidence is to be placed in members of that profession who are chosen as the judges of high judicial tribunals, that the findings of such tribunals are entitled to no credit or respect—and gentlemen in the very same breath charge claimants with belonging to a class of men who would swear falsely in order to obtain their claims—if the legal profession has descended to so low a grade, it is time we should repeal the laws providing courts for the adjudication of questions arising between the citizen and the Government. Sir, I do not entertain so low an opinion of the judges of our courts. I have a higher appreciation of the legal profession in this country than to believe any such stuff, even though it may come from a member of the profession.

The Committee on War Claims, of which I have the honor to be a member, has regard for the opinion of the Court of Claims. It has been argued here that because the court is not vested with power to render judgment its findings ought not to be respected. Sir, that court is endowed with power to find the facts, and when it does so I am not one to stand here and question that finding. I do not understand that the Committee on War Claims is here as a court of appeals to review the findings of the court which has been provided specially to protect the interests of the Government in these cases.

Gentlemen talk about claimants waiting for twenty years and resting meanwhile upon their claims. Sir, these people have in many cases been for twenty years or more knocking at the doors of Congress for relief, and when they go to the Court of Claims not over 2 per cent. of the cases referred to that court ever come back here with favorable findings.

Gentlemen who profess to be lawyers and talk about their legal knowledge say that the Court of Claims and the claimants may get up such a showing of facts as will defraud the Government. If this be true, why does not that court send back here the ninety-eight cases which they now reject out of every one hundred referred to them for consideration?

So far as this individual case is concerned, I do not know anything more about it than what the Court of Claims has sent here as its findings. The case was referred by the Forty-eighth Congress to the Court of Claims and was reported by that court to the Forty-ninth Congress. The Committee on War Claims in this Congress took the finding of the Court of Claims and the report of the committee in the Forty-ninth Congress and said:

> We find this state of the case existing: We believe that when you have encouraged these people to go before the court to test the legality and justice of their claims you are in duty bound, after the facts have been found by the court, to pay the amount which the court has found to be due.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] offers to divide this claim and pay half the amount. He says it is all wrong; but he is willing to pay one-half of the sum claimed.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] proposes an amendment by which he acknowledges the justice of this claim, just as does the gentleman from Ohio. Sir, if this claim is just to the extent of a dollar, the whole claim is just; and if you are not going to pass the bill and pay the amount found due by the Court of Claims, vote down the whole bill and say you have no confidence in the Court of Claims; that the whole proceeding is wrong, and that the opinions of the court are valueless.

If you will mark out a positive law in one direction or the other you will save the Court of Claims and the Committee on War Claims of this House a vast amount of unnecessary work.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Is there a solitary iota of evidence before the Court of Claims as to the occupation and use of this property?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. In answer to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] I wish to say that the Committee on War Claims has never considered itself created as a court to review the decisions of the Court of Claims. We believed that court had sufficient legal talent to make its own decisions; that the law and the facts were before them; that they acted under their oath, wherein they had staked their honor they would decide in accordance with the law and the facts, and we have taken their findings in this case and acted upon them. We have never pretended to review their decisions.

There is no question but they had ample evidence for every finding they have made.

I should think, Mr. Chairman, the members of that court had better spend their summer vacation praying to be delivered from the denunciations of the members of their profession who are members of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The question first recurs on the amendment as modified, which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "$12,442.98" and insert "$3,715.55."

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 33.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum has voted.

Mr. LANHAM. It is evident there is no quorum in the House, and I ask that the bill be laid aside for the present and that we proceed with the other bills upon the Calendar.

Mr. COMPTON. No, sir; I can not agree to that.

Mr. LANHAM. As there is no quorum present and the point of order is made, because we can not proceed to do any other business, I shall move that the committee rise.

Mr. HOLMAN. Inasmuch as there will be a vote taken on the bill in the House, I do not insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order having been withdrawn, the amendment is disagreed to.

The question next recurred on reporting the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. COMPTON. I hope that will not be done, and I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 33.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The question again recurred on the motion that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 32, noes 27.

So the motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Calendar.

Mr. BOWDEN. I wish to direct the attention of the Chair to the fact that the case first called up this morning by my colleague [Mr. WISE] should be now considered, in view of the decision made by the Chair on the case just disposed of. This is the case which was partially considered last Friday, and was passed over without losing its place with a view of printing the report and bill in the RECORD. I believe it is the first case on the Calendar reported from the Court of Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. What case does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. BOWDEN. It is the bill (H. R. 5517) for the relief of the Norfolk County Ferry Committee.

Mr. DOCKERY. Is that the first bill on the Calendar?

The CHAIRMAN. No, it is not.

Mr. BOWDEN. It is the first bill on the Calendar from the Court of Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that reported from the Forty-ninth Congress and placed on the Calendar at the beginning of the session?

Mr. BOWDEN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it does not come up, and the Clerk will read the next bill.

WILLIAM J. POITEVENT.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 26) for the relief of William J. Poitevent.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the same rule be followed to-day that was followed on the preceding Friday, that the Clerk shall call the Calendar, and after the reading of the title of the bill, if no one asks for its consideration, it shall be passed over, and the Clerk shall call the next bill.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. This bill may as well be disposed of to-day as at any other time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the consideration of this bill asked for?

Mr. DIBBLE. I object.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I suggest to the gentleman from South Carolina that this plan will facilitate matters in connection with the consideration of these bills on the Calendar, and I hope there will be no objection. He will find that gentlemen, if they are present, will call up these bills as they are reached on the Calendar; and of course if no one is present to look after the interests of a bill when it is reached it will be passed over informally.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands objection is made, and the Clerk will report the first bill on the Calendar, the title of which has been read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to William J. Poitevent, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $46,626.66, for the use of his steam-boat A. G. Brown by the United States Army, in the waters of Mississippi and Louisiana, from April 20, 1863, to April 7, 1866, said sum being the amount reported by the Secretary of War as the lowest paid by the Government ($1,300 per month) for (chartered) vessels of similar capacity in the waters aforesaid; and also the sum $5,873.95, being the net proceeds received by Col. A. M. Holabird from the sale of 222 barrels of rosin taken from said Poitevent and sold in New York, December 19, 1863, and accounted for by him in his account for the month ending December 31, 1863; and also the further sums, in payment for property taken from said Poitevent and reported by Quartermasters A. N. Shipley and said Holabird to have been expended or used in the service of the United States, as follows: Seven coils rubber belting, $750; 108 barrels of tar, $648; 21 cases of turpentine (42 gallons), $525; 1 coil hose, $100; 1 metallic row-boat, $100; 33 corn-husk mattresses, $99; 8 kegs of spikes, $96; 17 pillows, $50; 3 boat-oars, $3: Provided, That the payment thereof shall be held and taken as a complete relinquishment and satisfaction of all claim for damages sustained by him as aforesaid.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The question is on laying the bill aside.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I ask for the reading of the report in this case.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

A bill (H. R. 8592) for the erection of a public building at Jackson, Mich.

WILLIAM J. POITEVENT.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The reading of the report is demanded.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. STONE, of Kentucky) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 26) for the relief of William J. Poitevent, submit the following report:

The facts out of which this bill for relief arises will be found stated in House report of the Committee on War Claims (No. 3530, second session, Forty-ninth Congress), a copy of which is hereto appended.

Your committee adopt the said report as their own, and report back the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

[House Report No. 3530, Forty-ninth Congress, second session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10148) for the relief of William J. Poitevent, having considered the same and accompanying papers, submit the following report:

The facts as made out before your committee, by evidence chiefly of a documentary character, may be stated briefly in the following order:

At the time the claim hereinafter set forth accrued the claimant was a citizen of Gainesville, Hancock County, Mississippi, and engaged in lumbering; was the sole owner of two saw-mills, a ship-yard, built steam-boats and barges, owned two steam-boats, a general store (dimensions 40 by 80 feet), and traded principally in naval stores; also farmed and raised cattle. He was the largest tax-payer in the county.

On the 20th day of April, 1863, a portion of the United States Army, on an expedition from the city of New Orleans, took possession of the town of Gainesville aforesaid, and the commanding officer took from claimant certain property and gave him a receipt in the following words and figures, to wit:

"I certify that on the 20th day of April, 1863, at Gainesville, Miss., I seized and took from William J. Poitevent, a resident of such place, the following-described property, on account of and for the benefit and by authority of the United States Government, to wit: 10 bales of cotton, 108 barrels of tar, 222 barrels of rosin, 21 cases of turpentine, 8 kegs of spikes, 1 coil of hose, 7 coils of rubber belting, 1 small metallic row-boat and 3 oars, 33 corn-husk mattresses, 17 pillows; also the steamer A. G. Brown.

"D. S. COWLES,
"Colonel, Commanding One hundred and twenty-eighth New York Volunteers.
"GAINESVILLE, MISS., April 20, 1863."

Said property was taken to New Orleans and turned over to Col. S. B. Holabird, chief quartermaster of the Gulf, and receipted for to Lieut. S. H. Mase, Colonel Cowles's regimental quartermaster, by Capt. A. M. Shipley, the assistant quartermaster of Colonel Holabird. A copy of voucher to the return of Captain Shipley for April, 1863, shows the sale of 10 bales of cotton received from Lieut. S. H. Mase, Colonel Cowles's regimental quartermaster. Appended to this voucher is the certificate of Captain Shipley that he sold the cotton (3,384 pounds) by order of Holabird, the proceeds of which were $1,631.27. The account of Colonel Holabird relating to funds received by him for December, 1863, with supporting voucher, shows the sale of a corresponding quantity of rosin to that delivered to him by Colonel Cowles's regimental quartermaster. The official record shows sales in New York, December 19, 1863, of 272 barrels of rosin, received per ship R. C. Winthrop from New Orleans, the net proceeds of which are $7,196.92; and Holabird's account for the month ending December 31, 1863, credits the United States, "by sale of rosin, $7,196.72." The other articles taken from the claimant by Colonel Cowles appear in the detailed report of said Quartermasters Shipley and Holabird as having been expended or used in the service. The amounts allowed by the committee in payments for the articles expended or used in the service are much below what the property is fully proven to be worth.

In the December term, A. D. 1867, of the United States Court of Claims said claimant brought suit, proved loyalty, and received payment for the ten bales of cotton taken by Colonel Cowles, which is shown by the following judgment:

In the Court of Claims. William J. Poitevent vs. The United States. No. 3112.

At a Court of Claims held in the city of Washington on the 26th day of May, A. D. 1873, in the cause aforesaid, judgment was ordered to be entered as follows:

The court, on due consideration of the premises, find for the claimant, and do order, adjudge, and decree that the said William J. Poitevent do have and recover of and from the United States the net proceeds of ten bales of cotton, amounting to $1,631.27.

By the court.

A true copy of record.

Test, this 5th day of June, 1886.

[SEAL.] JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

The steam-boat A. G. Brown, seized by Colonel Cowles, was well adapted to the coastwise and river service, having been built expressly for that kind of service, and was so used by the United States in carrying stores and supplies, laying telegraphic wires necessary in the operations of the Army of the United States, and in the transportation of the troops of the United States to points and places where they were needed in the Department of the Gulf.

The claimant first applied to the War Department for the return of said steamer and compensation for said property, and after an examination of the claim, the Secretary of War directed the Quartermaster-General to return said steamer A. G. Brown to the claimant, which was made on the 19th day of May, 1866, three years and twenty-nine days after she had been so seized by Colonel Cowles as aforesaid.

On the 25th of May, 1886, the committee called on the Secretary of the Treasury for a copy of the register or enrollment of said steamer A. G. Brown, which was furnished three days later. The same day the official copy of enrollment was received the committee inclosed the same, together with the bill for Poitevent's relief, to the Secretary of War, and asked for information as to what the Government paid for chartered vessels of similar capacity to the steamer A. G. Brown during the war of 1861, in the waters of Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas; to which the Secretary replied on the 10th of June, 1886, as follows:

"The Quartermaster-General reports June 5, 1866, that the rate paid by the Government for (chartered) vessels of similar capacity, in the locality named, was from $1,300 to $1,500 per month, the Government paying all expenses for officering, manning, victualing, etc. It is presumed that during the time, (from April 20, 1863, to April 17, 1866) that this vessel was in possession of the Government extensive repairs must have been put upon her by the Government, as was usually the case, but how extensive these repairs were this office has not been able to ascertain."

At the time Poitevent received said steamer back she was so completely dismantled and machinery damaged that he sold her to the city of New Orleans for the nominal sum of $5,000, which is evidence that no extensive repairs had been placed upon her by the Government. She was comparatively a new vessel when put into the service of the United States. Her registered tonnage is officially reported at 225$\frac{88}{100}$. She was built at Pittsburgh, Pa., and enrolled January 9, 1860, at the port of Shieldsborough, Miss., and immediately employed as a passenger packet between the lake end of the Pontchartrain Railroad, Mandeville, Louisburg, Mandersonville, and Covington. Soon after the beginning of the war Poitevent withdrew his steamer from said line, and took her 63 miles from New Orleans, up the East Pearl River, and tied her up at a point above Gainesville, Miss.

The official record in the Court of Claims case No. 3112, heretofore recited, fully proves claimant's loyalty; that he was known to be a Union man before and during the war; that he was opposed to his sons joining the Confederate army; that one of his sons joined the Confederate army and was taken out by his father, the claimant; that claimant was arrested and taken as a prisoner by the Confederate authorities to Jackson, Miss., for giving aid and comfort to the enemy, and was charged as being disloyal to the Confederate government; that said Poitevent, by his attorney, Yearger, made application for a writ of habeas corpus, which was granted; that his release created great excitement, the popular feeling being that he ought to have been hung.

After said Poitevant was released from arrest he removed the machinery from said steamer and secreted it, fearing that the Confederate cavalry would find his boat and burn it. After the fall of New Orleans he replaced the machinery and put said steamer A. G. Brown in running order; had placed on board 25 cords of wood, and was arranging to run her down to New Orleans at the time Colonel Cowles seized her. The history of this claim, as it appears from the files of the War Department, now filed with the records in the case, is as follows:

"It is hereby certified that the attached papers are true copies of originals in possession of the War Department relative to the claim of William J. Poitevent.

"JAS. A. HARDIE,
"Inspector-General."

During the reading of the report,

Mr. HOLMAN said: I shall not insist upon the further reading of the report.

Mr. DIBBLE. I would like to have the report read.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report as above.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DOCKERY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President was delivered to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

The message further announced that the President had on August 7, 1888, approved bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 10573) to provide for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of Dakota, and for other purposes.

WILLIAM J. POITEVENT.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I move that this bill be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. It can only be done by unanimous consent, and the request has been once submitted and declined.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I would like to renew the request, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman to the committee. Is there objection?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon laying the bill aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I desire to be heard for a few moments on this question. The claimant in this case on the opening of hostilities between the Confederate States and the Union was a resident of Gainesville, Miss., and owned a large lumber-yard there, two saw-mills, a store, fifty negroes, and two steam-boats plying between New Orleans and Covington, Ky. In 1874 (I think it was under the act of March 3, 1871) he filed his claim before the Southern Claims Commission, demanding the sum of $135,133 for property destroyed during the war. The proof that he offered before that commission as to his loyalty was of such a suspicious character that a special agent was sent down to his home to inquire into that subject. He was also notified of what was proposed to be done in this regard, and informed of his right to be present at the time of the taking of any evidence touching this matter by the agent.

He went down there and had the privilege of cross-examining the witnesses whose testimony was taken by this agent upon his claim of loyalty to the Government during the war. After taking full evidence the agent reported to the commission in this language: "You may rest assured that no one here has any faith in the claimant's loyalty." After that, upon application of the claimant, an opportunity was given for him to take proof to refute this charge. It was shown in this evidence that this man had four sons, three of whom served in the Confederate army and navy. It was also shown in the proof that he made a contract with the Confederate government by which he furnished the material and superintended the job of putting material in Pearl River, so as to obstruct the passage of the Federal gunboats up and down that river.

It was also shown that on the 1st day of July, 1861, he furnished 21,000 feet of cypress, 10 by 12, for repairing the palisades of a Confederate fort. When this matter was under hearing before this agent he denied such charge until the parties who were investigating the matter presented a receipt or account made out by him against the Confederate government for $375, in which he acknowledged payment of that amount from the Confederate government, and signed the receipt in his own handwriting. These are briefly the facts presented before the Southern Claims Commission; and after a full investigation the Commission say "the claim is rejected for disloyalty."

Now, Mr. Chairman, one reason I had in asking for the reading of this report was to show to the members of this House the danger of relying on reports coming from the Court of Claims, without making any further investigation as to the character of the items charged or the loyalty of the claimant. It appears from the report I have referred to that this man was as disloyal as any man who served in the Confederate army during the war of the rebellion; yet he made a claim for payment of a number of bales of cotton destroyed during the war, and the Court of Claims found in his favor and certified to his loyalty. One gentleman here to-day, discussing the claim which has just been disposed of, referred to this and deprecated the idea of acting upon proof taken by the Court of Claims in a matter of this kind. Here is a wealth of proof establishing the disloyalty of this man during the war, and are we to be bound by the ex parte evidence on which he made his claim before the Court of Claims? There is not a single element in the case which can be urged in favor of this claimant. The gentleman who presented the claim in the form of a bill to the War Claims Committee is so thoroughly convinced of it that he does not ask that this bill be favorably reported. I say this because he was in his seat when the matter was called up in the House, and when I rose to oppose the bill he had nothing to say in its favor.

Now, sir, without taking further time, I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported adversely to the House.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I must say, Mr. Chairman, that I very much hope that that sort of action will not be taken by the House. I have twice to-day insisted that this bill or this claim be passed over without losing its place on the Calendar. I know, sir, that the evidence before the Committee on War Claims was as clear and conclusive of the loyalty of this claimant as it could be of the loyalty of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] himself. I knew that this evidence filed before the Southern Claims Commission existed, and I know that evidence exists to refute every single, solitary particle of it; and it was on that account and on that kind of evidence that the committee report. But on sending to the file room for the papers in this case I found that this evidence does not appear in the papers. In the interest of fairness, fair dealing, and justice I hope that the House will not agree to any such action as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], but that the bill may be passed over, and if those interested in this bill do not by the time it is again reached for consideration refute the charges made by the gentleman, then I have nothing further to say. I am not an advocate of this claim and do not care anything about it, but I believe it will be eminently unjust and improper to treat it in this manner at this time.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Certainly. I will take pleasure in answering it.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Will the gentleman state what papers were lost from the files.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I do not know what papers were missing, but when they were sent for they could not be obtained.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Were the papers which were lost those which tended to show the disloyalty of the claimant?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. They do not seem to be lost. They seem to be in the papers.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Where they belong?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. The papers tending to show the man's loyalty were in there, but I care nothing about it, and I simply ask the House that the case may be passed over in justice to the gentleman who presented the bill here.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I have the facts here in the record before me, and I shall oppose the suggestion made by the gentleman from Kentucky. The evidence before the Committee on War Claims must have been evidence of an ex parte nature, and every one knows that in a judicial proceeding it is the cross-examination which brings out the truth. No man can rely upon ex parte evidence in a question of this kind.

Now, this record from which I have gleaned the facts which I have given to the committee is made up of depositions that were taken by this agent, who was sent out by the Southern Claims Commission, at the very place where this claimant lived, and the claimant was informed of what the commission proposed to do, and was given an opportunity to go down there and face the witnesses and cross-examine them if he saw fit. Not only that, but he was given the privilege by the Southern Claims Commission of introducing evidence before the commission to establish his loyalty; and after the taking of this evidence it was conclusively shown, as I have already said, that the man was as disloyal as any of his sons who served in the Confederate army. It was shown that these two steam-boats which he owned that were plying between Covington and New Orleans kept up their trade until New Orleans was taken by the Federal forces, and that the moment the General Government obtained control of that city they ceased to do business there.

Not only that, but during all the time New Orleans was under the control of the Confederates this man owned a lumber yard there and carried on his business; but the moment the city surrendered to the Federal forces he ceased to do business. If he was a loyal man then was the time to have shown it. It was after that, if I understand the record, that he made a contract by which he was to furnish materials to obstruct Pearl River for the purpose of hindering and delaying and damaging the General Government. As the commissioners say in this record, the evidence that he introduced to show that he was a loyal man is utterly unreliable. It is the testimony of men without character. The evidence that was given for that purpose was of such a serpentine character that no man could rely upon it, and it was rejected in toto. The agent who was sent down there had an opportunity of talking with the neighbors of the claimant, and with those who had done business with him during the war, and he says, as I have heretofore stated, "You may rest assured that no one here has any confidence in the claimant's loyalty." Now, sir, with such a claim as this presented here for our consideration I must insist upon a vote on my motion.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, is it proper to say a word upon the subject-matter of this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It is. The question before the committee is, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table?

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I am in favor of that, and I desire to give my reasons. The other day the House voted to pay somebody for trees that were shot down by artillery at the battle of Murfreesborough. It was not even shown whether it was the Union or the Confederate artillery that did the damage, but, all the same, the trees were paid for on the ground of the loyalty of the claimant. We have here a case where it is undisputed that the party received money from the Confederate Government for services rendered for the purpose of damaging and hindering the cause of the Union.

We have here on record from the accredited agency of the Government, to wit, the Southern Claims Commission, evidence that this man was disloyal. Years afterwards the Court of Claims finds that he was loyal. Now, which shall we believe, the court which took jurisdiction of the case and passed upon it at an early day or the one which passed upon it at a much later day? It is evident to me that in order to be safe we should follow the finding of the Southern Claims Commission. I would not insult my friends on the other side by asking them to believe that we believe that there were any considerable number of loyal people in the Southern States, and especially in the section where this man lived at the time in question, because the people there were all in dead earnest and were all united, and no gentleman upon the other side will dispute the fact that the Union men of the South at that time, if there were any, were colored men and not whites. And I say this in no disparagement of the people of the South.

They did what they conceived to be their duty, and whether they wanted to do it or not the situation was such that they were compelled to be against the Union and in favor of the Confederacy; and it is nonsense at this late day to ask us to believe that a man with three sons in the Confederate army, a man who, for money received from the Confederate government, had undertaken to damage the cause of the Union—it is nonsense, I say, at this late day to ask us to believe that he was loyal or to talk about his being a loyal man. I would not for my right hand deprive any man or woman in the Southern States who was loyal of any just right. I am willing to do justice in every such case, and brave men who fought against the flag will ask nothing more. They do not ask us here to pay false claims, and I have too high a regard for their manhood to believe that they will undertake to force through claims of this class.

Why, sir, this Government has not any more money than it needs to reward suitably the men who saved the Union; and my friends on the other side, because they are thoroughly reconstructed and admit to-day that this is the grandest Government the world ever saw, will only be the more swift to join with us on this side in doing what is right for the soldiers of the Union. Instead of wasting our time here this afternoon in considering the claim of a man who, according to every presumption in the case, must have been disloyal, how much better it would be, how much more satisfactory to our friends on the other side and to us, if we could only take up some bill embracing general pension legislation—for instance, the bill proposing to give to persons who are totally deaf double the amount of pension now allowed by law—how much better it would be to pass some legislation of that kind in favor of the soldiers who saved the Union than to be spending these Friday afternoons, as we have been doing all through the session, undertaking to find out whether we could not by some hook or crook, give to some one who was during the war in the center of secession and rebellion, a portion of the Government money, and this, too, in nine cases out of ten, upon evidence entirely ex parte.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Mr. Chairman, this case was reported by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE], the chairman of the Committee on War Claims; I was not expected to manage the case in this House, although the claimant is a citizen of my district. The bill was reported very early in the session, being among the first to be placed on the Calendar; and this gentleman, very prudently, as I thought, preferred that the measure should go into the hands of some older and more experienced member—some member older in service and in years. The papers have been laid aside; and in what I may say, I shall have to speak simply from my recollection of those papers, as I examined them in the War Claims Committee.

I concur in the sentiments expressed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ALLEN] who has just taken his seat. I do not know that any member of the War Claims Committee at any time since I have been a member of it—and I have attended every meeting—has made a solitary expression in the discharge of his duties from which any one could tell whether he was a Democrat or a Republican, whether he came from the North or from the South. In fact, I attended every meeting of the committee for two months before I knew all who were the Democratic and who the Republican members, or in some cases whether the member was from a Northern or a Southern State. We investigated these questions purely upon the evidence placed before the committee; we weighed that evidence and applied the legal propositions applicable to the evidence; and in all instances where the loyalty of any claimant rested under any doubt the case was not reported favorably to the House. I will say for myself, and I believe for every man coming from the section described by my friend from Michigan and from which I come, as well as the other members, that in the proceedings of this committee, loyalty is made a prerequisite to a favorable report; and I say further, although I make no pretensions to loyalty myself——

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. You are all right now?

Mr. STOCKDALE. What is the remark of the gentleman?

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. You say you "make no pretensions to loyalty." You are perfectly loyal now?

Mr. STOCKDALE. Oh, that is understood.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. You mean that at that time nobody down there was loyal——

Mr. STOCKDALE. You never were more mistaken in your life, my friend. I know exactly what I am talking about; for I was there to see what was going on, and my friend was not.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Yes, I was; you are mistaken in regard to that.

Mr. STOCKDALE. You were not going about loose; you kept pretty close with your crowd. [Laughter.] I will say in reference to the remark of the gentleman from Michigan who erroneously thinks there were no loyal men in the South, that we had better be spending this time voting pensions to Union soldiers. While I represent a people the large majority of whom make no pretensions to have been then loyal, but had arms in their hands against the Union soldiers, but not against the United States Government, and while I admit—not boastfully, but truthfully—that I led many a charge against them, I say now, knowing that my people will read every word I say, that I will vote pensions to Union soldiers whenever I think they are deserved. I respect a man into whose eyes I have looked in the battle line, and who, I know, has never quailed before the cannon's mouth. He is a true citizen of the United States; he is the man who extends the hand now and says, "Since you are now loyal to the United States Government, have laid down your arms and come under the flag of the Union, we make no distinction between you and ourselves before the law." Sir, how noble and grand was the exhibition in that behalf of the United States soldiers of Massachusetts when they extended to the soldiers of South Carolina and Virginia an invitation to the centennial of Bunker Hill. They had no recriminations to make. They wanted to bring back these people, whom they regarded as erring, under the shadow of Bunker Hill, under the flag that floated over the victorious armies of America a hundred years before—bring them within the memory of the long ago. Their proceedings were more like a feast of welcome than a meeting of those who had lately been armed adversaries.

I remember, and our people remember, when the great marshals had met, when the last gun had been fired, and the terrible struggle was over, the treatment which Lee and his army received from General Grant. We remember that we were invited back here to put behind us the desolation that had afflicted the country, to return to the halls of Congress, the temple of our fathers, when we were invited to leave behind us the memory of strife and to march in the future as a grand united nation. I can not but recall, too, the recent proceedings at Gettysburgh, when every true Southern soldier's heart beat with emotion in witnessing the grand men who stood there and spoke for the Union, the prosperity and future glory of this country, including the South. Sir, I respect a brave Union soldier. He wants no humiliation of the South or her former soldiery. He would rather aid than retard their progress in their gigantic struggle to retrieve their ruined fortunes, and I will vote for pensions to such as deserve them, but that does not require me to say that W. J. Poitevent was disloyal when he says he was not.

I concur with the gentleman from Michigan, that the man who was disloyal under the law is not entitled to be remunerated for property of his which the Army used. If I thought that Mr. Poitevent had been disloyal—and I know him and his family well, I know there are no more honorable people in the world—I would not urge his claim before this House.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. You know he had three sons in the rebel army, do you not?

Mr. STOCKDALE. I do not know whether they were in the army or not.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. One of them was in the navy.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I am willing to take the gentleman's statement on that point and admit that they were all in the Confederate army, for the sake of the argument.

I say from the War Department and the Navy Department there is evidence of this gentleman's loyalty, and the Navy Department has not misrepresented the evidence to us.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STOCKDALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Did you know this gentleman during the war?

Mr. STOCKDALE. I did not.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Give us your best judgment as to whether he was loyal or not during the war.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. That is not evidence.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I know it is not evidence, but I am not arguing this case on the merits now. It has already been decided as to his loyalty by the Court of Claims. I have reported against many cases purely on the question of disloyalty. If I believed this claimant was disloyal I would not have concurred in the report, but the papers show that he was a loyal man.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Did the gentleman consult the report of the Southern Commission as to what was the evidence taken by the gentleman who was sent down there for that purpose?

Mr. STOCKDALE. My judgment is that the reports of these agents sent down there are of the most unreliable character.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. The agent not only reported his conclusions, but he also reported the evidence which he had taken, and the commissioners report from that evidence he was a disloyal man.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I have investigated many of these cases, as I have already stated, and found the reports of the Claims Commission unreliable. Some time ago there was a case during this session from the city of Nashville. The Southern Claims Commission reported, or some body of that sort reported, the man was a rebel, a rebel recruiting officer. It appeared to me that it was a singular proposition to come here under such circumstances asking relief. I found on examination that very shortly after the property was taken a board of army officers was appointed to examine and report on the case. That commission looked into the matter and that commission pronounced him to be loyal, and his property ought to be paid for.

General Thomas examined into the report of the commission and approved it. The man had an order to protect him in the possession of his property that had not been taken because he was loyal.

The fact that General Thomas was satisfied of the loyalty of this man on the report of that Army commission, while the report of the agent was to the contrary, shows there were cases in which disloyalty was charged where no disloyalty existed. It was easy for some man who had a spite against another to declare he was a rebel, and to thus render him liable to the charge of disloyalty. The fact that this man, who was a loyal man, was charged with being a rebel recruiting officer, and falsely so, and other similar cases, would justify me in saying those agents of the Southern Claims Commission were not always to be relied upon in the reports which they submitted.

They were not all honest men who went down there, and there were many who not only had the disposition to injure others but used their power to do so. Where they had the disposition to injure others it was easy for them under the circumstances to do so, and to charge that a claimant had been in the Confederate army or in sympathy with it, and to report against him on the ground of disloyalty.

They present merely ex parte evidence and force it upon us. Human nature is unco weak, and how easy it is, when inclination leads a pliant conscience, to arrive at conclusions adverse to the interests of persons against whom prejudice exists!

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. That is not ex parte evidence.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Was he there?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. No, he was not there; but he had the privilege to be there.

Mr. STOCKDALE. He had the privilege?

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. He was notified he had the privilege.

Mr. STOCKDALE. It may be, but he had the right to rebut the evidence, nevertheless; but as I have already stated, where the inclination exists the slightest evidence is taken as conclusive against a claimant's loyalty.

I want to say this, Mr. Chairman, that I can not state on my personal knowledge, because I did not know this gentleman during the war, but I have known him for many years, and I can say now I do not believe old man Poitevent would go before a jury or before a court and swear falsely for any amount, let alone the amount involved in this case. If I were a judge or a juror and he were to come before me upon the bench or upon a jury and swear a certain thing was true I would rest on his statement.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. This report of the Southern Claims Commission shows that this claimant did go before that commission, so that he did have a hearing and did have his day in court.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Now you rest on that conclusion? Then we have it announced in the Congress of the United States by my friend from Illinois, who I presume is a lawyer, that if an agent is sent out to gather in testimony—say that he is an authorized agent of the Southern Claims Commission, which can not give him any more standing than a commissioner of a chancery court or a special commission of a circuit court—he is sent out to take testimony and notifies the opposite party and he comes there without witnesses and attends, then, according to the gentleman from Illinois, he has had "his day in court." Is that the law? Is that the law in Illinois? Is it the law of the United States? Is it the law, I ask my friend, anywhere amongst civilized people? I say no. When he comes into court he has a right to rebut that evidence. I say that he has rebutted it, and I hold in my hand a bundle of papers which have been just sent to me from the Senate, which I am satisfied contain evidence in rebuttal of that fact. It is rebutted already sufficiently to be considered by this House.

Here are papers, I have not time now to select from them, but there is one here I know from the Secretary of the Navy, and no man will doubt his loyalty, favoring the payment of the claim; testimony showing that this man ran his boat away from New Orleans instead of going there and hid her away in the bayou, and that he had nothing whatever to do with the Confederate war, although his sons may have had. Does that make him disloyal? I have heard it said that the ancestry may taint the blood of the children, but never, Mr. Chairman, in the course of my experience before have I heard it alleged that the children's act taint with disloyalty their forefathers. Why, it is worse than the old fable of the wolf pouncing upon the lamb because he was muddying the water, drinking in the stream below him.

Suppose his sons were in the Confederate army. What then? I was in the Confederate army from beginning to end, and therefore my father was disloyal who lived in Pennsylvania. [Laughter.] Is that the logic? That is the argument that the gentleman would have you adopt to defeat an honest claim. I would ask my friend what he would do with a case of this sort occurring in Tennessee: A Confederate boy captured his brother fighting down there upon the other side and kept shooting away in the direction of the enemy, when his brother cried out to him, "Hold on, Jim; hold on, you will shoot the old man. He is right over there." [Laughter.] What would be the condition of these men? Both the Union soldiers were disloyal because one was a rebel, I presume. [Laughter.]

Now, I say this on my own personal knowledge, that although his sons may have been in the Confederate army, there is not one of them, either the father or the sons, that will go before any court or swear falsely and deliberately for four times the amount of money involved in this claim. Better, truer, or more upright men do not live in the country than these gentlemen. Therefore I say it is not fair to denounce this case and throw it out of Congress without a fair and equitable hearing.

Is my friend from Illinois afraid of these gentlemen on that side of the House that they can not vote intelligently and honestly with all the evidence in? My friend from Michigan says he is not afraid of the gentlemen who sit on this side, nor need he be, for I say to him notwithstanding the fact that this gentleman is a citizen of the district I represent, if William J. Poitevent turns out to be not loyal, I will myself vote against the passage of the bill in his behalf. But I do not believe it, sir. It would take stronger proof to convince me that that man was a perjurer than any claims commission agent's report. As to there being no loyal men there at that time, I can say to the gentleman that he is mistaken; there were at that time loyal men in that country. They suffered more from the Union troops during the war than from the Confederate side, I am sorry to say, and just because the officers were in the condition of my friend from Michigan—they would not believe them.

Many men around throughout that district were true and loyal men to the Government, and many of them remained so throughout the war, although in some instances the acts of the Government troops towards them induced them to be disloyal. But it is just to say that many of them stuck to their opinions without change during that whole period. They were not thick down there, but they were there. I can tell you an incident pertinent to this point as illustrating the truth of what I say, the case of a man who was arrested in Mississippi and brought into my camp to be dealt with as a spy. In conversation with him he told me in the midst of my own soldiers that he was not a spy, but that he was a Union man; had been all the time. That he admitted, but denied that he was a spy. Mr. Chairman, I did not do in that case like my friend from Illinois or my friend from Michigan. I believed the statement of the man. I reported the case to the commanding general, who ordered that he be allowed to remain at home unmolested. He was a Union man, as he told me frankly and fairly, and he remained so throughout the war. There is one instance within my own observation, and I know of others. There are men now living in that country who to my own knowledge were Union men from the beginning to the end of the war.

I want to say further that there were loyal men in the neighborhood that I lived in then and in the county where I lived then and where I live now. While they were not numerous, they were there. It took an honest man to be loyal. It took a braver man to be a Union man in the South than to be a Union man in Michigan or Illinois. In those States it was the popular side for a man to be on the side of the Union, and when you got a man up there that was likely to sympathize with the Confederacy he was quiet, and Union men in the South were quiet, but they were Union men all the same.

Do you say a man must have been actively loyal and express himself all the time in favor of the Union before you would believe him? What a miserable subterfuge. Those men were isolated. There were probably not over a dozen in the county and they lived far apart. What could they do? Was it necessary for a man to get upon the house-top and proclaim that he was in favor of killing every rebel? If he did some Confederate would have invited him down. You certainly do not want a man to be a fool so as to establish that he was a Union man. He had a right to think we were wrong, as old Mr. Rollins told me I was wrong and that all my folks were wrong. He came to the right place to say it, right in the midst of the soldiers in their camps, men too brave to harm him. The soldiers told him to go home and he would not be harmed. He could have been proved disloyal, because he buried and cared for Confederate soldiers. Loyal men were not legion, but they were truthful and undoubtedly Union men.

Now, then, I say where you find a man who had not afforded aid to the Confederacy and not spoken favorably for it, it would to me be almost conclusive proof that he was a Union man, because the tide swept the country and it was an exception where they differed from their neighbors. A man in that position would be unwise to stand up before the vast majority of the people and say he was loyal and say he was a Union man when the great bulk of the people were on the Confederate side and in the utmost earnest.

I am not saying this boastfully, neither apologetically, because at the end of the war we all went in and accepted the situation, knowing that this was the best Government that we could get, and the Government under which we had to live, and that it was our duty to be good citizens under our Government.

I made a speech in 1875 at a reunion of Confederate soldiers, at a time when excitement was high in the heart of the great South, in which I proclaimed, for the first time in this country I believe, that reconciliation and peace was the only remedy for the South; that we had our choice to be Ireland or Scotland, Scotland with her prudence and acquiescence, or Ireland with her resistance and her ruin. From that day until now I have advocated that doctrine.

I have no respect for a man who would profess to have been loyal when he was not loyal, because he would be untruthful. I would not want to see the funds of the United States go out to a man of that sort; and even if I had no conscientious scruples it would be injurious to my standing at home to vote for such a thing, because our people have no respect for a man of that character. They have respect for a good square Union man, but for a man who dodged first upon one side and then upon the other they have no respect.

In the Committee on War Claims I met some time ago the case of a man who claimed to have been loyal and asked compensation for cotton taken in Charleston, S. C., and then I came across a letter which he had written to Jefferson Davis recommending somebody for an appointment as captain in the Confederate army. He could not explain the discrepancy, and I reported against his claim, though President Davis is one of my constituents. [Laughter.]

Now, I did not expect to manage this case. Older men, men who have had more experience and who have more influence in the House, were to have presented it here, but I think it is not just square when the papers in the case are over at the Senate.

Such a performance as this has not been attempted before in this House.

Mr. CHEADLE. Will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. STOCKDALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHEADLE. I find that as early as the 26th day of May, 1873, the Court of Claims had jurisdiction of this case and made a finding in favor of the claimant in the sum of $1,632.27 as to one item.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. That is the cotton claim that I referred to.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Now, Mr. Chairman, what I want done and what I want to ask the House to do is this: I have never caught gentlemen on the other side napping, and they will all be wide awake when this bill can come up again; and it would be a good deal better and fairer and would have a much better effect for the House to be able to say, "We have defeated your bill, Mr. Poitevent, upon a fair and square hearing; we have heard your evidence, we have considered your case, and we have come to the conclusion that you were not loyal." It would have a good deal better effect to say that than for the gentleman from Illinois, when the papers are absent from the House, to jump into the case and reach away back to the Southern Claims Commission for the testimony of an agent of that commission, an institution that I will not express my opinion of, out of respect to the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR (holding up a bundle of papers). Are these the papers?

Mr. STOCKDALE. I have not looked over them. I will do so in a moment. You gentlemen expect, and rightfully expect, and we respond to your expectation, that we will not vote money out of the Treasury of the United States to men who were not loyal. We respond to that expectation because they are not entitled to it under the law. It is not the man's disloyalty that I object to so much, it is the law that we have sworn to support; and I would not vote money out of the Treasury to my own brother if he had been disloyal.

I would not think anything less of the brother, but I would regard my oath under the law and the oath that I took in the presence of the Speaker of this House and before God. Now, gentlemen, I am entitled to take it for granted that gentlemen who sit on the other side of the House are equally honest and equally fair, and I ask them, do you want to deny a man payment for his property which went into the hands of the United States Government upon a technicality, or upon some statement about which you know nothing at all?

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. What fuller investigation can we have of this matter on another day than we can have to-day?

Mr. STOCKDALE. We can have the papers presented to the House.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. There is no evidence there as to loyalty.

Mr. STOCKDALE. There is evidence as to loyalty somewhere, though I do not at this moment know just where it is. But the interest I have in this case is because I believe this claimant is a gentleman, and I believe that the vote of this House to-day would brand him with a stigma with which no gentleman ought to be branded, and which no man who occupies the position of a Representative on this floor ought to want to brand any gentleman with. The statement that there were no loyal men at the South during the war will not do.

I could bring you a regiment of Union men from my State. I have been getting pensions allowed to some of them. Must I prove loyalty for them because they lived in the South? Is it to be said that men were not loyal because they were white, but that all the loyal men of the South were colored, as the gentleman from Michigan said? Why, sir, there were comparatively few colored men who were loyal Union men then. The colored men were loyal to their masters as a general thing.

The colored men, hundreds and thousands of them, were on the plantations within a night's travel of the Federal lines, with not a white man on the plantation; they made the crops and supported the family, and they could have gone off any night if they had wanted to. Some did go, it is true, but the bulk of them did not go. Nearly every Confederate officer and a large number of men had colored servants. They rode fine horses, and they could have ridden into the Federal lines any time they pleased; but they did not do it, they were loyal to us, and no Southern man has within his breast the slightest feeling of ill will toward the colored man.

Whatever may be the opinion to the contrary, I know it to be true that the colored people of the South were loyal to us, and we are now loyal to them. Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe that Mr. Poitevent was a loyal man, because he says so. If the facts turn out to be otherwise, I will vote against this bill; but I know that this House does not want to act in the dark, and therefore I ask that this bill be postponed until we can have the papers before us.

Mr. CATCHINGS. What testimony had the Court of Claims before them?

Mr. STOCKDALE. That is the trouble about this matter. If I had known twenty-four hours ago that this case would come up, I would have had the whole thing in my head. But nobody suspected a thing of this sort to happen in the House. No one expected that for the first time during this long session a war claim would be called up by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], who knows nothing about it, and cares nothing about it except to defeat it.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Did those "loyal" men you speak of hold receipts from the Confederate government for services rendered?

Mr. STOCKDALE. I do not know, but they may have done so.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Then they were not loyal.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Yes, they may have been loyal in spite of that fact.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. No, sir.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Now, I will show the gentleman that the circumstance he speaks of may have existed and yet the men may have been loyal. Suppose a man steals a horse from my friend from Michigan, loses him, and can not return him. Is he entitled to pay for him? Would the gentleman refuse to give a receipt for the money? The Confederacy had a way of pressing property into the service sometimes and was just as willing to take in that way the property of a Union man as of a Confederate. Should those Confederate officers have failed in common honesty to give a receipt for what they took? I can point out to you cases of that sort in Mississippi—plenty of them.

If you had been in the South, or I had been in the North, and had been ordered in front of half a dozen bayonets to do a certain thing, we would have done it if it was not dishonorable. Suppose it had happened—I do not know that it did in this case, but it did in others—that the Confederate soldiers along the banks of the Mississippi River went upon a United States boat running up from New Orleans; put soldiers behind the pilot and engineer and made them run the boat ashore and deliver the sugar to the Confederate soldiers; and then turned the boat loose and told the men to go and bring up another load of sugar. The men in charge of such boats were in the service of the Confederates for the time, but they received receipts for the sugar. Were they disloyal for that reason? In such a case the parties never willingly enlisted in the service of the Confederacy.

I think it requires the assent of a man to an act before you can convict him. There is no law, no reason, no justice in standing up here and maintaining the position that no man who was in the South during the war can truthfully say he was loyal. What proof of loyalty is presented here this Government should recognize it and say to the party, "You did well," instead of turning away from him and saying, "There were no loyal people there during the war." All through the war it was claimed by the Government of the United States that there were loyal people there; that we were forcing them into our service. There were not half so many as was supposed, it is true; and it is rather rough on him now for the people to whom he was loyal to turn him the back of the hand. I ask that the proposition to report this bill with the recommendation that it lie on the table be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the request of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Mr. Chairman, I have not yielded the floor. How much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman has been proceeding by unanimous consent. [Laughter.]

Mr. STOCKDALE. Then I ask that the pending motion be voted down, so that the bill may be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. HOOKER. I hope the gentleman will withhold his point until I can read a document.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I desire to make a statement in reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. LANHAM. It is perfectly evident it is impossible to accomplish anything in the way of legislation on the Private Calendar in the order in which we are proceeding. Gentlemen insist on the consideration of a bill, and when no quorum appears they make the point of order, and it is then laid aside or passed over. Therefore, to reach the bills which have been reported to the House, I move that the committee rise.

Mr. HOOKER. I hope that motion will be withheld until I can be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is in order. The gentleman from Texas moves that the committee rise.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 49, noes 34.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole, having had the Private Calendar under consideration, had directed him to report back sundry bills with various recommendations.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill.

CATHOLIC CHURCH, MACON CITY, MO.

Mr. HATCH. I ask by unanimous consent of the House, as I have been in the chair for several Fridays, and not having had an opportunity to call up any bill, to be allowed to move that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11007) for the relief of the Catholic Church at Macon City, Mo. It merely appropriates $725 to pay for the use of that church by Federal soldiers during the war. Nothing is charged for damage to the building. It is a unanimous report by the Committee on War Claims.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from its further consideration of the bill, and it was brought before the House for consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the resident minister in charge of the Catholic Church of Macon City, in the State of Missouri, the sum of $725, for the use and occupation of their church building by the Ninth Regiment Missouri State Cavalry for quarters during the late civil war.

The report (by Mr. STONE, of Kentucky) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the petition of the Catholic Church of Macon City, Mo., report as follows:

The evidence submitted shows that the church building was taken possession of, used, and occupied by various commands of United States troops during the fall and winter of 1864; that the use of said building was necessary to the health and lives of the troops; and that the rental value for the time it was so used was reasonably worth the sum of $725.

The building was much damaged and injured in value by said occupation, of which the committee have taken no account.

Your committee report herewith a bill and recommend its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HATCH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH FRANCIS.

Mr. CHEADLE. I ask by unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of joint resolution (S. R. 62) in recognition of the services of Joseph Francis.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That in view of the life-long services to humanity and to his country of the now venerable Joseph Francis, in the construction and perfection of life-saving appliances by which many thousands of lives have been saved, the Director of the Mint is hereby authorized and required to strike a gold medal, with a suitable device and inscription, prepared under the direction of the Joint Committee on the Library, to be presented by the President of the United States to Mr. Francis, in recognition of his eminent services.

SEC. 2. That a sufficient sum of money to carry this resolution into effect is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The report (by Mr. STAHLNECKER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 62) in recognition of the services of Joseph Francis, submit the following report:

That they have considered the same, and recommend that it do pass.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CHEADLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I ask, by unanimous consent, that Wednesday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of bills coming over from the Committee on War Claims. There are quite a number of small cases in which members are interested, and they desire an opportunity to be given to call them up for consideration. They are urging me on all sides to make this request.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced the passage without amendment of bills of the House of the following titles, namely:

A bill (H. R. 5222) for the relief of A. M. Anderson and others;

A bill (H. R. 3859) for the relief of the Sone & Fleming Manufacturing Company, Limited, of the city of New York;

A bill (H. R. 8956) for the relief of S. B. West, administrator of Thomas Becton, deceased;

A bill (H. R. 2611) for the relief of Joseph W. McClurg; and

A bill (H. R. 6491) for the relief of Lowman & Co.

It also announced the passage of the following House bills, with amendments in which concurrence was requested:

A bill (H. R. 3329) to regulate the subdivision of land within the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 10060) prescribing the times for the sales and for notice of sales of property in the District of Columbia for overdue taxes;

A bill (H. R. 2592) for the relief of Andrew Gleeson; and

A bill (H. R. 6783) to place the name of John A. Griffey on the pension-roll.

It also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 602) for the relief of James Millinger;

A bill (S. 1818) to grant to the town of Moscow, in Idaho Territory, certain lands for cemetery purposes;

A bill (S. 100) for the relief of Samuel Tate;

A bill (S. 2740) for the relief of the German Evangelical Church of Martinsburgh, W. Va.;

A bill (S. 3433) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to accept the surrender of and cancel land patents to Indians in certain cases;

A bill (S. 3328) for the relief of James Grace; and

A bill (S. 3168) regulating admission to the Institution of the Association for Works of Mercy in certain cases, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he contemplates calling up bills reported from the Court of Claims which have been occupying so much time of late. Our Friday sessions have been pretty generally consumed by them.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. There are none of those bills likely to come up which will create any such discussion as we have had lately. I can not tell exactly, but none of these claims will be called up except such, perhaps, as embrace small sums. The most of the claims that will be taken up are small claims belonging to soldiers in which members of the House feel a deep interest.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. LANHAM. I move to include in that also such bills as may be presented by the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER. It is not amendable by a motion. It is simply a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. LANHAM. Then I ask that that be included.

Mr. FORNEY. I wish to know if that will interfere with general appropriation bills?

The SPEAKER. Of course.

Mr. FORNEY. Then I object.

The SPEAKER. If the day is set apart immediately after the reading of the Journal, it will of course take precedence of appropriation bills, because the motion to proceed to the consideration of appropriation bills can only be made, except by unanimous consent, after the morning hour.

Mr. FORNEY. Then I object.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I would like to have that modified, so that we may have a day not to interfere with the appropriation bills.

Mr. FORNEY. I am willing that the gentleman shall have a day, but not to interfere with the Appropriations Committee.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Kentucky modifies his request that the day be set apart immediately after the morning hour, not to interfere with appropriation bills.

Mr. FORNEY. I have no objection to that.

Mr. WARNER. I shall have to object unless it is provided that it shall not interfere with the bill for the organization of the Territory of Oklahoma——

Mr. HOOKER. There comes in Oklahoma again, the most persistent bill I have ever known.

Mr. WARNER. A bill in which a half million of people are specially interested, and which is of vast importance to the whole country.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I am willing also to accept that bill to meet the views of the gentleman, but with the understanding that if that day is occupied by either of the bills of the Appropriations Committee, or the Oklahoma bill, that the War Claims Committee shall have the next day.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I think I shall have to object. The Committee on Commerce has not had a day, and has been refused its requests in that regard.

Mr. LANHAM. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the disposition of bills reported from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GROSVENOR. We have just passed a bill for the relief of the Catholic Church at Macon, Mo. There is another here on the Calendar for the relief of the Catholic Church at Chattanooga, about which there will be no contest, and I ask unanimous consent that it be taken up and considered now.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Texas demands the regular order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope the gentleman will allow this bill to be considered.

Mr. LANHAM. I will withdraw the demand for the regular order.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I withdraw my objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again state the request of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. CANNON. Let the order requested by the gentleman be a continuing order until he has his day. I think that will settle the difficulty.

Mr. BYNUM. I wish to object until a day is set apart for the Committee on Labor.

CATHOLIC CHURCH, CHATTANOOGA, TENN.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1073) for the relief of the Roman Catholic Church of St. Peter and St. Paul, at Chattanooga, Tenn., and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Rev. Patrick A. Feehan, Roman Catholic bishop of Nashville, or his successors in office, in trust for the use and benefit of the Roman Catholic Church of St. Peter and St. Paul at Chattanooga, Tenn., the sum of $18,729.09, in full for all the damages claimed by said last-named church, or any person heretofore or hereafter claiming or to claim to represent said church, for stone and all other building materials taken and used during the war between the States, of 1861 to 1865, by and under the military authority of the United States. And the acceptance of such sum by said bishop shall be a bar to any claim for any and all such property taken, or damages.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the report will be read.

The report (by Mr. HIESTAND) was read, as follows:

That the committee finds the facts of this case fully and accurately stated in Senate Report No. 497, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, which report the committee adopts as follows:

"That this claim is for compensation for a stone church building partly built and in process of construction, and for the materials on the ground for the completion of the same, taken by the proper military authorities, in September, 1863, and used partly in the construction of Fort Jones, and partly for culverts, curbing-stone, macadamizing for a magazine, for a wharf, guttering, well, etc. The church was commenced in 1854, and at the time the same was taken the walls were about half completed, and the stone for the remainder on the ground and at the quarry, some 15 or 20 rods from the building, mostly dressed, and ready to be laid up, the money and labor for the purpose having been furnished by the contributions of the members of the church. The materials consisted of variegated Tennessee marble, which were nicely cut, and many of them polished; each stone was cut to fit its own particular place in the building, and those for the doorway and arched openings highly and ornamentally wrought.

"Of course, therefore, after the stone had been used for the construction of the fort, and for culverts and other works, and broken so as to fit such work, they were nearly if not quite useless. It is shown beyond dispute that the materials, that is to say, all the body of the church except the mere foundation, and even a part of that, as well as the stone already got out and wrought ready for laying, were taken and used in the mode above stated by order of the proper engineer officers of the Army and other officers having the right to issue such orders.

"After the fort was no longer needed by the Army and Chattanooga was abandoned or about to be abandoned as a military post, in answer to the claim of the church for compensation, an offer was made by the proper military authorities to allow the church to take back the stone and other stone quarried by the Army and used in this fort and other works, which was declined; and your committee are of opinion that such privilege as was thus offered would have been but a mockery of just compensation. The stone in the fort was afterward sold on the part of the Government for some $500.

"In January, 1864, General Thomas ordered a military court of claims to estimate the damages then accrued to the claimants. They found the amount then to be $12,250; but the evidence shows that much of the material was taken and used in the same way after this finding.

"In 1866 this claim was presented, with the evidence in its support, in behalf of Rev. H. V. Brown, the then pastor of the church, to the War Department, with an itemized statement of the damages claimed, amounting to $27,783.96.

"On the 20th of September, 1867, the Inspector-General of the Army, at Louisville, Ky., General D. B. Sackett, was directed by the Secretary of War to make a full investigation of the case and the amount of damages. By his report it appears that he went to Chattanooga and made a full investigation. And in this report, dated October 28, 1867, he takes up the several items of the claim, and states the amount which he thinks ought to be deducted from such item as stated in the account of the claimant as presented, and comes to the conclusion that $9,054.87 should be deducted from the $27,783.96 claimed by the petitioner, leaving the balance $18,729.

"The report shows that the examination has been a very rigid one, and with a design carefully to protect the interests of the United States, and give them the benefit of all doubts.

"The report also shows that General Sackett, in making his estimate, placed his principal reliance upon Capt. James R. Slayton as an expert. And Captain Slayton, in a letter to General Hardie, dated June 6, 1868, states substantially that his estimates, as given to General Sackett, were given without any measurements; that he has since made such measurements, and upon a full reexamination he is satisfied that the whole amount claimed in petitioner's bill as presented to the Secretary of War would not put the church and the materials in as good condition as before they were taken for the use of the Army.

"Your committee are therefore satisfied that the sum found by General Sackett is none too high, if compensation is to be made at all. A fair estimate from the whole evidence in the case (of which there is a large amount by way of affidavits) would make the amount rather above than below the amount estimated by General Sackett, $18,729.09.

"As to the title to the lot on which the church was situated, and of the church itself, this was vested on the Roman Catholic bishop of Nashville, in accordance with the rules and usages of the church, for the purposes of convenient transmission, but really in trust for the benefit of the members and officers of this particular church of St. Peter and St. Paul, the Rev. Mr. Wheelan being such bishop at the time of the commencement of the church, and thence down to about the year 1862 or 1863, when he resigned, and the property was regularly conveyed to and vested in the present bishop November 27, 1866.

"As to the question of loyalty: the congregation by whose contributions the church was erected, or being erected, was mainly composed of laboring men, many of them employed by the railroad companies, and though some of them, on the breaking out of the war, sided with the rebellion and went into the Confederate army, the larger portion of them remained true to the Union, and many of them served in the Union Army.

"The Rev. J. T. Nealis was pastor of said church at the commencement of the war, and for some time after, and was so enthusiastically and outspokenly loyal that he was shot through the body by a rebel bushwhacker, from which he never recovered, but died in the beginning of the year 1865, from the effects of the wound. Rev. H. V. Brown, who succeeded him as pastor, we are satisfied, from the evidence, was also loyal.

"Bishop Wheelan was conspicuously a loyal man. The present bishop, Patrick A. Feehan, was a priest at St. Louis, Mo., of foreign birth, and not naturalized until the forepart of the year 1865, when he was admitted to citizenship, and took the oath of allegiance required on such occasions.

"It appears from the evidence that other church societies in Chattanooga, whose churches had been injured by being used by the Army, were paid by the Quartermaster's Department the following sums to put them in as good condition as before, namely: The Presbyterian church, $4,599.46; the Cumberland Presbyterian church, $2,450; the Protestant Episcopal church, $3,640. But this claim of the Catholic church was rejected because the property had been taken through the orders of the Engineer's Department, and did not, therefore, come within the law applicable to the other churches.

"Your committee are not disposed to deny this construction of the law, but upon sound principle they are unable to see why the latter case does not come within the principle calling for compensation as well as the former, and they are aware of no just or sound principle upon which such compensation should be refused. They therefore recommend the allowance of the claim to the amount of $18,729.09, as above stated; and that this amount be paid to the Catholic bishop of Nashville, in whose diocese the said church of St. Peter and St. Paul is included, and they report a bill accordingly and recommend its passage."

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it is a proper measure; I do not object to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEAL. This bill needs an amendment, Mr. Speaker. In the fifth and sixth lines the name "Patrick A. Feehan" should be stricken out and the name "Joseph Rademacher" substituted.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask a question touching this bill. I am not a member of the War Claims Committee, and am not as familiar with the rule adopted by the committee as applicable to these cases as the members who have presented these bills. I wish to ask if we have been paying this class of claims?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will state to my friend from Illinois that the churches at Chattanooga were all treated as loyal churches, and this one especially so. All of the other churches which were used and occupied by the Army during the war have received compensation, but the difference in this case is this: The Protestant churches were occupied for hospitals, and they were compensated in the sums reported there, paid by the Quartermaster's Department, but when this claim was presented to the Department, inasmuch as the material was taken and used by the Engineer Department for fortifications and other purposes, it did not come within the law authorizing the Quartermaster-General's Department to take cognizance of the claim and make compensation for it, and that is the reason that it comes here now.

Mr. CANNON. I understood that; but what I ask is not by way of antagonizing the bill, but to learn what the facts are and whether this would make a precedent under which we would be called upon to make compensation for all churches used in the South——

Mr. GROSVENOR. By no manner of means.

Mr. CANNON. For property taken or for destruction of church buildings.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not by any means. This property was in course of construction. It had never risen higher than the second story. There was a large amount of cut stone on hand ready for use. The Engineer Department, in constructing the forts and casemates, took this material and appropriated it to their own use. It became very valuable property and is estimated at $1,800.

Mr. McMILLIN. And General Thomas recognized this appropriation and had an estimate made of the value of the property taken.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose the church had been completed, or suppose that the church in the next county was standing, and it was necessary to take it down to be used in the construction of a fort, or it was destroyed during war, I ask the gentleman, is there any difference between such a case and this?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think there is a great deal of difference. In the first place, here was a loyal congregation, controlled by a loyal priest, who was afterwards shot by rebel bushwhackers. His congregation was loyal, and quite a number of them went into the Union Army, and it is simply a question of what is fair to them. The Government took their property and made it available for so much money-worth in the prosecution of the war.

Mr. CANNON. Could not the Government have taken it absolutely and used it for the purposes of the war?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think they could; but I know this case. I was there for nearly two years, and I say there was no more loyal man than the pastor of that church. A large part of the congregation entered the Union Army. It was not the ravages of war; but the property was appropriated. I should say that all the other churches of Chattanooga were to some extent affected by ravages of war.

We used them for hospital purposes, and there was shelling promiscuously through there, and every dollar of that damage was paid by the Quartermaster-General's Department. Here was property not at the time in the actual formation of a church, but it was taken possession of by the Government from loyal people and appropriated to the use of the Government. There can be no higher claim made, in my opinion, than this. These people at that time were poor, and I assume they are poor now.

Mr. CANNON. I am not antagonizing the claim. The gentleman has personal knowledge and is convinced that it is a proper bill to be passed, but I am asking if the gentleman can say whether this places the Government in a position of making a precedent by which we will in the future have to pay for all church property destroyed during the war.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am ready to defend ourselves from any charge of inconsistency.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Has this case ever been investigated before the Southern Claims Commission?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It was investigated by the Quartermaster-General's Department.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Has it ever been reported to previous Congresses?

Mr. HOUK. Oh, yes; it has been reported several times.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I think it is sufficient to any of the members of the old Army of the Cumberland to know that Colonel Sackett has passed upon this claim, for they all know that he is one of the most honorable of men, and also to know that Captain Slayton, of the Sixteenth Michigan Engineers, who was on the ground, should have passed upon it and knew the worth of the property and that it was used by the Government. We have also the report of the committee giving all the details and facts of the claim with the amount, and we have also the evidence, I may say, of officers who are members of Congress on this floor as to that property being used, because we saw it with our own eyes.

Whether it makes a precedent or not I want to say as an officer of that army, and of my own personal knowledge, that this is a just claim in every respect, and it would be a dishonor to the officers of that army not to pass this claim.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NEAL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES CALER.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2661) for the relief of James Caler.

The SPEAKER. This bill comes over from a previous session of the House.

Mr. BOWDEN. That bill was considered in Committee of the Whole, but when it was reported to the House the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE], who happened to be in a critical mood that evening, saw fit to demand the reading of the engrossed bill. Later, the gentleman sought to withdraw his objection, but an opportunity to do so was not afforded him before the House adjourned.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BOWDEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALFRED H. THOMAS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1067) to amend the war record of Alfred H. Thomas, deceased.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LANHAM move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALEXANDER MOFFITT.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6347) for the relief of Alexander Moffitt.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LANHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. BYNUM. I withdraw the objection which I made awhile ago to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE] that a day be fixed for the consideration of business reported from the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I shall have to renew it until the Committee on Labor and the Committee on Commerce are assigned days to make good those which they lost by the action of the House.

AGREEMENT WITH SHOSHONE AND BANNACK INDIANS.

Mr. PEEL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. 8662) to accept and ratify an agreement made with the Shoshone and Bannack Indians, for the surrender and relinquishment to the United States of a portion of the Fort Hall reservation, in the Territory of Idaho, for the purposes of a town site, and for the grant of a right of way through said reservation to the Utah and Northern Railway Company, and for other purposes, with the amendments of the Senate thereto, with the recommendation that the House non-concur in the Senate amendments and agree to a conference.

The amendments of the Senate were non-concurred in, the conference requested by the Senate was agreed to, and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. PEEL, Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi, and Mr. PERKINS.

RACHAEL BARNES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President; which was read, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 149, entitled "An act granting a pension to Rachael Barnes." The husband of this beneficiary served in the regular Army of the United States from February 24, 1838, to February 24, 1841.

In 1880 he applied for a pension, alleging that he contracted disease of the eyes during the year 1840 while serving in Florida. Pending the examination of his application and on the 24th day of March, 1882, he committed suicide by hanging. His widow filed a claim for pension, alleging that he died of insanity, the result of disease of the head and eyes. Her claim was rejected on the ground that his insanity forty-one years after discharge from the service had no connection with his military service. In July, 1886, a special act was passed granting a pension to the widow, which met with Executive disapproval. At the time the soldier committed suicide he was sixty-eight years old. Upon the facts, I hardly think insanity is claimed. At least there does not appear to be the least evidence of it unless it be the suicide itself. It is claimed, however, and with good reason, that he had become despondent on account of the delay in determining his application for a pension, and because he supposed that important evidence to establish his claim which he expected would not be forthcoming. It is very likely that this despondency existed, and that it so affected the mind of this old soldier that it led to his suicide. But the fact remains that he took his own life in a deliberate manner and that the affection of his eyes, which was the disability claimed, was not, in a proper sense, even the remote cause of his death.

I confess that I have endeavored to relieve myself from again interposing objections to the granting of a pension to this poor and aged widow. But I can not forget that age and poverty do not themselves justify gifts of public money, and it seems to me that the according of pensions is a serious business which ought to be regulated by principle and reason, though it may well be tempered with much liberality. I can find no principle or plausible pretext in this case which would not lead to granting a pension in any case of alleged disability arising from military service followed by suicide. It would be an unfair discrimination against many who, though in sad plight, have been refused relief in similar circumstances, and would establish an exceedingly troublesome and dangerous precedent.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 10, 1888.

SALLIE T. WARD.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message of the President of the United States; which, on motion of Mr. MORRILL, was referred, with the accompanying bill, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 8574, entitled "An act granting a pension to Sallie T. Ward, widow of the late W. T. Ward."

The husband of this beneficiary served about nine months in the Mexican war. He entered the service as a brigadier-general in 1861, and served through the war of the rebellion with credit, and was wounded in the left arm on the 15th day of May, 1864.

For this wound he was pensioned according to his rank, and received such pension until his death, at the age of seventy years, which occurred October 12, 1878.

The cause of his death was brain disease, and it seems not to be seriously claimed that it had any relation to his wound.

His widow is now in receipt of the pension provided for those of her class by the Mexican pension law.

If this bill becomes a law I am unable to see why in fairness and justice the widow of any officer of the grade of General Ward should not be allowed $50 a month, the amount proposed by this bill to be paid his widow, regardless of any other consideration except widowhood and the rank of the deceased husband.

The bill herewith returned, while fixing the monthly amount to be absolutely paid to the beneficiary, does not make the granting of the pension nor payment of the money subject to any of the provisions of the pension laws, nor make any reference to the Mexican service pension she is now receiving. While it is the rule under general laws that two pensions shall not be paid to the same person, inasmuch as the widow is entitled to the pension she is now receiving upon grounds different from those upon which the special bill was passed, and no intention is apparent in the special bill that the other pension should be superseded, it may result that under the peculiar wording of this bill she would be entitled to both pensions.

The beneficiary filed a claim for pension in the Pension Bureau in 1884, which is still pending awaiting evidence connecting the death of the soldier with his wound.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 10, 1888.

GEORGE W. PITNER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred, with the accompanying bill, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith return without approval House bill No. 490, entitled "An act granting a pension to George W. Pitner."

It appears from the records that the beneficiary named in this bill entered the military service in June, 1863, and was discharged in March, 1866. He was treated while in the Army in the months of December, 1864, and January, 1865, for conjunctivitis.

He filed a claim for pension in 1886 alleging that he had a sunstroke in 1865, and that while at work in a basement in the year 1881 he fell into a well which was open near him and received serious injuries, resulting in the amputation of his right foot and also disability of his left foot. He attributes his fall to vertigo, consequent upon or related to the sunstroke he suffered in the Army.

The claim was rejected on the ground that the evidence taken failed to connect the disabilities for which a pension was claimed with army service.

Whatever may be said of the incurrence of sunstroke in the Army, though he fixes it as after the date of his only medical treatment during his service, and whatever may be said of the continuance of vertigo consequent upon the sunstroke for sixteen years, I find no proof that at the time he fell he was afflicted with vertigo, unless it be his own statement; and whatever disability naturally arose from sunstroke does not appear by him to have been deemed sufficient to induce him to apply for a pension previous to his fall.

In any event there seems to be no satisfactory evidence that anything which occurred in his army service was the cause of his fall and consequent injury.

LYDIA A. HEINY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred, with the accompanying bill, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 9034, entitled "An act granting a pension to Lydia A. Heiny."

The husband of this beneficiary served in an Indiana regiment from August, 1861, to March, 1864, when he re-enlisted as a veteran volunteer and served as a private and teamster to July 20, 1865, when he was discharged.

There is no record of any disability, and he never applied for a pension.

On the 12th day of December, 1880, in leaving a barber shop at the place where he resided, he fell downstairs and died the next day from the injuries thus received.

His widow filed an application for a pension in the year 1885, alleging that her husband contracted indigestion, bronchitis, nervous debility, and throat disease in the Army, which were the cause of his death.

The claim was rejected upon the ground that the death of the soldier was not due to an injury connected with his military service.

While there has been considerable evidence presented tending to show that the deceased had a throat difficulty which might have resulted from Army exposure, the allegation or the presumption that it caused his fatal fall, it seems to me, is entirely unwarranted.

JAMES C. WHITE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred, with the accompanying bill, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 9344, entitled "An act granting a pension to James C. White."

The records of the War Department show that this beneficiary enlisted in a Kentucky regiment September 29, 1861. On the muster-roll of April 30, 1862, he is reported as absent. On the roll of August 31, 1863, he is mentioned as having deserted July 19, 1862. His name is not borne on subsequent muster-rolls until it appears upon those of January and February, 1864, with the remark that he returned February, 1864, and that all pay and allowances were to be stopped from July 19, 1862, to February 5, 1864. It appears that he deserted again on the 18th of December, 1864, and that his name was not borne upon any subsequent rolls.

Naturally enough, there does not appear to be any record of this soldier's honorable discharge.

It seems that this man, during the time that he professed to be in the service, earned two records of desertion, the first extending over a period of nearly a year and a half and the other terminating his military service.

He filed a claim for pension on the 4th day of August, 1883, alleging that he contracted piles in December, 1861, and a hernia in April, 1862.

A medical examination in 1883 revealed the non-existence of piles and the presence of hernia.

The fact of the incurrence of any disability at all in the service is not satisfactorily established, and the entire case in all its phases appears to be devoid of merit.

WILLIAM P. RIDDLE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred, with the accompanying bill, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 9183, entitled "An act granting a pension to William P. Riddle."

The records of the War Department show that the beneficiary named in this bill was enrolled October 4, 1861, in the Fifth Kentucky Regiment of Cavalry, and was mustered into the service on the 31st day of March, 1862.

From that time to April 30, 1862, he is reported absent, sick. On the rolls for four months thereafter, ending August 31, 1862, he is reported as absent and deserted. His name is not borne on any subsequent rolls.

He did not file an application for pension until April, 1879, when the act granting arrears was in force. He then claimed that he contracted pneumonia February 15, 1862; that about a month after he was sent home, and was under medical treatment for two years; that he returned about May 1, 1864, and was discharged about May 15, 1864, but that his discharge papers were lost.

Though he has furnished some evidence in support of the claim that he was sick at about the time alleged, and that he returned to the Army after an absence of two years, no record proof of any kind is furnished of an honorable discharge at any time.

He has been informed that the record of his desertion in the War Department will be investigated with a view to its correction if he will furnish direct proof that it is erroneous. No such proof has been supplied and the case has not been finally acted upon in the Pension Bureau.

It does not seem to me that this case in its present condition should receive favorable consideration.

MRS. CAROLINE G. SEYFFORTH.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred, with the accompanying bill, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 9126 entitled "An act granting a pension to Mrs. Caroline G. Seyfforth."

The husband of this beneficiary served as contract surgeon in the United States Army from September 12, 1862, to August 17, 1865, and was stationed at Portsmouth Grove Hospital in Rhode Island.

He never filed a claim for pension and died July 21, 1874, of congestion of the liver. His widow filed an application for pension in 1882, alleging that her husband's death was caused by blood poisoning contracted while dressing the wound of a patient in January, 1863. There is proof that he suffered from blood poisoning.

The record of death states its cause as congestion of the liver, but the certificate was not signed. A young doctor named Adams, a friend and pupil of the deceased, seems to have been more than any other the attendant physician, but he appeared to think that one of three other doctors had actual charge of the case. These physicians, named respectively Sullivan, Dana, and Sargent, agreed that Adams had charge of the case, and that they were consulting surgeons in the last illness.

Dr. Adams testified before a special examiner that from intimate association he knew that the deceased was subject to kidney disease and other symptoms of bad health from discharge to his death; that as he had lost a part of one hand from blood poisoning in the Army he always supposed his subsequent troubles were referable to that cause; that he believed the cause of death was albuminuria, and that his liver was also affected. He further expresses the opinion that the death was the culmination of the disorders which affected him from the time of his discharge from the service.

Dr. Sullivan deposed that he knew the deceased well from about 1869, and never had any reason to think him the subject of blood poisoning or its results. He further says that he was called in consultation at the last illness of the deceased and diagnosed his trouble as liver disease, due to the patient's habits of intemperance.

Doctor Dana testified that he knew the deceased well from the time of his discharge; that he was called to consult in his case with young Doctor Adams a few days before the death occurred; that he took a general view of the case and considered that the trouble was due to habits of intemperance.

Doctor Sargent deposed that he knew the deceased well and knew that he had lost a part of his hand as alleged from septic poisoning in the Army, though he was not aware that the poisoning had left any other effect; that the deceased had several spells of alcoholism after the war; that he had heard him complain of his kidneys, but attributed his troubles to his excesses.

Other evidence suggested the same cause for sickness and death spoken of by these physicians, but there seems to be an almost entire absence of evidence connecting the death with service in the Army.

I am of the opinion that a case is not presented in any of its aspects justifying a pension.

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 6193, entitled "An act for the relief of Edson Saxberry."

The beneficiary named in this bill filed a declaration for a pension in 1879, alleging that in 1863 he bruised his leg, which became very sore, and when it began to heal his eyes became sore.

The evidence taken upon a careful examination of this application seems to establish, by the admission of the applicant and by other evidence, the correctness of the position taken by the Pension Bureau in rejecting the claim, that whatever disability was incurred existed before enlistment and was in no manner attributable to military service.

BERNARD CARLAN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred, with the accompanying bill, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 2233 entitled "An act granting a pension to Bernard Carlin."

By this bill it is proposed to pension the beneficiary therein named as of Company A, Fourteenth Regiment of Missouri Volunteer Infantry.

It seems that he served in the company and regiment named, but that he also served in Company A, Sixty-sixth Illinois Regiment, and it is claimed that while in the latter service exclusively he received the injuries for which a pension is claimed.

His application is still pending in the Pension Bureau, and the papers pertaining to the same are now in the hands of an examiner for special examination.

I think this should be completed before a special act is passed, and I understand this to be in accordance with a general rule adopted by Congress and its pension committees. This is certainly the correct course to be pursued in this case, in view of the failure to state in the special bill the regiment and company to which the soldier belonged at the time of the incurrence of disability. This can be corrected by the Pension Bureau if the claim is found meritorious.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, August 10, 1888.

WATER-RESERVE LANDS OF WISCONSIN.

Mr. GROSVENOR, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD the following:

An act (S. 1880) declaring that certain water-reserve lands in the State of Wisconsin are and have been subject to the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States," approved March 3, 1875.

Be it enacted, etc., That all lands in the State of Wisconsin described in and withdrawn from sale by the proclamations of the President of the United States issued March 22, 1880, April 5, 1881, and November 28, 1881, for the reason that said lands would be required for or subject to flowage in the construction of dams, reservoirs, and other works proposed to be erected for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River and certain of its tributaries, be, and the same are hereby, declared to be, and to have been at all times heretofore, subject to the provisions of a certain act of Congress, entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States," approved March 3, 1875, as fully, effectually, and to the same extent as though said lands had not been described in said proclamations, or withdrawn from sale thereby, but had remained with the body of public lands subject to private entry and sale: Provided, however, That any and all parts of said lands acquired by any railroad company under said act of Congress shall at all times be subject to the right of flowage which at any time may become necessary in the construction or maintenance of dams, reservoirs, or other works which may be constructed or erected by or under the authority of the United States for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River or its tributaries: Provided further, That the railroad companies availing themselves of this act shall, in addition to filing the maps now required by law to be filed, also file maps of definite location of their proposed lines of railroad, over said water-reserve lands, in the office of the Secretary of War, and until the approval of said maps by the Secretary of War no right to occupy said lands shall vest in such companies; and no location shall be permitted which takes for right of way or stations lands needed for the use of the present reservoir system, or in the construction of dams or other works, or any proposed or probable extension of the same, or which will obstruct or increase the cost of the present or prospective reservoir system; or shall any railroad company be permitted to take material for construction from any of said reservoir lands outside the right of way granted herein.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1880) declaring that certain water-reserve lands in the State of Wisconsin are and have been subject to the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands," submit the following report:

Section 5 of "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States," approved March 3, 1885, provides—

"That this act shall not apply to any lands within the limits of any military park or Indian reservation, or other lands specially reserved from sale, unless such right of way shall be provided for by treaty stipulation or by act of Congress heretofore passed."

The lands referred to in this bill were withdrawn from sale by Executive orders and proclamations, dated, respectively, March 22, 1880, April 5, 1881, and November 28, 1881, for the reason that they or portions of them might be required for use and flowage in the construction of dams, reservoirs, and other works proposed to be erected for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River and certain of its tributaries. The purpose of this bill is to declare the lands so reserved subject, with certain restrictions and conditions named, to the provisions of the act of March 3, 1885, notwithstanding the exceptions made by section 5 of said act, above recited.

The public works for the use and benefit of which these lands were withdrawn from sale being under the supervision and direction of the Secretary of War, the bill has been made to conform to his recommendation, it having been referred to him by the committee of the Senate having charge of the same.

No provision has yet been made for the construction of any of the works within the State of Wisconsin contemplated by the withdrawal of these lands, but in the event of such construction no interference or additional cost will be incurred by reason of this bill.

Your committee therefore report the same back, with the recommendation that it be concurred in.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, April 7, 1888.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 17th ultimo, inclosing copy of a letter of the 12th ultimo from the General Land Office, requesting the opinion of this Department on the proposed Senate bill 1880, Fiftieth Congress, first session, to declare that certain water-reserve lands in the State of Wisconsin are and have been subject to the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States," approved March 3, 1875, I have the honor to invite attention to the inclosed report of the 5th instant, and its accompanying paper, from the Chief of Engineers on the subject, in whose views the Department concurs.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., April 5, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith the communication of March 17, 1888, from the Department of the Interior, referred to this office, inviting attention to the provisions of Senate bill 1880, Fiftieth Congress, first session, and to the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office thereon, and in reply to submit a copy of a report from Maj. C. J. Allen, Corps of Engineers, to whom the letter from the General Land Office was referred.

Upon consideration it is believed that the danger of interference with any plans or estimates of the War Department for reservoirs might be averted or lessened by the addition of the following after line 28 of the bill:

"And provided further, That the said railroads shall file maps with the Secretary of War, for his approval, showing the location of the proposed lines of railroads, and of such portions of the said public lands intended to be used for station or other purposes, in order that reservoir system now in operation or its proposed extension may not be obstructed or its construction or cost of maintenance increased."

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. C. DUANE,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers.

Hon. WM. C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, April 14, 1888.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of February 11, transmitting Senate bill No. 1880, "declaring that certain water reserve lands in the State of Wisconsin are and have been subject to the provisions of the act of Congress entitled 'An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States,' approved March 3, 1875," upon which you request the views of this Department.

Said bill was referred to the Commissioner of the General Land Office for report thereon, who suggested that as the plans and estimates of the officers of the War Department having charge and control over the construction of dams, reservoirs, and other works for the improvement of the Mississippi River, might be interfered with by the provisions of said bill, it should be referred to the War Department for its opinion thereon.

In accordance with said suggestion, I referred said bill with the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the Secretary of War, whose report, together with the report of the Chief of Engineers, the report of Maj. C. J. Allen, of the Corps of Engineers, and the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, is herewith transmitted.

I have no other suggestion to make than is contained in said reports.

Very respectfully,

WM. F. VILAS, Secretary.

Hon. P. B. PLUMB,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands, United States Senate.

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
St. Paul, Minn., March 28, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to report as follows upon Senate bill No. 1880, Fiftieth Congress, first session, in reference to certain "water reserve" lands in the State of Wisconsin, which bill, with other papers, has been referred to me by first indorsement, office Chief of Engineers, United States Army, March 23, 1888.

The lands are referred to in the bill as withdrawn from sale by proclamations of the President of the United States issued March 22, 1880, April 5, 1881, and November 28, 1881. The last-named proclamation (November 28, 1881), however, deals only with lands in Minnesota, and it is presumed that proclamation dated February 20, 1882 (a copy of which proclamation is one of the papers referred to me by first indorsement), was intended instead of proclamation dated November 28, 1881.

The lands withdrawn by the proclamations are those liable to overflow or injury from the construction of dams or create reservoirs to serve as aids to navigation, and the proclamations were issued subsequent to, and as the result of, appropriations made by acts of Congress approved June 18, 1878, March 3, 1879, June 14, 1880, and March 3, 1881, for surveys and examinations for and construction of reservoirs at the headwaters of the Mississippi, St. Croix, Chippewa, and Wisconsin Rivers.

The bill proposes to enact that all lands in the State of Wisconsin withdrawn from sale by proclamations of the President, for the reason that they would be required for or subject to flowage in the construction of dams, reservoirs, and other works proposed to be erected for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River and certain of its tributaries, be, and be declared to have been at all times heretofore, subject to the provisions of an act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States, approved March 3, 1875, and to the same extent as though said lands had not been described in said proclamations or withdrawn from sale thereby, but had remained with the body of public lands subject to private entry and sale.

The bill closes with an important proviso, namely:

"Provided, however, That any and all parts of said lands acquired by any railroad company under said act of Congress shall at all times be subject to the right of flowage which at any time may become necessary in the construction or maintenance of dams, reservoirs, or other works which may be constructed or erected by or under the authority of the United States for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River or its tributaries."

The report of the Acting Commissioner of the General Land Office to the Secretary of the Interior, March 12, 1888 (one of the papers referred to me by first indorsement), and which explains the situation so fully that but little remains to be added, states:

"The act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat., 482), grants to railroad companies the right of way through the public lands of the United States which have not been specially reserved from sale to the extent of 100 feet in width on each side of their roads; also the right to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of the road, material, earth, stone, and timber necessary for the construction of the road, and also grounds adjacent to the right of way necessary for station purposes.

"As the bill under consideration proposes to extend the provisions of the act of 1875 to the lands in question as fully and to the same extent as though they had not been reserved from sale, reserving only the right of flowage, it follows that railroad companies claiming the benefits of the act of 1875, may, in the event of its passage, acquire not only a right of way through such lands, but also the right to occupy portions of the same for station purposes and the right to take timber and other material therefrom for the construction of their roads.

"It is evident from correspondence with the War Department on file in this office that in many instances the existence of timber, stone, and other material upon the reserved lands governed to a considerable extent that Department's estimates of the cost of constructing the dams and other works contemplated by the act of Congress above mentioned.

"The passage of the bill under consideration, at least so far as it grants the right to timber and other material, might therefore seriously interfere with the plans and estimates of the officers of the War Department having charge and control of the proposed improvements."

The estimates by the engineers under the War Department of the cost of constructing the dams were based more or less upon the prospect of being able to appropriate for such work timber, stone, clay, etc., existing upon the lands that would be withdrawn from market and assigned for reservoir purposes. Should these materials be taken by railroads, the cost of reservoir dams in Wisconsin, if any such are to be built in that State, would undoubtedly be increased over the original estimates, though to what extent can only be determined by examinations in detail.

As to where projected railroads may run through the lands in question, this office can not, in the absence of any information upon the subject, even conjecture.

I do not know what the wishes of Congress may be as regards extension of the reservoir system into Wisconsin. But it does not appear that injury would accrue to the reservoir project were the bill to become a law with proviso retained as now expressed, and an additional proviso inserted prohibiting the use, excepting for reservoir purposes, of the rock, field-stone, and timber existing on the withdrawn lands, and further prohibiting the occupation by any railroad company or corporation, or any person whatsoever, of any of the withdrawn lands that may be needed for the sites of reservoir dams, their approaches and accessories.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHAS. J. ALLEN,
Major of Engineers.

The CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, United States Army.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 12, 1888.

SIR: I am in receipt, through reference by the Department for report, of a letter dated the 11th ultimo, from Hon. P. B. PLUMB, chairman of the Senate Committee on Public Lands, inclosing a copy of Senate bill 1880, declaring certain water-reserve lands in the State of Wisconsin subject to the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1875, granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States, and requesting the views of this Department thereon.

In reply, I have the honor to report as follows:

The bill in question proposes to declare that all the lands in the State of Wisconsin described in and withdrawn from sale by the proclamations of the President, issued March 22, 1880, and April 5 and November 28, 1881, are, and have been at all times, subject to the provisions of the act of March 3, 1875, as fully, effectually, and to the same extent as though said lands had not been withdrawn. It provided, however, that any lands acquired by any railroad company under the provisions of said bill shall at all times be subject to the right of flowage which may at any time become necessary in the construction or maintenance of dams, reservoirs, or other works erected under the authority of the United States for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River or its tributaries.

The proclamations referred to in said bill (copies herewith) were issued by the President in view of the acts of Congress approved June 18, 1878, March 3, 1879, June 14, 1880, and March 3, 1881, making appropriations for an examination and survey of the sources of the Mississippi River, and certain of its tributaries in the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota, and for the construction of reservoirs upon the headwaters of said rivers for the purpose of improving the navigation of the same.

Said proclamations withdrew from sale and disposal a large number of tracts of land scattered through Northern Wisconsin and Minnesota, which had been designated by the United States engineer having charge of the survey provided for in the acts above mentioned and reported to the Secretary of War.

The act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat., 482), grants to railroad companies the right of way through the public lands of the United States which have not been specially reserved from sale, to the extent of 100 feet in width on each side of their roads; also the right to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of the road, material, earth, stone, and timber necessary for the construction of the road, and also grounds adjacent to the right of way necessary for station purposes.

As the bill under consideration proposes to extend the provisions of the act of 1875 to the lands in question as fully and to the same extent as though they had not been reserved from sale, reserving only the right of flowage, it follows that railroad companies claiming the benefits of the act of 1875 may in the event of its passage acquire not only a right of way through such lands, but also the right to occupy portions of the same for station purposes, and the right to take timber and other materialthere from for the construction of their roads.

It is evident from correspondence with the War Department on file in this office that in many instances the existence of timber, stone, and other material upon the reserved lands governed to a considerable extent that Department's estimates of the cost of constructing the dams and other works contemplated by the acts of Congress above mentioned.

The passage of the bill under consideration, at least so far as it grants the right to timber and other material, might therefore seriously interfere with the plans and estimates of the officers of the War Department having charge and control of the proposed improvements.

As to this, and also as to how far the construction of railroads through the lands in question might interfere with the proposed improvements, this office is not in a position to speak. I therefore respectfully suggest that the bill in question be referred to the War Department for its opinion thereon.

Mr. PLUMB's letter and the bill are herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

S. M. STOCKSLAGER,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. WM. F. VILAS,
Secretary of the Interior.

PROCLAMATION BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES WITHDRAWING FROM SALE OR DISPOSAL CERTAIN LANDS IN THE STATES OF WISCONSIN AND MINNESOTA.

Whereas by the provisions of the second section of an act of Congress entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved June 18, 1878, the Secretary of War was directed to cause "an examination" to be made "of the sources of the Mississippi River and of the St. Croix River in Wisconsin and Minnesota, and of the Chippewa and Wisconsin Rivers in the State of Wisconsin, to determine the practicability and cost of creating and maintaining reservoirs upon the headwaters of said rivers and their tributaries for the purpose of regulating the volume of water and improving the navigation of said rivers and that of the Mississippi River, and an estimate of the damage to result therefrom to property of any kind," and by the provisions of the acts of March 3, 1879, June 14, 1880, and March 3, 1881, appropriation was made for the completion of the survey above referred to and the construction of said reservoirs; and

Whereas it appears by the report of the United States Engineer having in charge the survey provided for by said act, which report was made to the Secretary of War, and dated St. Paul, Minn., June 12, 1880, that certain vacant public lands of the United States in the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota will be affected in the event of affirmative Congressional action upon said matter, and which action by the appropriations aforesaid has now been taken: Therefore,

I, James A. Garfield, President of the United States, do hereby direct that the following described public lands in the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota, being lands referred to in said report, be withheld from sale or disposal under the various acts for the sale and disposal of the public lands:

TAYLOR'S FALLS, MINN., LAND DISTRICT.

Parts of sections.	S.	T.	R.	Remarks.
SE. ¼ NE. ¼	22	40	19	West of fourth principal meridian.

Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, this 5th day of April, A. D. 1881.

JAMES A. GARFIELD.

By the President:
C. W. HOLCOMB,
Acting Commissioner General Land Office.

NOTICE TO CLAIMANTS.

All valid entries and filings of or upon lands embraced in the foregoing list which may have been made at the respective local land offices prior to the date of this proclamation of withdrawal, will not be affected by the same.

C. W. HOLCOMB,
Acting Commissioner General Land Office.

HUDSON G. LAMKIN.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to have taken up and passed at this time a bill on behalf of a Union soldier, which involves only $125, and which has been pending a long time.

The bill (H. R. 9464) for the relief of Hudson G. Lamkin was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Hudson G. Lamkin, of Dearborn County, Indiana, late a private in Company D, Third Regiment of Indiana Volunteer Cavalry, the sum of $115, for a horse belonging to him and lost in the service of the United States in the late war.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have a bill for the benefit of a Union soldier which I would also like to have considered. I do not object to the bill of the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize gentlemen in their order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Since this bill was reported to the House I have received a communication from the Quartermaster-General stating that the value of this horse lost in the service of the United States was $125, instead of $115. I desire, therefore, that the bill be amended accordingly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have been seeking for six months to get recognition for a bill, which I hold in my hand, for the benefit of a Union soldier.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] for the present consideration of this bill? The Chair hears none.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendment of Mr. HOLMAN to strike out "fifteen," in line 6, and insert "twenty-five," so as to make the amount $125, was read and agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM COLLINS.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I ask, by unanimous consent, that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 793) for the relief of William Collins, and the same be considered at this time in the House.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the Treasury, from any moneys not otherwise appropriated, to William Collins the sum of $240 for a fishery bounty due him as master of the fishing-schooner Sarah Franklin, hailing from Castine, Me.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out in lines 5 and 6 the words "two hundred and forty dollars," and insert in lieu thereof the words "one hundred and sixty-seven dollars and eighty cents."

The report of the committee (by Mr. LANHAM) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims have considered House bill No. 793, for the relief of William Collins, and recommend that it do pass with the following amendment: Strike out the words "two hundred and forty dollars" and insert "one hundred and sixty-seven dollars and eighty cents" instead.

This claim was considered in the last Congress by the Committee on Claims, and the following facts were found:

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1030) for the relief of William Collins, submit the following report:

"The committee find that on the 7th day of April, 1866, William Collins, a citizen of the United States and the State of Maine, took out a license to be employed in cod-fishing, as owner and master of the schooner Sarah Franklin, burden 41.95 tons. At that time, by virtue of existing laws, a bounty of $4 per ton was allowed and paid to vessels of the class of the Sarah Franklin engaged in cod-fishing during a period of four months within the year. While said Collins was engaged in cod-fishing, the laws relating to fishing bounty were repealed (act July 28, 1866, section 4), and Collins was never paid the bounty to which he was entitled, although he completed the full period of four months' cod-fishing within the time which the law prescribed."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to discharging the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of this bill and amendment?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Is it in order, if we do not object, to move an amendment to cover another case?

The SPEAKER. One private bill can not be amended to include another.

There was no objection; and the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the further consideration of the bill and amendment.

The amendment of the Committee on Claims was adopted, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LANHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

J. S. FLAKE.

Mr. ENLOE. I move, by unanimous consent, that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1029) for the relief of J. S. Flake, guardian of Samuel Howard.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $150 to James S. Flake, guardian of Samuel Howard (a lunatic), of Henderson County, Tennessee, the same being for quartermaster's stores, consisting of one horse, taken from the said Howard and appropriated by the military forces of the United States.

The report of the Committee on War Claims (by Mr. WILKINSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1029) for the relief of J. S. Flake, guardian of Samuel Howard, submit the following report:

The Committee on War Claims having examined the proof in this case find that claimant, who is guardian for Samuel Howard, a lunatic, filed his claim before the Quartermaster-General under the act of July 4, 1864, and the claim was examined by the special agent of the Government, the taking and use of the property, a horse, was proven, the loyalty of the claimant was established, and the claim was allowed by the Quartermaster-General, fixing the amount at $100. After the claim was allowed it was discovered that the claimant was barred by the act of March 3, 1879, and the allowance was withdrawn and the claim was rejected on that ground.

The committee think that no advantage should be taken of a lunatic because of the failure to file the claim in time to escape the bar, and therefore recommend that the bill be amended by striking out $150 and inserting $100, and that the bill so amended do pass.

There was no objection; and the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on War Claims was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ENLOE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Some time ago I objected to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE], and I would like to know whether I have not the right to withdraw the objection at any time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to withdraw it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE] that Wednesday next after the reading of the Journal be devoted to the consideration of reports from the Committee on War Claims, and if that day be not occupied to be a continuing order until one day has been occupied?

Mr. SAYERS. I object.

PUBLIC BUILDING, CHESTER, PA.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I ask, by unanimous consent, to call up for consideration at this time a bill (S. 129) for the erection of a public building at Chester, Pa.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase, or otherwise procure, a suitable site, and cause to be erected thereon, at Chester, in the State of Pennsylvania, a substantial and commodious public building for the use of the United States post-office and internal-revenue and other Government offices: Provided, That no money appropriated for said building shall be expended until a valid title to the site selected (which site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of at least 50 feet, including streets and alleys) shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Pennsylvania shall have ceded jurisdiction over the same for all purposes, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, except for the enforcement of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein. The plans and estimates for said building shall first be prepared, examined, and approved as required by section 3734 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and the ultimate cost shall not exceed the sum of $75,000, which sum is hereby appropriated for the same out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House take a recess.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to taking up the bill indicated for consideration at this time?

Mr. SPRINGER. The recognition of the gentleman from Michigan was objected to and the recognition of another gentleman from another district was objected to, and I think there should be some system adopted in this matter.

The SPEAKER. The system of the Chair is to endeavor to act fairly between the two sides of the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. One gentleman has received two recognitions, although not from the present occupant of the chair, while others have not received any at all.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The House divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 37.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. OATES. I demand the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand tellers on the motion to take a recess.

Tellers were not ordered, only 15 voting in favor of the demand, which was not a sufficient number.

So the House refused to take a recess.

Mr. OATES. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. TARSNEY. I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not entertain a request for unanimous consent when the regular order of business is demanded.

Mr. HOOKER. I want to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD——

The SPEAKER. But the regular order is demanded; and the Chair can not recognize any gentleman to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. OATES. I will withdraw the demand for the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. And I renew it; but yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER], who wants to have published an article in the RECORD from one of the reports on a bill considered to-day.

Mr. BINGHAM. That will not do. If the regular order is demanded let us proceed with it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded, and the Chair will proceed with the bill now in the hands of the Clerk.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has asked unanimous consent to consider a bill which has been read and is now before the House. Is there objection?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not make the point of order upon an amendment I wish to offer to his bill, I shall not object to it. I want to move an amendment to provide for the erection of a public building in Illinois. I have been trying for some time to secure its consideration, without avail.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I have no objection, if the House is willing.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SPRINGER. I object.

Mr. DOCKERY. I move that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock.

Mr. HOOKER. I hope the House will vote that motion down.

The question was taken; and the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to prevail.

Mr. CHEADLE. I demand a division.

The House proceeded to divide.

Mr. CHEADLE. I withdraw the demand for a division.

So (no further count being demanded) the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House (at 8 o'clock p. m.) was called to order by Mr. MCMILLIN, who directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, August 10, 1888.

Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN is hereby designated to preside as Speaker pro tempore at this evening's session of the House.

JOHN G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar under the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole under the special order.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that each gentleman present may be recognized and allowed to call up one bill this evening. I have been trying to arrange matters to the satisfaction of all persons present, and believe this plan will meet with no objection.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have been here every Friday evening for two months trying to get up certain pension bills in which I am personally interested. They are now just at that point on the Calendar where we left off business before. I will not, however, object to the request of the gentleman from Indiana if it is the desire of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

WILLIAM KELSEY.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill (S. 2106) granting a pension to William Kelsey.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Kelsey, late of Company G, Sixth Regiment Kansas Volunteer Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2106) granting a pension to William Kelsey, submit the following report:

William Kelsey, the claimant in this case, has served in the armies of the United States as follows: From September 1, 1847, to September 28, 1848, as a private in Captain Griffin's Company A, Gilpen's Indian Battalion Missouri Mounted Volunteers, and from November 5, 1861, to December 29, 1863, as a private in Company G, Sixth Regiment Kansas Volunteer Cavalry, in the war of the rebellion.

On August 9, 1878, he made application for pension, alleging as the basis of his claim that he contracted, about November 1, 1862, at Cove Creek, Arkansas, sciatic neuralgia, and about December 20, 1862, in the general hospital at Fort Scott, Kans., erysipelas.

The claim for sciatic neuralgia was allowed and the claimant pensioned at the rate of $4 per month. The claim for erysipelas was rejected June 23, 1885, on the ground that there was "no evidence of existence of disability, in a pensionable degree, at any time since discharge."

The certificate of disability on which the claimant was discharged states "that he is unfit for the performance of the duties of a soldier because of neuralgia and erysipelas." Prior soundness is established; origin in the service is admitted. As to continuance, Dr. Thomas Donaho swears that he was his family physician from 1858 to 1867. * * * Treated him after his discharge for neuralgia and erysipelas. His neighbors, whose reputations for veracity are unquestioned, swear to an intimate acquaintance with claimant. * * * That after his discharge in 1863 he has suffered with neuralgia and erysipelas. * * * In 1865, and again in 1869, he was confined to his house and bed by neuralgia and erysipelas, the latter lasting nearly four years. * * * Also in 1876 for about five months. * * * Has suffered almost continuously since 1863, and is unable to perform manual labor of any kind.

Claimant is now receiving $6 per month. Your committee feel that, taking into account his faithful service in the Mexican war, for which he is receiving no pension, his great age, his inability to perform any manual labor, and his destitute circumstances, his pension is inadequate, and therefore recommend that the bill be amended by adding "and pay him a pension of $14 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving," and that the bill so amended do pass.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FIDEL GATES.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 10906) granting a pension to Fidel Gates.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Fidel Gates, late a private in Company G, Ninety-third Regiment Indiana Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10906) granting a pension to Fidel Gates, have considered the same, and now report:

Claimant enlisted August 28, 1862, and was discharged January 7, 1863. In declaration filed January 18, 1869, he alleges that he contracted sore eyes about one month before his discharge, and was also affected with enlargement of the spleen. After a special examination the claim was rejected October 3, 1884, on the ground that disease of eyes existed prior to enlistment, and that malarial poisoning, causing disease of spleen, also existed before enlistment.

After a careful examination of this case we are of the opinion that the evidence substantiates prior soundness, and that the disabilities alleged were incurred in the Army and in line of duty, as stated in his application. The claimant presents a case that appeals strongly to the sympathies. He has been totally blind since 1872 and dependent upon the charity of his friends for support, and, believing that his claim is a just one and has been fully proven, we submit a favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HANNAH L. IRWIN.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I ask to call up the bill (H. R. 10418) granting a pension to Hannah L. Irwin.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Hannah L. Irwin, widow of Cyrus E. Irwin, deceased, late of Company D, Thirteenth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteer Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10418) granting a pension to Hannah L. Irwin, having considered the same, report as follows:

Cyrus E. Irwin, the husband of the claimant, was a sergeant of Company D, Thirteenth Regiment of Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers. He enlisted July 22, 1862, was discharged May 29, 1865, and died December 18, 1886. On the 26th of February, 1863, in a fight with the enemy at Woodstock, Va., he received a gunshot wound in the back, on account of which he applied for a pension on the 2d day of February, 1883, and on the 5th day of May, 1885, a pension was granted to him, and was thereafter paid to him until his death. He left the claimant, his widow, and four children under sixteen years of age.

Claimant, on behalf of herself and children, applied for a pension December 18, 1886, but on July 23, 1887, her application was rejected on the ground that the soldier's death was not due to his military service. The case before the Pension Office turned upon the question whether or not the soldier's death was caused by the wound in the back. The immediate cause of the soldier's death war uræmic poisoning. He was attended in his last illness by Dr. David Coleman and Dr. W. K. Coleman, two able physicians and surgeons of West Union, Ohio, who unite in saying that the gunshot wound in the back was the exciting cause of the death, and they are corroborated by Dr. G. W. Osborn, who had treated him during the year preceding his death. And they are also corroborated by the report of Dr. Nelson B. Lafferty, examining surgeon; by the report of Drs. Davidson, Bing, and Kline, board of examining surgeons at Portsmouth, Ohio; by the report of Drs. Cartmel and Pickett, of the board of examining surgeons at Maysville, Ky.; and by the report of Drs. Brum and W. K. Coleman, of the board of examining surgeons at West Union, Ohio.

The claim was approved in the Pension Office by the examiner, the legal reviewer, and the rereviewer, but was rejected by the Commissioner upon the opinion of the medical referee. Upon the evidence we are clearly of the opinion that the gunshot wound was the exciting cause of the soldier's death, but in any event we would give the widow of this soldier the benefit of all doubts.

We append herewith the statement made in the case by Dr. W. K. Coleman, one of the examining surgeons of the board at West Union, Ohio, and recommend the passage of the bill.

EXHIBIT.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., January 17, 1883.

SIR: In the claim for pension, No. 318489, of Mrs. Hannah L. Irwin, widow of Cyrus E. Irwin, late of Company D, Thirteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry, it appears that you treated said soldier during his last illness and that you have personal knowledge of his having been disabled by a gunshot wound of the back. Will you kindly inform this bureau as to the immediate cause of death, and also describe thoroughly the wound of back; its location, condition of cicatrices, loss of muscular or bony tissue, etc. That is, we wish you to give as clear a statement of the wound of back as possible, and also to state whether it is within your knowledge that any organ or tissue within the pelvis was injured.

The object of this inquiry is to determine whether or not said wound was the cause of disease of kidneys believed to have been the cause of soldier's death.

Very respectfully,

JOHN CAMPBELL, Medical Referee.

W. K. COLEMAN, M. D.,
West Union, Adams County, Ohio, Treasurer of Board.

WEST UNION, OHIO, January 24, 1888.

SIR: In reply to the inclosed letter, will say that I first knew the late Cyrus E. Irwin as his family physician in 1881. I was frequently called upon to prescribe for him for constipation. He would take treatment from me for a few weeks, then take laxative and purgative medicine of his own selection for some time, then again apply to me for treatment. His statement each time was that he had suffered from constipation, never having a natural discharge from bowels ever since receiving gunshot wound of back.

In the spring of 1885 said Irwin applied to me for treatment. He was then suffering as before; but had in addition chronic gastrointestinal catarrh, characterized by tenderness over liver, stomach, and spleen, tympanites and tenderness of abdomen, furred tongue, and a decided sallow complexion. At that time I examined his wound and found a cicatrix upon middle portion sacrum about as large as a 5-cent nickel, with slight loss of tissue and bone substance; also a smaller cicatrix 2 inches below, with slight loss of tissue; each cicatrix was tender and adherent; tenderness diffused over entire sacral and lumbar regions.

The rectum was dry, devoid of secretion, and contracted to one-half its normal size. Previous to this time he also complained of sharp pains in back, hips, and legs, but from the time I examined his wound until his death increasing in frequency and severity. He suffered from lancinating pains in back, hips, and legs, at times producing partial paralysis of legs and radiating from gunshot wound of back. For a year previous to death he was never free entirely from pain as above, each attack of severe pain lasting from six to ten days. For the first two or three days of severe pain he had an increased secretion of urine, which was followed by almost entire suppression of urine, with slight symptoms of uremia, which would yield to treatment. There never was any qualitative change in urine except slight excess of phosphates. In September, 1886, I went with him to consult Dr. J. L. Whittaker, of Cincinnati, Ohio. Dr. Whittaker at once suspected disease of kidney, but examination of urine revealed only slight excess of phosphates, but upon a closer examination Dr. Whittaker was of the opinion that his condition was due to gunshot wound on sacrum. About the 1st of October, 1886, said Irwin began to present more pronounced symptoms of Addison's disease, some slight manifestations being present previous. There was a steady decline in his health from the time of first treatment until his death. I was called to see him on the 16th of December, 1886, and found a slight attack of pneumonia.

On the morning of the 17th he was suffering great pain in loins and hips, with complete suppression of urine and decided symptons of uremia; treatment was directed to the uremia from that time. He died on the night of December 18, 1886, from uremia and not from pneumonia.

There was no autopsy and the precise condition of kidney and its appendages could not be known. From all the symptons presented from time to time, and from the immediate cause of death—uremia—and the opinion of Dr. Whittaker, and of Dr. D. Coleman, the latter being associated with me in the treatment of the case, I am of the opinion that the exciting cause of Cyrus E. Irwin's death was due to gunshot wound upon sacrum, affecting cauda equina and sacral nerves and through them the rectum and kidneys.

Very respectfully,

W. R. COLEMAN, M. D.

TO JOHN CAMPBELL,
Medical Referee, Washington, D. C.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SARAH J. FRAILY.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call up the bill (H. R. 6001) granting a pension to Sarah J. Fraily.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Sarah J. Fraily, as widow of Shepherd Fraily, late a private Company D, Forty-eighth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws.

The report (by Mr. LANE) is as follows:

Shepherd Frailey was a private in Company D, Forty-eighth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers. Said soldier before his death drew a pension for injuries received in the service, said injuries being received while shoeing a wild mule, and affected the soldier's hip and back, causing atrophy of the muscles and rheumatism. And the reason a pension was not granted to his widow by the Department is that the soldier's death was caused by lung troubles, and not from the affection of back and hip.

Dr. John W. Bradburn, a physician in good standing, and whose post-office is Cave in Rock, Hardin County, Illinois, after having been duly sworn, testifies as follows: That he treated said Shepherd Frailey during his last illness. That he was first called to see him on January 7, 1885. That he treated him for pneumonia of the right lung, coupled with articular rheumatism of the limbs. That he visited him daily until January 17, 1885, when he was so far recovered from pneumonia as to require no further treatment; but he still suffered from rheumatism. That on January 24, 1888, he was again called to the case, and found the soldier suffering severe pain in the region of the heart; that the soldier's death occurred on January 25, 1888, and was caused by pericarditis, which resulted from rheumatism contracted in service.

Your committee have concluded from the evidence that the soldier's death was caused by disease of the heart, resulting from injury received while in line of duty, and that the claimant, his widow, is entitled to a pension; and therefore respectfully recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HENRY ALWARD.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I call up the bill (H. R. 9653) granting a pension to Henry Alward, dependent father of Henry M. Alward.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Henry Alward, dependent father of Henry M. Alward, deceased, late a private of Company H, Fortieth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, according to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The claimant is the father of Henry M. Alward, who enlisted in the service of the United States on the 17th day of September, 1862, as a private in Company H, Fortieth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, who, while in the service and in the line of duty at Murfreesborough, Tenn., died of fever on the 18th day of April, 1863. The applicant alleges in his application filed February 28, 1883, that he was in whole or in part dependent upon his said son for support at the time of his decease. The application for pension was rejected on the ground of non-dependence at the time of soldier's death. It is in evidence that the soldier made his home with claimant prior to his enlistment, and contributed by his labor to the support of claimant up to the date of enlistment, and at that time was the only son living with him.

Claimant had about the time of the death of the soldier two acres of land, a little home valued at a total of $970, including personal effects and improvements. Claimant was a plasterer by trade, and his total income did not exceed $500 per year.

The special examiner, who seems to have given the case a very thorough and impartial examination, closes his report as follows:

"From all the testimony introduced, the standing and credibility of the several affiants, and the estimation in which the claimant is held, and the claim viewed by the community generally, I have no hesitation in recommending the same as a just claim and one that should be paid, and respectfully submit the same with that view."

The claimant is now very feeble, is eighty-four years old, and in view of all the circumstances the committee believe that the relief asked for by the claimant ought to be granted. We therefore submit a favorable report and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GILBERT REED.

Mr. NEAL. I call up the bill (H. R. 8494) granting a pension to Gilbert Reed.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Gilbert Reed, late a second lieutenant in the Eleventh Regiment Tennessee Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Gilbert Reed, late a lieutenant in Company E, Eleventh Tennessee Regiment of Cavalry, praying for a pension, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

That Gilbert Reed, the petitioner, was a recruiting officer, detailed as such to procure recruits, and from the evidence on file appeared to have done good service for the Union cause from the early stage of the war to the time of his accident, August 9, 1863. On the night of that date, while leading recruits to the Union lines in Kentucky, through the Cumberland Mountains, on account of the darkness, he fell over a declivity and sustained severe injuries to his body, besides dislocation of the hip. From the evidence of recruits with him at the time, it appears that Gilbert Reed was piloting them over an intricate way in the darkness, when he fell as stated; that the injuries were so severe that he could not be moved except to the shelter of a cave near by, where his wants were attended to until he recovered sufficiently to be taken to a place of greater safety and comfort, and that in transporting him he had to be carried in a sheet or blanket.

The evidence shows also that the petitioner was, previous to his accident, a scout, and frequently gave relief to loyal persons whom he found inside of the enemy's lines; that after the accident he was unable to perform military duty. The papers of his regiment, which were destroyed by the enemy at a subsequent period, obliterate the record, so that he is unable to secure a pension by the existing pension acts, but evidence of comrades and civilians acquainted with the facts has been furnished.

The committee are of opinion that Gilbert Reed merits a pension, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Amend by adding, after the word "Reed," the words "and pay him a pension at the rate provided by law for a second lieutenant."

The amendment recommended by the committee was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

EDWARD JARDINE.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 10525) to increase the pension of Edward Jardine.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Edward Jardine, late colonel and brevet brigadier-general United States Volunteers, on the pension-roll at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of his present pension of $30 per month.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

Edward Jardine, while colonel of the Ninth New York Volunteers and brevet brigadier-general, was wounded in thigh during the New York City draft riots. He is now a pensioner at $30 per month, under special act of Congress approved June 6, 1874. This rate can not be increased by the Pension Bureau, because the rate of pension is fixed by the act; and therefore, and because of increased disability, pensioner comes to Congress for relief.

Dr. G. H. Humphrey, of New York City, under date of February 6, 1888, makes the following statements:

"I hereby certify that I have known this officer and have attended him professionally from time to time since the year 1861, when we served together during the war in the same regiment, the Ninth New York Volunteers (the Hawkins Zouaves), and that on the 15th July, 1863, in the city of New York, during the draft riots, General Jardine, while in command of troops engaged in suppression of the riots, was wounded in action, suffering a compound gunshot fracture of the left thigh-bone in its upper third. This wound crippled him for life. After about a year of great pain and peril he so far recovered as to get about on crutches with a badly deformed and useless limb. But the wound has repeatedly broken out afresh, and during the past twenty-five years he has again and again undergone the greatest pain and danger to his life in consequence of attacks of inflammation and death of portions of the injured bone, with extensive abscesses; that during the past ten months he has been confined to his bed owing to one of these attacks, the result of a fall, which for the third time refractured his tender, badly irritated limb, and during a portion of this time his life has been in the utmost danger from septic blood poisoning.

"He is at present confined absolutely to his bed or reclining chair, quite unable to move from place to place without great assistance, or to dress himself, or to serve himself in any of the ordinary functions of life, unable to sit in a natural attitude owing to stiffening of the left hip-joint, and, moreover, liable at any time to a recurrence of the dangerous inflammations which so often have threatened to kill him. He may perhaps ultimately get about again upon crutches, but the state of the limb does not yet warrant a prediction as to when the time for so doing may come."

Medical examination ordered by the Pension Bureau under a misapprehension of facts since the date of the above-quoted certificate of Dr. Humphrey fails to show an improvement in General Jardine's condition, a thing almost out of question in view of his advanced age.

The general pension laws provide a pension of $50 per month for those who are so totally disabled as to require the regular aid and attendance of another person, but as this amount can not be granted by the Pension Bureau, for reasons heretofore stated, your committee, fully satisfied of the applicant's helpless condition, are of opinion that the relief asked for should be granted, and therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill and ask that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

KEYES P. COOL.

Mr. MCSHANE. I ask the consideration of the bill (S. 3219) to increase the pension of Keyes P. Cool.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Keyes P. Cool, a private in Capt. G. Spencer's Company of Vermont Militia, in the war of 1812, from $8 to $40 per month, in accordance with the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3219) granting an increase of pension to Keyes P. Cool, have considered the same and report the bill back to the House, recommending its passage.

They adopt as their report the statement of facts correctly set forth in the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 1730, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

Claimant was a private in Capt. G. Spencer's company of Vermont Militia, in the war of 1812; participated in an engagement with the enemy at Plattsburgh, N. Y., in the fall of 1814. He is now pensioned at the rate of $8 per month under act of 1878.

In his petition for an increase of pension claimant states that he has no means of support other than the $8 per month which he is receiving as a pensioner of the war of 1812, and that he respectfully requests that his pension be increased to $50 per month.

Hon. Frederick A. Johnson, late member of Congress, of Glens Falls, N. Y., states that he has been acquainted with claimant for many years, and believes his statements to be truthful and correct.

In an affidavit executed at Glens Falls, N. Y., on the 6th day of July, 1888, Dr. James Ferguson, a physician and surgeon of high standing, testifies that he has been a practicing physician and surgeon at Glens Falls for more than thirty-five years; that he has been acquainted with the claimant during all of that time; has known of his mental and physical condition and infirmities; that he believes the claimant to be more than ninety-two years of age; that within the last five years his mental faculties have been very much impaired; that during the last two years he has required and does now require the constant attention of a watchful nurse or attendant; that a larger part of the time his mind is clouded; that he is subject to halucinations, and at such times it is not safe to leave him for a moment to himself, and that he has to be dressed and undressed generally by an attendant.

In an affidavit executed June 23, 1888, Hiram M. Cool, of Saratoga Springs, N. Y., testifies that claimant is not possessed of or the owner of any property exceeding in value $100 or $200 (which is old furniture), and that said claimant derives his principal support from his pension of $8 per month.

The claim is a meritorious one, and your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JACOB COPES.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 8534) granting a pension to Jacob Copes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jacob Copes, late a private in the Fifth Illinois Militia Volunteers in the Black Hawk war.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8534) granting a pension to Jacob Copes, have considered the same, and report as follows:

The claimant served as a private in a company commanded by Capt. Robert, McClure, of the Fifth Regiment of the Mounted Illinois Volunteers, from the 4th to the 27th day of May, 1832, with travel pay.

In 1884 he filed a claim before the Pension Bureau alleging that during his service in the Black Hawk war he contracted disease of eyes, which has of late years caused total blindness.

His claim has been rejected on the ground that he is unable to prove that said disease originated in service.

He is seventy-eight years of age. He can not find any comrade in that war alive. One neighbor, Larkin Jones, testifies that the claimant's eyes were sound when he enlisted for the Black Hawk war, and when he returned they were diseased. The eyes continued to trouble him until about 1880, when he became blind. Other neighbors of good reputation certify to the continued existence of disease of eyes since 1845, and Dr. F. E. Marcum, of Pittsburgh, Kans., certifies that claimant is blind from a disease of eyes, the result of exposure in early life.

The claimant would be a beneficiary under the bill recently reported by this committee to grant service pensions to survivors of certain Indian wars.

In this case your committee are of the opinion that the claimant should be pensioned at a rate commensurate with his disability. He is in poor financial circumstances.

The passage of the bill is recommended.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BETSEY A. MOWER.

Mr. YODER. I ask consideration of the bill (S. 2838) granting a pension to Betsey A. Mower.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Betsey A. Mower, widow of the late Joseph A. Mower, a major-general of United States Volunteers in the late war for the Union, to the rate of $100 per month.

The report (by Mr. FRENCH) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2838) granting an increase of pension to Betsey A. Mower, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions is as follows:

"The applicant is the widow of Maj. Gen. James A. Mower, who died in 1870 of disease contracted in the service. The widow was pensioned at $30 per month and this was increased to $50 by a special act of Congress. She has two children dependent upon her, one of which has been an inmate of an insane asylum for many years.

"The widow's husband left her no estate whatever, and she therefore asks Congress to increase her pension to $100 per month.

"In view of all the facts the committee recommend an increase to $75 per month."

The meritorious services of General Mower, who served his country for nearly a quarter of a century in all grades from that of a private in the war with Mexico, as well as the dependent condition of his widow, afford ample justification for concurrence in the recommendation contained in the above-quoted report.

The committee therefore return the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. CHEADLE. This is one of those increase bills in violation of law.

Mr. SAWYER. Then all these bills are contrary to law.

Mr. CHEADLE. When objection has been made as often as I have made objection to the consideration of these bills and said that I would continue to object, I think it is very unwise on the part of gentlemen to call them up.

Mr. STRUBLE. I will ask if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHEADLE] is not willing to let the case go over and retain its place on the Calendar.

Mr. HERMANN. Is this the case of the widow of an officer?

Mr. YODER. It is the case of a widow who has a daughter in an asylum and she is drawing a pension.

Mr. HERMANN. Is she drawing a pension up to the maximum amount?

Mr. YODER. She is drawing a pension under special law.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to passing the bill over and allowing it to retain its place on the Calendar? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

WILLIAM J. BROWN.

Mr. FINLEY. I ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 9684) granting a pension to William J. Brown.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William J. Brown, late a private soldier in Company G, Third Regiment Kentucky Infantry.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9684) granting a pension to William J. Brown, have considered the same, and report as follows:

The claimant was a private in Company G, Third Kentucky Volunteers, from the time of his enlistment at Camp Dick Robinson, Ky., on August 16, 1861, until July 3, 1865.

In this claim for pension Mr. Brown declares that at Columbus, Ky., about February 10, 1864, while on his way home on veteran furlough, he was thrown from his horse and his back and breast were injured. His claim was rejected on the ground that the alleged injury was not incurred in the line of duty, but while claimant was absent from his command on veteran furlough.

The records of the War Department show that the claimant re-enlisted as a veteran volunteer on the 1st day of January, 1864, and was absent on veteran furlough and in Kentucky sick until the June following.

W. C. Cabell and James M. Morrison, two comrades of claimant, testify that they were personally present in February, 1864, when claimant was injured in his back and breast by being thrown from his horse, which had run away with him. Another comrade also testified that the claimant was on his way home on veteran furlough at the time of the accident. It is also shown that in May, 1864, the claimant reported to the surgeon of his regiment (now deceased) and by him was examined and sent to the convalescent camp at Chaftanooga, Tenn. There are no records of that camp on file.

Testimony filed in the pension claim shows that Mr. Brown has been disabled by the said injury since the date of his discharge, and that he is now affected by the injury of the back is shown by the report of the examining surgeon.

Under the general pension laws a soldier is in line of duty when on veteran furlough only while with the command of which he was a member. In this case it would seem the command had become separated, and in squads of two or more, and were seeking their homes.

The committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOSEPH HUNTER, M. D.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 10275) granting a pension to Joseph Hunter, M. D.

The bill was read, as follows:

The report by (Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the House bill 10275, beg leave to report that they have considered the same and find from the record that the soldier enlisted August 9, 1862, as a private in Company F, One hundred and twenty-sixth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, and was discharged September 26, 1863, for disability. The soldier was pensioned April 3, 1877, for disease of the stomach—carcinoma. His name was dropped from the pension-roll May 6, 1879, on the ground that there was some evidence tending to show that the disease existed prior to enlistment, and the Department refused to restore him to the roll for the same reason.

The pivotal point in this case then is, was this disease contracted while the soldier was in the service or did it have its existence prior to his enlistment?

The testimony is very voluminous in this case, there having been over forty witnesses examined in the case, many of them physicians.

In August, 1863, the soldier was detailed as assistant surgeon at Refugee Camp, Jackson, Tenn., he being a physician. The certificate of his discharge states that the soldier was taken sick with some disease of the stomach at Jackson, Tenn., while in the line of duty, and has done no duty since that time. This was the first manifestation of this disease in the Army.

S. V. Keller and A. G. Chilton testify that the soldier returned from the Army in September, 1863, suffering with carcinoma of the stomach, which has continued ever since.

Surgeon John Logan testifies to same fact.

The soldier testifies that he was healthy when he went into the Army, and that his disease came on him in the Army, and produced fits, from which he is still suffering, as well as the stomach disease. There is some testimony in the record tending to prove that the discharge of this soldier was a forgery, and that he was not affected with any disease, but the committee think that these facts are not sustained by the evidence.

Robert Woods testifies that the soldier was apparently sound when he enlisted, and he knew him for twenty years prior to 1879. This witness further testifies that after he came from the service the soldier was apparently well and then he would be suddenly taken sick so that the witness thought the soldier would die.

Charles Wales testifies that he knew the soldier for twenty years prior to 1879, and knew him before the war, and never heard of his having any sickness or disease prior to his enlistment, and believes that the soldier would not commit forgery or perjury.

Henry Ryan, T. B. Rice, George Garrett, C. T. Hayward, and Lewis Haynes testify to the same facts as the last witness.

W. H. Roods testifies that the soldier was not diseased until after he returned from the Army, and that since then he saw the soldier have a spell in which he fell upon the sidewalk, and saw him leave the church one day. That he always found the soldier honest and fair in his dealings, and that he believes that the soldier would not commit forgery or perjury.

John A. Ryan, W. W. Haney, and James T. Brannon testify that they never knew claimant to have any disability prior to enlistment, and they knew the soldier and believe he would not commit perjury or forgery.

Mary A. Eastman testifies that she is the mother-in-law of the soldier; that he had some sickness prior to the war, but nothing more than is incident to persons living in the West. Never knew the soldier to complain of his stomach before enlistment, but have since his discharge; and believes the soldier to be honest and would not commit perjury or forgery.

D. W. Simpson testifies that he never knew soldier to have any continued disease before the war. Saw the soldier have a spell since the war, and appeared to be in convulsions, and heard of others; and believes he would not commit perjury or forgery.

J. Richmond, late colonel of the soldier's regiment, testifies that he was present when the soldier was discharged at Little Rock, Ark., and that he was discharged according to the rules of the Army, and that affiant signed the discharge himself, and that he signed it from a sense of justice to the Government and the soldier; that the statement of Assistant Surgeon Mills in the record is not true.

Dr. V. R. Bridges testifies to the character of Colonel Richmond, and Lieut. J. J. Wetmore, of the soldier's company, testifies that he was discharged according to the rules of the Army. Thirteen other witnesses testify to the good standing of the soldier, and two of them say they saw him have one or two sick spells, with trouble in his stomach, since the war.

This is the substance of the testimony, and the committee think that there is no sufficient testimony to warrant the conclusion that the soldier's discharge was a forgery, when the officer who signed the paper swears that he did sign it, and that the act was done in good faith. The committee think the testimony of Dr. E. W. Mills, who makes the charge that the certificate of discharge is a forgery, is not sustained, and this may also be said of the other testimony which goes to impeach the conduct of the soldier, and the fact that he is not affected with any disease.

The committee are unable to say what the character of the disease is, as it seems to them if it was cancer of the stomach it would have resulted in death before this time. The claimant swears that he was not afflicted with any disease until he went into the Army, and a cloud of witnesses, who knew the soldier, swear to his good standing, and that his statements are entitled to credit. He was in the service nearly a year and no signs of disease are visible, and then he is taken with some disease of the stomach from which he is very sick, and has been from thence hitherto. He was discharged for this disease in the regular order of business where there was full opportunity for examination.

The Government afterwards granted to the soldier a pension for this disability, and the committee think his name should have been dropped from the pension-roll only on clear and satisfactory testimony that the disease was not contracted in the service and in line of duty, and the committee think from a careful examination of this testimony that this conclusion is not warranted. The soldier is now past fifty years of age; he says that he was not able to appear before the special examiner for the reason that he was financially unable to be present to confront the witnesses, but the testimony taken by the special examiner is decidedly in favor of the soldier and goes to sustain his case.

On a consideration the committee think that the name of the soldier should not have been dropped from the pension-roll, and therefore recommend the passage of this bill.

Mr. STRUBLE (interrupting the reading). The report seems to be satisfactory, and I move that its further reading be dispensed with.

Mr. SPRINGER. The testimony of about forty witnesses was taken and this is a summing up of their evidence.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the further reading of the report will be dispensed with.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, I must insist upon the reading of the report.

The reading of the report was concluded.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM B. STOKES.

Mr. HOUK. I ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 2908) to increase the pension of W. B. Stokes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of William B. Stokes, late a colonel of the Fifth Tennessee Cavalry, to $75 per month, commencing with the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2908) granting an increase of pension to William B. Stokes, have considered the same and report as follows:

The claimant was a colonel of the First Middle Tennessee Cavalry from November 15, 1862, until March 14, 1863, and from April 18, 1863, to March 10, 1865, serving two enlistments in the same regiment. His first resignation was based on a gunshot wound of left side, the ball penetrating near the heart, incurred in line of duty. His second resignation was based on disability from rheumatism, incurred also in line of duty. During his second service he was on detached duty, commanding posts at Carthage and elsewhere a considerable portion of the time. He is now a pensioner of the United States, at the rate of $30 per month, for gunshot wound of left breast and rheumatism and neuralgia.

The examining board at Nashville, Tenn., July 18, 1883, reported that the ball struck—

"The left side of thorax immediately below nipple, passing in and through thoracic cavity, and coming out on the same level, right side of thorax, posterior aspect, near spinal column, between fifth and sixth ribs. Both points of entrance and exit clearly marked. * * * He has also rheumo-arthritic contractions of the toes, especially second toe right foot, and numerous arthritic nodes on wrist-joints, both hands, and a finger and metacarpal joints. Either one of these affections would constitute a total disability, third grade. He can positively do no manual labor."

The same board in April, 1886, report that rheumatic affection of one of his feet had necessitated the amputation of one of his toes, and that he could not raise his arm to a level with his breast, nor put on his upper garments without aid.

This board again, in 1886, reported that his disabilities had increased since the previous examination, and that he was totally and permanently incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, requiring assistance in some of the duties of life, especially in dressing.

The claimant is now seventy-four years of age.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill, amended, however, by striking out the words "seventy-five," in line 6, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "fifty."

The amendment of the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM H. DOWDALL.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 5446) granting a pension to William H. Dowdall.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William H. Dowdall, late of Company I, One hundred and forty-fourth Regiment of Illinois Volunteers.

Mr. FELTON. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FELTON. I would like to know the order of procedure. I find that bills are being passed over the order in which they occur on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that on the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, unanimous consent was given for each gentleman present to call up a bill.

Mr. FELTON. In what order do they come?

The CHAIRMAN. On the recognition of the Chairman.

Mr. BINGHAM. What is the order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated that he will recognize gentlemen as their names appear on a list that comes over, and then will recognize members of the committee, and afterwards gentlemen as they shall ask recognition.

Mr. BINGHAM. What is the order of the recognition of the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. The order of recognition is pursuant to a list that has been received by the Chair as coming over from a similar occasion.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to know what is the order of the recognition of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that he would recognize, first, the gentlemen on the list coming over from a former meeting, and then recognize members of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and then members, alternating on each side, beginning with those that first asked recognition.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the Chair please indicate what is meant by alternating?

The CHAIRMAN. Alternating between the two sides, recognizing a member on one side and then a member on the other side of the House.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not propose in this matter to have my name called as being on that list, but I propose to ask for recognition for the consideration of a claim and the consideration of bills fairly reported from the committee.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not know what the regular order is.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the reading of the report, which the Chair will now direct the Clerk to proceed with.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Clerk can read that regular order so far as the report is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the reading of the report on this bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. On this special bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, I will concede that.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5446) granting a pension to William H. Dowdall, makes the following report:

William H. Dowdall was enrolled on the 13th day of September, 1864, at Alton, Ill., in Company I, One hundred and forty-fourth Regiment of Illinois Volunteers, to serve for one year or during the war, and was mustered out July 14, 1865, at Springfield, Ill.

The evidence submitted in this case shows that Mr. Dowdall's family were living in Alton, Ill., where the company were stationed when the injury was sustained. Dodwall was color-bearer, and in some way his flag got torn, and the captain of the company told him when he went home to supper to take the flag and have it mended. By the permission of his officers he was allowed to draw his rations and board at home. On returning with the flag, in company with one comrade, he fell over an embankment and was injured.

Walton Rutledge, who was first lieutenant of the company, reports as follows:

"On examining my morning report of the 2d of December, 1864, I find Corporal Dowdall and Private Crane injured by falling from an embankment. On the 3d December they were sent to hospital at Alton. Crane reported back for duty on 22d December; Dowdall never reported back for duty while we were at Alton."

The testimony of a number of physicians shows conclusively that he has remained permanently injured in one knee and in his back. This case was submitted to a special examiner, who made an elaborate report, and closed with the following:

"I am of the opinion that the claim should be submitted for allowance on injury to left knee, left foot, and back."

When the case reached the board of review it was rejected on the ground that "disability was contracted while out on pass, and not in line of duty."

Your committee believe that while he was out on pass he was under the order of his superiors, commissioned to get the torn flag mended, and that while acting under such orders he was in line of duty and ought to be pensioned for his injury.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SAMUEL PURCELL.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up for consideration by Mr. LYMAN) was the bill (H. R. 8545) for the relief of Samuel Purcell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Samuel Purcell, who was a private in Company A, First Indiana Volunteers, in the Mexican war, and pay him a pension of $30 per month in lieu of the pension he now receives.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8545) granting an increase of pension to Samuel Purcell, have considered the same, and report as follows:

The claimant was a private in Company A, First Indiana Volunteers, Mexican war, from June 16, 1846, to June 16, 1847. While therein he contracted fistula in ano and diarrhea, and he was pensioned therefor, under a special act of Congress, at the rate of $8 per month. His disabilities have greatly increased in severity, but his application for increase of pension to correspond therewith has been rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that there is no law authorizing the Pension Office to increase pensions where the rate is fixed by special act. The claimant therefore appeals to Congress for relief.

The claimant is sixty years of age, and his physician, Dr. W. A. Vincent, testifies that his disabilities are such as to make him incapacitated for performing any manual labor. The physician is represented to be thoroughly reliable, and his testimony is supported by that of others filed in the claim. Such a physical condition under the general laws warrants a rating of $30 per month.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SUSAN E. ALGER.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up for consideration by Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts) was the bill (S. 1162) for the relief of Susan E. Alger.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Pensions be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Susan E. Alger, mother of Warren A. Alger, late of Company D, Fifteenth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. FRENCH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1162) for the relief of Susan E. Alger, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions is as follows:

"Susan E. Alger is the dependent mother of Warren A. Alger, corporal of Company D, Fifteenth Massachusetts Volunteers, who died in the Andersonville prison in October of 1864, of scorbutus. The case belongs to a class not provided for by law, but the equities of which have been recognized by many special acts. The soldier, though married, was the support of his mother. The soldier's widow was allowed a pension, but she having died, the mother now petitions that the lapsed pension be awarded to her.

"The committee are satisfied that this mother is not only now indigent and was dependent, but that her health was seriously injured by her labors as nurse during the war; and they think that when a woman, in giving her son to the country, has deprived herself of the stay of her old age, the country makes but small recompense in the allotment of a pension for her partial support.

"The committee recommend the passage of the bill."

There being no pension paid or payable under the general law to any one on account of the above-named soldier, your committee, justified by a long line of precedents, return the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGE RHODY.

The next business on the Private Calendar (called up for consideration by Mr. CHEADLE) was the bill (H. R. 2139) granting a pension to George Rhody.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls the name of George Rhody, late a private in Company K, Thirty-sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, and to grant him a pension, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws of the United States.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill 2139, have considered the same and now submit the following report:

The claimant is now on the pension roll at $8 per month for loss of sight of left eye. Claimant made application for increase alleging loss of sight of right eye, resulting in total blindness. The claim was rejected on the ground that the loss of sight of right eye was not due to claimant's military service. In an affidavit filed March 1, 1881, claimant testifies that since the disease, contracted in the service, the ball of his left eye bursted and the sight ran out, and that afterwards, on December 8, 1876, while chopping wood, a chip struck his right eye, putting it out and leaving him totally blind. His right eye, it seems, had been diseased, as shown by testimony in original papers for pension, and he believes that it would have gone blind before now, as he was almost blind at the time the accident occurred.

He served as a private in Company K, Thirty-sixth Indiana Volunteers, from September 20, 1861, to September 21, 1864. It seems to the committee that this is a case in which Congressional action is eminently proper. He served his country faithfully three years, and during that service contracted disease of his eyes which has directly and indirectly caused total blindness. He is now entirely helpless, and requires the constant services of an attendant. The examining board at Muncie, May 11, 1887, gave him a rating of $30 per month. We therefore submit a favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendments:

Strike out all after the word "to," in line 4, and insert "increase the pension;" strike out all in said bill after the word "volunteers," in line 6, and insert "to $30 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving."

The amendments recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PHILIP NEUMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar (called up for consideration by Mr. LAFFOON) was the bill (H. R. 10789) granting a pension to Philip Neuman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Philip Neuman, late of Company H, Eighth Kentucky Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10789) granting a pension to Philip Neuman, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Philip Neuman served from August 15, 1862, to September 20, 1865, in Company M, Eighth Kentucky Cavalry, Company K, Thirty-fifth Kentucky Infantry, and by transfer in Company H, Seventeenth Kentucky Cavalry, respectively.

He alleges that in the winter of 1862 and 1863 he contracted typhoid-pneumonia, which resulted in bronchitis and disease of lungs. He also claims pension on account of blindness of right eye and disease of right leg. The claim for the two latter disabilities have been rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that the origin of the same is not shown to be of the service, while the other disability existed prior to enlistment.

It may be conceded that the action of the Pension Bureau with reference to disease of eye and leg was proper, and should not be disturbed; but, after a careful examination of all the evidence in the case, it is the opinion of the committee that the claim for bronchitis and disease of lungs is entitled to further consideration.

The action of the bureau on the last-named disability is based upon the testimony of one Dr. P. D. Wilson, with whom claimant lived during infancy, and one Judith E. Smith, a cousin, tending to show that soldier's mother died of lung disease, caused by scrofula, that he inherited this scrofulous diathesis, and that prior to his enlistment he was subject to violent spells of colds, and was otherwise of delicate health.

In affidavits recently filed, these affiants deny having made the adverse statements above referred to, and declare him to have been a healthy young man at time of enlistment. In view of these contradictory statements the case should be disposed of without reference to the same.

There is an abundance of testimony, including medical, furnished by the claimant and obtained through special examination, showing beyond doubt that he was sound at enlistment and free from any symptoms of disease of lungs or throat. He entered the service at the age of eighteen years, was of good size and weight, and indulged much in athletic sports. The reviewer, in summing up the case on this point, says: "In my opinion the weight of evidence in this case establishes prior soundness."

That soldier contracted a cold resulting in disease of lungs, as well as treatment therefor in the service, is clearly shown by the uncontroverted testimony of comrades of good repute. He was much debilitated at date of final discharge, and, as established by medical and lay testimony, has been a constant sufferer from affection of the lungs, with frequent attacks of pneumonia ever since.

Medical examinations reveal a serious case of lung disease, with much emaciation. Claimant is entirely unable to earn a subsistence by manual labor, and having no other source of income, has been compelled to seek refuge at the public almshouse.

Three years' faithful service alone should dispose of the question of prior soundness; but admitting, for sake of argument, that he was predisposed to disease of lungs, the development of the disease into a disability, by reason of his military service, clearly brings him within a pensionable status.

For these reasons your committee are fully convinced that the claimant is entitled to a pension on account of disease of lungs, and therefore return the accompanying bill, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN DEAN.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up for consideration by Mr. SAWYER) was a bill (H. R. 9372) granting a pension to John Dean.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place on the pension-roll the name of John Dean, formerly a private in Company A, Thirteenth New York Volunteer Cavalry; and that he be directed to pay him the sum of $50 quarterly, with the arrears of pension at the same rate, from the 17th day of April, 1864, the date of the discharge of said John Dean from the service of the United States, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9372) granting a pension to John Dean, have had the same under consideration, and now submit the following report:

Claimant enlisted in Company A, Thirteenth New York Cavalry, November 17, 1862, and was discharged for disability of eyes April 7, 1864.

He filed declaration for pension March 16, 1877, in which he alleges that while in line of duty at New York and Staten Island, N. Y., about April, 1863, he suffered from chronic rheumatism and sore eyes, occasioned by exposure and illness contracted in camp; that he was treated at Blackwell's Island Hospital, New York, from about August 5, 1863, to November 25, 1863, and at military hospital, Lexington avenue and Fifty-first street, New York, from December 1, 1863, by order of General Hayes, until April 7, 1864, when he was discharged from the service. The claim was rejected on the record, which shows that the disease was contracted while absent without leave.

It is shown by the testimony of Dr. Fergus that prior to and at the time of enlistment the claimant was "a stout, healthy man, with splendidly developed muscles, free from any ailment, either local or general."

Dr. Mott, surgeon of claimant's regiment, certifies on his certificate of discharge, April 7, 1864, as follows:

"I find him incapable of performing the duties of a soldier because of sloughing of both corneas from inflammation contracted while absent without leave, having received a forty-eight hour pass from his regiment, April 15, 1863, then stationed on Staten Island. He lost his eyesight in August, 1863, while absent without leave. Unfit for Invalid Corps. Admitted to the hospital December 1, 1863."

It is shown by the testimony of William A. Revell, late sergeant of claimant's company, that about April, 1863, claimant became diseased with rheumatism and sore eyes, so that he was incapacitated for active duty and was, to affiant's personal knowledge, under medical treatment from the post medical officers.

The testimony of William J. Haight, late second lieutenant of claimant's company, shows that—

"To affiant's knowledge claimant, on and before April, 1863, was suffering from rheumatism and sore eyes, so that he was, to a considerable extent, incapacitated from active duty and was placed upon the sick-list at the barracks at Staten Island; that he was granted a leave of absence and did not return at the expiration thereof. He was orderly, correct, and, in affiant's opinion, a good soldier."

Dr. Ephraim Clarke, late assistant surgeon, testifies—

"That he found on examination of the records that claimant was marked as treated in quarters for chronic rheumatism from April 4 to April 22, 1863, and that claimant left such station or camp about that date."

Thomas Burke testifies—

"That he has known claimant since about 1862; that in December, 1862, and January, 1863, while acting orderly at headquarters of the regiment, 444 Broadway, New York City, claimant boarded at affiant's house, and Adjutant Brown, of said regiment, paid his board; that about the end of January, 1863, claimant was ordered to rejoin his company, and about April 22, 1863, he obtained a leave and came again to affiant's house; that he was troubled with rheumatism and sore eyes, and was confined to the house by illness, and that shortly afterwards he became so bad and ill with his eyes that affiant advised him to go to hospital, and that he procured the necessary papers and accompanied him to hospital at Blackwell's Island, and remained in said hospital until he entered the military hospital, where he was discharged; that from April 22, 1863, to the time of his discharge, April 7, 1864, he was incapable of performing active duty and became totally blind."

Examining Surgeon Judson gives claimant a rating of $31.25 for rheumatism and disease of eyes. This claim was rejected on account of soldier not returning in accordance with the terms of his leave of absence, but it is evident from his physical condition, and the hospital and other evidence, that there was no intention on his part to desert or wilfully disobey orders.

The charge of desertion has been removed, and in view of the testimony in the case the committee believe that the claimant ought not to be deprived of a pension by a technicality, and therefore submit a favorable report and recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "cavalry," in line 6, down to and including "United States," in line 10.

The amendments recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MICHAEL HARGAIN.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up for consideration by Mr. TRACEY) was the bill (H. R. 4575) granting a pension to Michael Hargain.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Michael Hargain, seaman on the United States steam-ship Otsego, etc.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill granting a pension to Michael Hargain, have considered the same, and report as follows:

The claimant served in the United States Navy, in the Florida expedition, from September 1, 1840, to June 30, 1841, in the capacity of boatswain's mate, seaman, and gunner. This service was rendered in the prosecution of the Florida Indian war, and Hargain was honorably discharged. He filed a claim for disability pension in 1886, but his claim was rejected on the ground that the claimant was unable to furnish evidence of officers and comrades to establish origin of the same during his naval service.

The claimant is sixty-nine years of age, and is practically blind in the right eye. He is also severely disabled by disease, and is without property of any kind, dependent upon his labor.

The claim falls within the provisions of the general bill for service pensions of the survivors of the Indian wars from 1832 to 1842, favorably reported by this committee at the present session of Congress.

Your committee are of the opinion that Mr. Hargain should have a service pension, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill, amended, however, by striking out the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," in lines 4 and 5, and inserting after the word "forth," in line 7, the words, "and pay him a pension at the rate of $8 per month."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. TRACEY, the bill was further amended by striking out from line 6 the word "steam-ship" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "schooner."

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN T. VINCENT.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up for consideration by Mr. HUNTER) was the bill (H. R. 10356) granting a pension to J. T. Vincent.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of J. T. Vincent, of Clinton County, Kentucky, late a private in Company D, Twelfth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10356) granting a pension to John T. Vincent, have had the same under consideration, and make the following report:

It appears from the evidence before your committee that claimant was enrolled as a private in Company D, Twelfth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, at Albany, Clinton County, Kentucky, on the 15th day of October, 1861. That on the 1st day of November, 1861, while on a march with said command from Albany to Somerset, Ky., he contracted measles and was left at Seventy-Six, and taken from there to his home in Clinton County, Kentucky, where he remained in a precarious condition for some months with said malady and resulting lung complication. On his partial recovery from the acute stages of this attack it was discovered that his lungs, which were deeply involved during his sickness, had become permanently affected, rendering him thereby unfit for further military duty, in view of which he did not report to his command, and was not therefore mustered into the United States service.

In support of his application claimant furnished an affidavit of George W. Hopkins, a highly reputable citizen of Albany, Clinton County, Kentucky, who was a sergeant of applicant's company and regiment, as follows:

* * * "That John T. Vincent enlisted in Company D, Twelfth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, in October, 1861, and went upon and remained on duty at Albany, Clinton County, Kentucky, when he enlisted, until his regiment left to go north of Cumberland River. There was measles in camp at Albany. He further states that when the command left Albany said Vincent left and went with it, and dropped out somewhere on the march, but at what point affiant does not know of his personal knowledge. While in camp north of Cumberland River affiant was informed that said Vincent was absent sick with measles. Affiant was a sergeant in said Company D, Twelfth Regiment of Kentucky Volunther Infantry, and was acquainted with said Vincent and knows the above facts from his personal knowledge, and has no interest in the matter."

He also furnished a sworn statement of John Absten, a reputable gentleman of Seventy-six, Clinton County, Kentucky, who was the first person called upon to see claimant after he fell out of ranks on the march from Albany to Somerset, Ky., on account of measles, and is as follows:

"I hereby certify that I am acquainted with John T. Vincent, and have been for thirty years or more; that said Vincent was enlisted in the Twelfth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Infantry at Albany, Ky., on or about the 15th day of October, 1861, and left that place with his command for Somerset, Ky., but fell out of the ranks on the march at or near Seventy-Six, Ky., on account of an attack of measles, and was returned to his home. I further state that I was summoned to visit him, and found that he had a severe attack of measles and was suffering very much and complaining with his breast when I visited him. I have not lived in the community where said Vincent resides for the past fifteen or twenty years and can not state his present physical condition. My age is fifty-nine years, and my post-office is Seventy-Six, Clinton County, Kentucky. I further state that I have n ointerest in the prosecution of this claim."

An affidavit of J. A. Vincent, esq., a most estimable gentleman and reputable citizen of Albany, Clinton County, Kentucky, furnished in the case, is as follows:

* * * "That he is seventy-one years of age, a resident of Albany, Clinton County, Kentucky, and has known John T. Vincent for the past fifty years, and knows that said Vincent enlisted in Company D, Twelfth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, at Albany, Ky., on or about the 15th day of October, 1861; that after the regiment left Albany for Somerset, Ky., in November, claimant was stricken with measles on the march, and was conveyed back to his home, where he was confined to his bed for a considerable length of time, suffering much with his breast and lungs; said Vincent has complained of his lungs ever since, and has had several severe attacks of lung trouble, and is still suffering from said lung affection; that he has no interest in the matter."

Dr. E. Becket, a reputable physician of Albany, Ky., furnishes an affidavit of medical treatment of John T. Vincent since he left the Army, and Dr. W. C. Kean, of the same place, who is a physician of superior professional attainments, made a physical examination of claimant, to show his present condition, and is as follows:

"That he is a regular practicing physician, a resident of Albany, Ky., and is thirty-five years of age; that he is personally acquainted with John T. Vincent, late of Company D, Twelfth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and that on the 2d day of July, 1888, he was called upon and made a physical examination of said Vincent, and found both lungs seriously affected, but that disease is more advanced on right side.

"Claimant states that he had had an attack of measles while in the Army, and it is the opinion of affiant that the present lung trouble is due to that cause. He further states that he has no interest in this matter."

It is clearly shown that applicant has been unable to perform any kind of active manual labor since leaving the Army by reason of the shattered condition of the system consequent on the sickness referred to, and now being a physical wreck, rendered so in the defense of his country, he appeals to Congress for relief.

Amend by striking out "J. T. Vincent" in the title and body of the bill, wherever that name occurs, and insert in lieu thereof "John T. Vincent," and insert the letter "D" after "Company," in the seventh line.

The amendments recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS SHACKELFORD.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up for consideration by Mr. BACON) was the bill (H. R. 9719) for the relief of Thomas Shackelford.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas Shackelford, late of the Eleventh United States Infantry, of the Mexican war.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9719) granting a pension to Thomas Shackelford, have considered the same and report as follows:

Thomas Shackelford, the claimant, was enlisted at Alexandria, Va., on the 11th day of May, 1848, for service in the Mexican war. He was sent to Baltimore and transferred to Fort McHenry, Md., where he remained until discharged, July 20, 1848, having served a period of seventy-one days.

The Mexican service bill requires a period of service of sixty days. This claim was rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that the claimant served but fifty-five days prior to the close of hostilities, and participated in no battle.

The claimant is sixty-seven years of age and in poor circumstances, and his actual term of service is more than that required by the general law. He was taken by the Government as a recruit, and was en route for the war, and had served more than the required period before news of the close of the war was received.

Your committee are of the opinion that the bill should pass, and report it with such a recommendation, with the following amendment:

Strike out the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws" in lines 4 and 5 of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof the words "at the rate of $8 per month;" so that the bill will read "to place on the pension-roll at the rate of $8 per month the name of Thomas Shackelford," etc.

The amendment recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. JANE POTTS.

The next business on the Private Calendar (called up for consideration by Mr. POST) was the bill (H. R. 5525) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane Potts.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Jane Potts, widow of Noah Potts, late of Company D, Seventh Regiment Illinois Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5525) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane Potts, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to submit the following report:

The Department refused her claim for a pension on the ground that the soldier's insanity which caused suicide was not brought on by military service; that for about fifteen years after discharge he conducted his business affairs in a successful manner, and it is not believed that the insanity developed about 1881 can be traced to his hardships as a prisoner of war.

Nealy C. Woods testifies that—

"He was orderly sergeant of Company D, Seventh Illinois Cavalry Volunteers; that he was well acquainted with Noah Potts; that they were members of the same company, and that he knew him intimately; that at the time of his enlistment he was a sound, able-bodied man, and free from disease of any kind; that he was taken prisoner at Collierville, Tenn., in the latter part of 1863, and was confined in Andersonville prison; that he saw him soon after his discharge from prison and he was a mere skeleton, on account of hardships he had endured; heard soldier say that he believed his bones were rotten. Affiant further states that he noticed during the conversation that his mind was affected and that his memory failed him very much."

J. B. Hendricks testifies that he belonged to the same company with the soldier:

"That at the time of his enlistment he was in perfect health; that he saw him after the war, and he thought he acted strangely; that his mind dwelt on his imprisonment, and it was difficult to draw it to any other subject, and that he was very absent-minded."

Henry P. Masher, also a member of said company, testifies that he was well acquainted with soldier:

"That he has known him from boyhood; and that up to the time of his enlistment he was a healthy, able-bodied man and of sound mind. That he saw him after his discharge from prison and he was much broken in health, and that his conversation, appearance, and actions satisfied affiant that his mind was very much impaired."

Other affidavits in this case set forth the same facts as the above; and while there is some testimony to the effect that the soldier's insanity was hereditary, the great majority of evidence goes to show that his insanity was due to his long confinement in Andersonville prison.

Your committee therefore conclude that the soldier's insanity was due to hardships incurred while in the service and that his widow is entitled to a pension, and we therefore respectfully recommend that this bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GERTRUDE K. LYFORD.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I call up for consideration the bill (S. 2500) granting a pension to Gertrude K. Lyford.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Gertrude K. Lyford, widow of the late Major and Brevet Lieut. Col. Stephen C. Lyford, United States Army, at the rate of $40 per month, in lieu of the pension which she now receives.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions on the bill is as follows:

"This is a bill to raise the pension of Mrs. Gertrude K. Lyford, widow of the late Maj. Stephen C. Lyford, United States Army, from $25 to $40 per month.

"Major Lyford was a member of the second of the two classes graduated at West Point in the early summer of 1861, in order to provide officers to fill the many vacancies made in the Army by the resignation of the Southern army officers. In 1863 General Sherman desired to have him on his staff, and in a letter to the Adjutant-General said:

"He has fought in all our battles. At Bull Run, a mere cadet just from the Academy, I saw him at his post; and unflinchingly, wherever I go, I find him in the front, and know some other officer less adventurous could fill his present office, and leave him to serve with me, directing and handling masses of men.'

"Major Lyford died on the 9th of May, 1885. Like many of the military profession, he had little to leave his family besides his good name. For many years of his life a large portion of his income was devoted to the support of an aged mother and invalid sister. He left a wife and child. The latter has constitutional infirmities, rendering it nearly helpless, and from which it will not probably ever recover.

"Besides his active military service in fighting through the campaigns of the West, from Fort Donelson and Corinth to Vicksburg, in different capacities, as chief ordnance officer of the department, or upon the staffs of Generals Rosecrans, McPherson, and Grant, the Government was benefited by some important inventions and experiments which were the result of his investigations.

"Referring to his value as an officer, a letter in the hands of the committee says:

"'Those who, like Senator HAWLEY and the honorable chairman of the Appropriations Committee, had opportunities of seeing his work, as far as pecuniary matters are concerned, are aware in how many ways he saved the Government from useless and undue expense, and also that not one cent was unaccounted for.'

"In the same letter he is thus spoken of:

"'The fall of Vicksburg saw him invalided home, dying, as was supposed, from malarial fever contracted by exposure to the fatal miasma of that deadly region, and, though after a long and painful illness he apparently recovered his health, it was then that seeds of disease were sown that enabled death to claim him as its prey, in the prime of his life.'

"The committee is aware that the widow is receiving the pension conceded to officers of her husband's grade, and that, under the general laws, it can not be raised. There are, however, cases in which distinction has been made under peculiar circumstances. To increase this pension, as provided in the bill, would have the practical effect of giving the widow the rating she already receives and of providing for the permanently helpless child $15 a month.

"Taking into consideration the devoted service rendered by Major Lyford, the fact that by his premature death (evidently a result of his service) the widow and her afflicted child have been deprived of protection and support, the committee think it is proper to concede this small addition to the pension she now receives.

"The bill is reported favorably with a recommendation that it do pass."

For the reason set forth in the foregoing report, your committee favor the granting of the relief asked for in the bill, and therefore return the same with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY A. PFEIFFER.

Mr. BINGHAM. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 4039) granting a pension to Mary A. Pfeiffer.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary A. Pfeiffer, widow of Charles L. Pfeiffer.

The report (by Mr. LYNCH) was read, as follows:

Charles L. Pfeiffer enlisted in Company E, One hundred and eighty-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, December 9, 1863, and was discharged May 24, 1865, by certificate of disability showing that he was "incapable of performing the duties of a soldier because of partial loss of use of right leg from gunshot fracture of the tibia, received in battle at Drury's Bluff, Virginia, May 16, 1864."

Soldier was pensioned for said disability at the rate of $8 per month, and it was reduced to $6 per month, September 4, 1868, on report of Examining Surgeon Harper. He drew $6 per month until his death. He died February 24, 1885, and his widow filed her declaration July 7, 1885, on the ground that the fatal disease, erysipelas, was the result of the gunshot wound of right leg.

The Pension Department rejected her claim "because the soldier's death from erysipelas of head was not a result of gunshot wound of right leg, for which he was pensioned, and was not otherwise chargeable to his United States military service. The marriage of claimant to soldier, the fatal disease being erysipelas, and the sober and industrious character of the soldier are all clearly shown.

In reference to the soldier's fatal disease being caused from the gunshot wound, we quote the report of two physicians who knew soldier intimately and treated him for the disease.

D. D. Richardson, physician-in-chief of the insane department Philadelphia Hospital, says:

"Soldier was frequently the subject of erysipelas during his long service in the insane department of the Philadelphia Hospital, due, as I thought, to the suppurating condition of his wounded leg."

John W. Dick, M. D., says:

"I was personally acquainted with Charles L. Pfeiffer for five years, and was his family physician for that time. In July, 1881, he was under my care at his home for an attack of erysipelas in and around a wound received in leg during the late war. He was a man of strictly temperate habits in all respects. In February, 1885, the insane department of the Philadelphia Hospital took fire and a number of lives were lost. Mr. Pfeiffer was attendant in the department at the time, working with the heroism of a true man to save the lives of the poor demented creatures intrusted to his care. Scorched by flame, drenched with water, and chilled with frost, this poor fellow sank for the last time under an attack of erysipelas of head and face, followed by meningitis, causing death. I have no hesitancy in attributing this predisposition to erysipelas to the wound received in the service of his country."

Your committee are satisfied that a predisposition to erysipelas was the result of the suppurating gunshot wound received in the service. This is a not infrequent result of wounds and chronic sores; and that it was so in this case is testified to by the physicians of the hospital in which he was employed, and who had constant opportunities to see the case respecting which they testify.

Your committee being fully satisfied that the soldier's death was caused by erysipelas, the result of a gunshot wound received in the service, report the bill favorably and recommend that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY ANN REID.

Mr. MAISH. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10954) for the relief of Mary Ann Reid.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary Ann Reid, the aged and blind daughter of Andrew Carman, who was a soldier in the war of the Revolution, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The claimant is the daughter of Andrew Carman, who was a soldier in the Revolutionary war in the Fourth Regiment of Cavalry for the State of Pennsylvania. He enlisted in April, 1781, and was discharged January 1, 1783. He was a pensioner for about eight years before his death in 1826. The records on file in his claim furnish the information of his service.

Mrs. Reid, the claimant, is shown by reliable testimony to be in needy circumstances, is eighty years of age, and for ten years has been totally blind.

There are several precedents for the granting of pensions to the aged and destitute daughters of the soldiers of the old wars, and among them the case of Mrs. Betsy Lockwood, passed by Congress at the present session.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLES MOLSEED.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I call up the bill (H. R. 8889) granting a pension to Charles Molseed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Charles Molseed, late of Company E, One hundred and fiftieth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and pay him a pension of $8 per month, subject to the provisions of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. LYNCH) was read, as follows:

Charles Molseed enlisted in Company E, One hundred and fiftieth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, August 22, 1862, was transferred to the invalid corps December 14, 1863, and discharged upon surgeon's certificate of disability, March 30, 1864, because of "partial anchylosis of right hip, from fall in loading wood a year ago last February" (1863).

He claims pension on account of injury to hip, by being thrown out of a wagon near Belle Plains, Va., in February, 1863. The claim has been rejected on the ground that the disability existed prior to enlistment. This action is based upon a letter written by the first lieutenant of the company, under date of April 23, 1864, in which the following statement appears:

"I would say that he, the soldier, had been disabled in his right hip from the date of his enlistment in the company, August, 1862, and I find from inquiry of several members of the company who reside near him and worked at the same place together, that said injury was received some six or seven years ago. He may have fallen from a wagon while in the performance of his duty at Belle Plains, Va., but the injury received was not of a serious nature, as the accident was not known to his company officers."

It was ascertained during the special examination of the claim that this letter was prepared by the orderly sergeant of the company, who admits that he had personal acquaintance with the soldier prior to his enlistment, and based his statements upon reports made by other members of the company, whose names he does not now remember. The claimant, however, gives the names of those of his acquaintances who enlisted with him, and accounts for them so as to leave but little doubt that at the date of said letter none were present with the company who could have imparted this information to the orderly sergeant.

The claimant admits that he was thrown from a wagon some years before enlistment, and that his shoulder was temporarily injured, but denies any prior injury to hip, and in support of his claim of prior soundness a large number of respectable citizens and fellow-laborers who have been examined by the special examiner testify to that fact, while not a single one has been found who knew to the contrary.

The regimental surgeon also testifies that he was called out on the road where claimant had been thrown from the wagon, and found him suffering from contusion of the hip.

From the showing made the committee are of opinion that the claim should not have been rejected on the ground of prior unsoundness. But the claim is otherwise inadmissible under the general law. The true facts in the case are that soldier was hurt while on pass. He obtained permission to go to the landing, a short distance from camp, after having just been relieved from guard duty, and got on a Government wagon going in that direction. While in the wagon, through the carelessness of the driver, it was upset and soldier thrown against a stump.

Congress in similar cases has recognized the justness of this class of cases, not reached by the general law; and being fully satisfied that the disability, which is described by the examining surgeon as a dislocation of right hip, was incurred in the service and under the circumstances set forth, your committee report favorably on the accompanying bill and ask that it do pass, amended, however, by striking out all after the word "volunteers," in line 6, and insert therein instead the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment recommended by the committee in the concluding paragraph of the report was read and agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

H. H. HELPER.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina. I call up for consideration the bill (S. 2724) for the relief of H. H. Helper.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place on the pension-roll the name of Hardie Hogan Helper, who was a private soldier in Company H, and sergeant-major of the Eighth Illinois Cavalry, also a private soldier of Company H, Second New York Cavalry, and who in the interim of that service was totally and permanently disabled whilst under military orders of General A. E. Burnside, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, and that he be granted a pension of $24 per month, instead of $10 per month, his present rating.

The following report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read in part, the complete reading being dispensed with on motion of Mr. KILGORE.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2724) for the relief of H. H. Helper, having had the same under consideration, adopt the Senate report thereon, which is as follows, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The facts in this case and upon which the claimant asks the relief granted by the bill are contained in a sworn statement forwarded by him to the Committee on Pensions of the Senate, dated March 28, 1888, and are as follows:

MOCKSVILLE, DAVIE COUNTY, N. C., March 28, 1888.

On the 3d day of March, 1881, I was granted a pension at the rate of $10 per month, which was and is wholly inadequate, not only in view of the fact that I am an ex-soldier of more than sixty-six years, but that I am now, and have ever since the first week in March, 1862, been wholly disabled for the performance of manual labor by reason of disability incurred whilst under military orders of General Burnside in defense of my country.

Believing it is the desire and purpose of Congress to give each man his due, according to reason and the law of God to man, I now appeal my case to that body, and ask for simple justice.

Following is a justified statement of my case: I was born in this county (then Rowan County) March 21, 1822. After the publication of my brother's book, "The Impending Crisis of the South; How to meet it," in 1857, I sought a home in free Illinois. Immediately after General Frémont issued his famous order in June or July, 1861, prohibiting the return of slaves to their masters who sought refuge inside the Federal lines, I volunteered as a private soldier at Macombs, McDonough County, Illinois, by letter addressed to General John F. Farnsworth, at his home in Northeastern Illinois, of whom I had previously known.

Whilst the regiment, Eighth Illinois Cavalry, was in camp at "Camp California," in Virginia, near Washington, and being eager for active service, I was mustered out of said service as sergeant-major, to join General Burnside in my own State. (See papers filed with Commissioner of Pensions in 1874, with my application for a pension under the general pension laws.)

Under orders of said general, I was commissioned verbally with strict and minute instructions to make a careful and accurate reconnaissance of the position and strength of the Confederate forces at Fort Macon, at and near New Berne, and to destroy the railroad bridge that spanned the mouth of Trent River at New Berne, in order that the Union forces might thereby enter New Berne without a battle. At 4 o'clock Friday morning, March, 1862, I scaled the middle stone abutment of said bridge, right under the nose of the Confederate sentinel, and successfully attached with a chain the inflammable material (prepared by a crank, which I predicted to the general would result, as it did result, in a failure) to the wood structure of the bridge and set it on fire. For a time it blazed beautifully, but in a twinkling the Confederates on the New Berne side of the bridge hastened to the burning structure and soon extinguished the flames. A graphic account of the attempt to destroy the bridge appeared the next morning in the New Berne Progress, charging the attempt to burn the bridge to a Confederate enemy inside their own camp.

A severe snow-storm that sprung up from the northwest in less than ten minutes after setting fire to the bridge saved me, I shall ever believe, from capture and execution by the Confederates. During the storm I was completely veiled by the snow from the Confederate fortifications on the south side of Neuse River, and when about 10 miles south of New Berne the storm became so furious that I lost my hat, the rudder of my boat, and an oar. Near the mouth of South River, 20 miles below New Berne, I made harbor. Saturday night I brought up at Ocracoke light-house, in which I came near freezing to death. Sunday, Sunday night, and until Monday late afternoon I was crossing Pamlico Sound in an open boat with oars only, a feat never, perhaps, accomplished before, when I reached a Federal gun-boat, having had nothing to eat from Saturday morning.

It was those eight days and nights of exposure to the elements, salt water, and cold, being the most of the time wet to the skin from head to foot, that disabled me.

On the 11th day of March I reached the general's flag-ship, the Alice Price, and made my report to him verbally as the fleet was weighing anchor to proceed to New Berne. How well I performed the duty assigned me General Burnside could tell if living. See, however, a letter addressed to me by himself, now on file with my application in the Pension Bureau. So, also, could one Gilbert, as brave a sailor as ever lived, and Jack McLain, an arrant coward, two experienced sailors who accompanied me on my reconnaissance, if living, and could be found.

The singular and peculiar disease of which I became afflicted, and am still afflicted, commenced in both feet on Sunday morning before leaving Ocracoke light-house, and notwithstanding I was suffering untold agony at the time, I cheerfully volunteered to make a reconnaissance facing the enemy near the mouth of Slocum's Creek, on the 12th day of March, 1862, in order to ascertain the depth of water, with the boat's crew of the Alice Price, the gunboat Delaware, Captain, now Rear-Admiral S. T. Quackenbush, protecting me. I also volunteered to go into the battle on the 14th of March, but under peremptory orders of General Burnside I remained aboard his ship in consequence of my extreme suffering.

On reaching New Berne I took shelter in one of the deserted buildings of that city, where I was attended by Drs. Church and Rivers, of the general's command, now deceased, and a faithful negress, whose name I can not now recall. I was also visited by the general himself.

After remaining several weeks in New Berne, being able to travel, transportation was furnished me by order of the general to New York. I was attended by a homeopathic physician in Brooklyn, N. Y., whose name has long since escaped me.

After General McClellan's defeat in June, 1862, on the peninsula of Virginia, I obtained an authorization from the then governor of New York to raise a company or regiment for the service, but because of the apathy of the people I became disgusted and volunteered as a private in the Second New York Cavalry. My health soon gave way again entirely, and I was mustered out of that service at Ball's Cross Roads, Virginia, upon my own request, in order to join General Saxton in the Department of the South, and upon my own request assigned to duty in Florida, feeling it to be my duty to remain in the service in whatever capacity my health would justify, so long as the war lasted. (See papers on file in Pension Office as to these last two services.)

Now, I was mustered out of the Eighth Illinois Cavalry upon a military order. I joined General Burnside upon a military order. I served that general under his military orders, and I believe I should have been pensioned under the general pension laws on my application filed in the Pension Bureau in 1874, but the Commissioner of that office rejected my claim for the reason, as he said, that I was not "in the line of duty." Certainly there can be no equity in such a decision, as you may observe by reading the last twelve words of the then Secretary of the Interior in a decision addressed to the Commissioner of Pensions on my appeal to that functionary for a higher rating.

Knowing that I had merit, justice, and equity on my side, I went to Congress in that behalf, and General Burnside being at the time in the United States Senate, went before the Committee on Invalid Pensions and certified to my service and disability, and hence the allowance of the meager, I might say parsimonious, allowance of $10 per month by special act March 3, 1881.

I am not only unable to perform manual labor, but am permanently disabled, and have been ever since the first week in March, 1862, and very much more than half the time require the aid and attendance of another person, to wit, my wife and thirteen-year old son, who alone constitute my family now. (See certificates and papers on file from my family physicians in Pension Office; also, see what the Pension Bureau surgeon said of my case when I was examined in the Pension Office in 1874.)

I now come before your committee and respectfully request Congress to do me simple justice by granting me a pension commensurate with my service and sufferings, now that I am on the verge of the grave.

HARDIE HOGAN HELPER.

To the COMMITTEE ON INVALID PENSIONS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA, County of Davie, ss:

Personally came before me, clerk of the superior court for Davie County, North Carolina, on this, the 28th day of March, 1888, Hardie Hogan Helper, well known to me as a respectable citizen of said county, and made oath in due form of law, and declared that the facts set forth in the foregoing instrument of writing addressed to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, United States Senate, are substantially true.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of my office on the day above written.

[SEAL.]

A. T. GRANT,
Clerk Superior Court.

The facts set up in this petition were stated in almost the same language in the application of the claimant filed in the Pension Bureau in 1874. Not only are most of these facts sustained by the papers in the case, but also by the following letter from General A. E. Burnside:

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
Washington, March 17, 1875.

MY DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of the 15th instant allow me to say that the incidents of the occasion to which you refer are distinctly remembered by me, and in compliance with your request I have this day forwarded to the Commissioner of Pensions a certificate covering all the points you have mentioned.

Very respectfully and truly,

A. E. BURNSIDE.

H. H. HELPER,
Salisbury, N. C.

The above letter seems to corroborate the facts set up in the petition filed in 1874.

It was necessary that the application should be made to Congress, as was done in 1881, as, perhaps, under a strict construction of general law the claimant would not be entitled to a pension, the incurrence of the disease having taken place in the interim between his discharge and subsequent enlistment, but while acting under the military orders of General Burnside. The board of examining surgeons, who examined him in 1875, fully sustain his statements as to his physical condition, which is further sustained by the certificate of Dr. M. T. Bell, dated April 26, 1881, as follows:

MOCKSVILLE, N. C., April 26, 1881.

To whom it may concern:

This is to certify that Mr. Hardy Hogan Helper's condition, concerning which I made a certificate some time ago, confirms the opinion expressed in that paper, i. e., that his disability was permanent and his ailments progressive. At present he is unable to walk more than a very short distance without much difficulty of breathing; in fact, the mere rising from his chair accelerates his respiration to quite an uncomfortable degres; his legs are very weak and painful below the knee, requiring a cane as a prop when standing. The digestive organs are weak, seeming to be involved in the general weakness of the whole nervous system, voluntary and organic, causing a want of appetite and tardy digestion; sleep is hard to secure, and unrefreshing when obtained.

With the progress of time his actual sufferings increase, while muscular strength is slowly giving way, threatening to reduce his pleasures of life to intellectual recreations alone.

M. T. BELL, M. D.,
Family Physician.

After a careful examination of the facts in this case the committee is satisfied that the claimant ought to receive from Congress the same recognition for the services rendered to the Government under the immediate orders of General Burnside, in rendering which he incurred the disability, as though he was at that time actually enlisted in the Federal Army.

The proof shows that, if he is entitled to anything, he is entitled to be rated for inability to perform manual labor, which, under the law, would entitle him to a pension of $24 per month.

It is therefore recommended that Senate bill 2724 be amended in line 11, by striking out "fifty" and inserting "twenty-four;" and, as so amended, the bill is reported favorably, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FREDERICK C. SHAW.

Mr. PETERS. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 204) granting a pension to Frederick C. Shaw.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be authorized and directed to place the name of Frederick C. Shaw, late Company B, Third Illinois Cavalry Volunteers, on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The soldier enlisted in Company F, Third Illinois Cavalry, on the 3d day of October, 1862, and was discharged on the 10th day of October, 1865. The case was rejected by the Pension Department because he could not furnish evidence of the origin of the disability for which he claimed pension, namely, consumption, in the service. The applicant has no hospital record, but seems to have been present for duty, and has a good faithful record as a soldier. There seems to be no doubt from the evidence but that the soldier was a hale, hearty, strong young man at the time he enlisted in the Army.

The testimony of David M. Orr is as follows:

"I knew Fred. C. Shaw in 1857, and he was counted a well and healthy man. I have lived close neighbors to him since 1866, and he has been under the doctor's care most of the time since. He has not been able to do a full day's work since 1866, to my knowledge, and he has not been able to do anything at all for about one-fourth of that time."

Dr. W. R. Hopkins testifies:

"I began treating Frederick C. Shaw for pulmonary consumption in 1866, and continued treating him until 1872."

In 1884 Dr. Hopkins made another affidavit, in which he says:

"I was the family physician of the said Frederick C. Shaw from the year 1866 or 1867 until 1872; that he treated soldier for bronchitis and consumption frequently during that time; that he lived within 2½ miles of him during that time, and was intimately acquainted with him; was not acquainted with him prior to enlistment; that said Shaw, in consequence of said disease, was disabled from performing manual labor fully one-half; that he can not give exact dates of treatment, because a part of his books have been lost; that said Shaw was a man of temperate habits and was not addicted to the use of strong drink."

Orville S. Orr testifies:

"I have been acquainted with Frederick C. Shaw since 1856, and continuously up until 1862, when he went into the Army. Never knew of his being sick or under the physician's care. He was a perfectly sound man."

Your committee think, from all the evidence in the case, that the soldier was a stout and hearty man at the time of enlistment, and that within a few months after he was discharged he had consumption. He was discharged in October, 1865, and the evidence of physicians shows that in 1866 he was treated for this trouble. The evidence also shows that from 1866 he has continuously suffered from consumption, and he has not been able to perform more than half work. The evidence of Dr. Hopkins, who says he treated him for consumption in 1866 and following years, would indicate that even at that time the disease had become somewhat chronic, and if so, this would necessarily lead to the conclusion that the incurrence of the consumption was during his service in the Army. The disease is one that usually comes on slowly, beginning with a cold, and continuing without attracting very much attention until after it has fastened itself upon the system.

It is not often that persons in the ordinary walks of life have their attention directed to the disease until after it has obtained a very firm hold, and very often, in fact in a majority of cases, as is pretty well shown by casual observation, a doctor is not called in until after the disease has become firmly established in the human system. Mr. Shaw is shown to have been a laboring man, without very much means, and it is reasonable to suppose that he did not go to a doctor and consult in regard to the disease until after its progress had become somewhat alarming.

Your committee therefore think that, from all the evidence in the case and the circumstances surrounding it, they are authorized to find that the consumption of which the soldier complains, and from which he is suffering now, was incurred during his service in the Army; and we therefore report the bill favorably and recommend its passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH EVANS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2120) granting a pension to Elizabeth Evans:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Elizabeth Evans, dependent sister of William Ayres, late a private in Company F, Thirty-seventh Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, on the pension-roll, and pay her a pension of $12 per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The claimant is the dependent sister of William Ayers, late of Company F, Thirty-seventh Regiment Indiana Volunteers, who died in the service. The claimant was married to William Evans, who died in 1856. The claimant and her daughter then made their homes with the mother of the deceased soldier, and was supported by the said soldier up to the time of his enlistment in the Army. The mother of the soldier was dependent on her son for support, and after his death drew a pension until her death, which occurred in 1881.

The claimant made her home with her mother after the death of her husband, and was supported in part by the pension her mother drew as a dependent. Since the death of her mother she has been dependent on the township for support, and being a confirmed invalid, as is also her daughter, she must be supported by charity or go to the poor-house. We believe it is fully proven that the claimant was dependent upon said soldier prior to and at the time of death; that she has no means of support whatever; that she is a confirmed invalid.

It seems to the committee that the relief asked for in the bill ought to be granted. We therefore submit a favorable report and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOSEPH F. GARRETT.

Mr. GEST. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 6501) to grant a pension to Joseph F. Garrett.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll the name of Joseph F. Garrett, who was a soldier in Spy Battalion, Fourth Illinois Regiment, in the Black Hawk war, and pay him a pension of $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The records show that the claimant served as a private in Capt. Elijah Iles's company, Illinois Mounted Volunteers, for twenty-one days, besides a number of days' travel, in the Black Hawk war. He is now eighty years of age, childless, with no property of any kind. His aged wife is nearly blind. For a number of years he has been in part sustained by the contributions of his neighbors.

Two hundred citizens of his locality unite in a petition to Congress asking for his relief. He is entitled to a service pension, and would be a beneficiary under the general bill reported by this committee for the relief of survivors of the Indian wars.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill, amended, however, by striking out the word "twelve," in line 7, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "thirty."

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out, in line 7, the word "twelve" and insert the word "thirty;" so as to make the pension $30 per month.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand that this bill as originally introduced proposed a pension of $12 a month, which the committee by amendment proposes to raise to $30 a month.

Mr. GEST. When I introduced the bill I did not know what amount the committee was in the habit of allowing in cases of this kind or what amount the law provided for. This is a pension for services in the Black Hawk war. It is a case not pensionable at the Pension Office at all. I erroneously inserted "$12;" the committee report that the amount ought to be $30.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand from the reading of the report that this man served only twenty days; and I do not see why a discrimination should be made in favor of a soldier of the Black Hawk war as against soldiers of other wars. It occurs to me that a pension of $12 a month ought to be enough.

Mr. GEST. I hope the gentleman will not object to the rate of pension proposed by the committee. This man is eighty years of age; he has no property; his wife is blind; and he is dependent upon his neighbors for bread. For a man in this situation, with an aged wife who is blind and has to be led about, a pension of $30 a month is certainly not too much.

Mr. KILGORE. This pension does not go to the wife; and besides, as I have suggested, this seems to be a discrimination which ought not to be indulged in.

Mr. GEST. It is not a discrimination.

Mr. KILGORE. If the pension proposed were $12 or $15 a month, I would make no objection. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out "thirty" and inserting "fifteen."

Mr. GEST. This is a pension for services in the Black Hawk Indian war of 1832, out in my part of the country.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand.

Mr. GEST. I certainly hope the gentleman will not object to a pension of $30 a month for this old man who has an aged and blind wife; both of them are helpless, dependent upon the charity of their neighbors. The application in this case is supported by a petition of two hundred people that are now caring for this aged couple, who certainly can not live more than a few years longer.

Mr. KILGORE. A stronger case can be made in ten thousand instances.

Mr. GEST. I will take it.

Mr. KILGORE. Very well, then, strike out "thirty" and insert "fifteen."

Mr. STRUBLE. Will the gentleman compromise on twenty.

Mr. KILGORE. No; I will compromise on fifteen.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order while the House is dividing.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 6, noes 23.

Mr. KILGORE. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. BINGHAM. Make it twenty.

Mr. KILGORE. I will withdraw only on a proposition to make it fifteen.

Mr. GEST. Make it twenty.

Mr. KILGORE. No, I will only make it fifteen.

Mr. GEST. Very well, let it go at fifteen.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection and the amendment making it "fifteen" is agreed to. The Chair hearing no objection the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass as amended.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

SAMUEL ANDERSON.

Mr. JOSEPH, by unanimous consent, called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 10017) granting a pension to Samuel Anderson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Samuel Anderson, late a private of Company E, Fifth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10017) granting a pension to Samuel Adams, have considered the same, and now report:

The claimant enlisted as a private in Company E, Fifth Kentucky Cavalry, October 4, 1862, mustered March 31, 1862, and discharged May 3, 1865.

In declaration filed June 11, 1879, he alleges that at Burkesville, Ky., in November, 1861, he contracted measles, and on account of cold and exposure while being moved the measles settled on his lungs and they became diseased in consequence, and that he was treated at Columbia, Ky., some five or six weeks.

The claim was rejected on the ground of no record of alleged disability and inability to furnish the necessary medical evidence to connect it with the service.

Claimant states that he is unable to furnish medical evidence as to his condition prior to enlistment, for the reason that Dr. Ellison, who was his only physician, is dead. Robert Story testifies that he was well and personally acquainted with claimant, and lived neighbor to him prior to the war, and knows that claimant was stout and healthy at and prior to his enlistment.

Dr. R. Haggard, colonel Fifth Regiment Kentucky Cavalry, testifies that he was a practicing physician before the war and was acquainted with claimant's father and mother, and the family generally, before the war, and knows that they were stout, healthy people; that he was present when the regiment was mustered into the service. He regarded those who were mustered as sound and healthy men; that claimant was present and he so regarded him.

Robert Story testifies that claimant, about November 4, 1861, contracted measles and was sent to the hospital and remained there about six weeks; that he was treated by Dr. Walker; that claimant was again taken sick in Louisville, Ky., in October, 1862, and sent to the hospital, where he remained four or five weeks; that after claimant had entirely recovered from the measles he caught cold, which caused a severe cough, and his lungs appeared to be diseased, and to the best of his opinion the said disease of lungs was caused by claimant taking cold from exposure after having the measles.

James A. Graham, William Roborn, and Robert Story testify that they have known claimant since his discharge, and that he has been a constant sufferer from lung disease ever since that time to the present.

Dr. Shive testifies that he commenced treating claimant about October, 1877, for pneumonia; that his physical condition at that time was bad on account of his lungs being in a diseased condition, caused from measles; that claimant has not been able to perform manual labor since he first knew him; that claimant was gradually growing worse when he last saw him in 1880.

Dr. W. G. Hunter, examining surgeon (the writer of this report), in a certificate of examination December 20, 1881, says:

"I find this applicant greatly emaciated and quite feeble. He has a troublesome cough and purulent sputa. I find great dullness on percussion over respiring lobe of right lung, and bronchial respiration and superficial expiration over same region on auscultation. There is great want of freedom of the movements of chest under right clavicle. There is depression of the intercostal spaces on both sides, and other symptoms of phthisis pulmonalis in second stage."

The committee are of the opinion that the case is clearly made out that claimant was physically sound at the time of enlistment; that he had measles, caught cold, which resulted in the disability for which he claims pension, and that the relief asked for in the bill ought to be granted.

We therefore submit a favorable report and recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

RICHARD H. VAN DORIN.

Mr. GEAR, by unanimous consent, called up for consideration the bill (S. 2118) granting a pension to Richard H. Van Dorin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Richard H. Van Dorin, of Fairfield, Iowa, who served with the United States forces in the war with Mexico, and actually participated in the battle of Buena Vista and one other engagement, and pay him a pension of $8 per month, as provided in section 2 of the act approved January 29, 1887, entitled "An act granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes."

The report by (Mr. STRUBLE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2118) granting a pension to Richard H. Van Dorin, have considered the same, and report it back to the House, recommending its passage. The statement of facts in the report of the Senate committee correctly set forth the case, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 822, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2118) granting a pension to Richard H. Van Dorin, have examined the same, and report:

The claimant accompanied the Army to Mexico in 1846–'47 as teamster, but participated in the battle of Buena Vista and in an engagement subsequently thereto; was honorably released in the spring of 1847; drew a land warrant in virtue of his services; and asks to be pensioned the same as an enlisted soldier.

His character and credibility are vouched for by Hon. JAMES F. WILSON, Senator from Iowa, and circumstantial testimony is also presented from neighbors and acquaintances, whose probity has the same satisfactory indorsement.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. PARKER. This is a Mexican pension case, and there is no doubt about it, and I move it be laid aside to be reported to the House.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MINOR CHILDREN OF LIEUT. GEORGE R. M'GUIRE.

Mr. KILGORE. I have not called up any bill as yet, but I have the right to do so, and I will yield whatever right I have to the gentleman from California [Mr. FELTON], who is over here grazing on our pasture. [Laughter.]

Mr. FELTON, by unanimous consent, called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 4038) granting a pension to Victor, Gertrude, Margaret, and Helen, minor children of Lieut. George R. McGuire.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the names of the minor children of George R. McGuire, late a lieutenant of Company I, Thirteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. LYNCH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill 4038, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully submit and adopt the report in the same case made by this committee in the second session of the Forty-ninth Congress, as follows:

"Margaret A. McGuire was the widow of Lieut. George R. McGuire, late lieutenant and captain in the Thirteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry. She was granted a pension by special act, and having since died, her surviving children, who are all under the age of sixteen years, are debarred from obtaining relief through the Pension Office.

"Your committee are of the opinion that their claim is a meritorious one, though it is debarred by a technical decision of the Interior Department, and they therefore recommend the passage of the bill, amended so as to include the names of Victor, Gertrude, Margaret, and Helen in the body of the bill."

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY L. TANNER.

Mr. WEBER, by unanimous consent, called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 10705) granting a pension to Mary L. Tanner.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary L. Tanner, widow of Alanson G. Tanner, late of Company K, One hundredth New York Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10705) granting a pension to Mary L. Tanner, submit the following report:

The beneficiary is the widow of Alemson G. Tanner, late a private in Company K, One hundredth New York Volunteers. The soldier enlisted October 3, 1861, and at the battle of Fair Oaks he was badly wounded in the left elbow. The arm continued in such a condition after the wound that amputation became necessary, and on or about August 28, 1862, his left arm was amputated "above the elbow and 1 inch below the shoulder joint." He was discharged October 4, 1862, and immediately returned to his home in Western New York, where he died October 2, 1875. The soldier at the time of his death was drawing a pension of $24 per month. The widow applied for a pension May 8, 1876, and the same was finally rejected in 1886. The soldier died of apoplexy or paralysis claimed to be the result of the amputation.

The medical referee decided that the claim that the apoplexy or paralysis resulted from the amputation was not tenable.

The evidence shows that the soldier even after the amputation suffered from the wounded stump, was very nervous, constantly compelled to take medicines to alleviate his nervousness; that he always suffered to a greater or less extent from that cause.

Dr. S. E. Bassett, a regular physician and surgeon of twenty years' practice, in his affidavit of date of April 2, 1883, states:

"He was first called to said soldier professionally about the 26th or 28th of September, 1875. I found him suffering severely from violent spasmodic contractions of the muscles of his left side, involving in a high degree the left shoulder armstrings and left limb, springing, jerking, rolling over in a most violent manner. I found upon a more thorough examination and inquiry (and agreeing with the highest medical authority) that the stump of left arm had not kindly healed by first intention, but had become irritated and inflamed, and thus the ends of the divided nerves of said left arm had participated in that inflammation, becoming badly and permanently diseased and with the general debility of his whole system. I found said diseased nerves of the said left-arm stump had produced partial reflex paralysis of the right side of said patient. That in my opinion the partial nervous paralysis of said soldier, Alemson G. Tanner, was caused by the diseased state of the nerves of his said left-arm stump."

This statement of the attending physician impresses the committee with the belief that the soldier's death was the result of his amputated arm, although the medical referee in the Pension Office fails so to consider. The evidence shows the beneficiary to be a poor and worthy woman, and whatever doubt there may be in the case we believe this woman is entitled to the benefit of it, and the committee report favorably and recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

RICHARD HOGAN.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 9253) granting an increase of pension to Richard Hogan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls the name of Richard Hogan, a private of Company B, First Regiment of United States Dragoons, in the war with Mexico, and grant him a pension of $30 a month from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the pension he now receives.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9253) granting an increase of pension to Richard Hogan, have considered the same and report as follows:

The claimant was a private in Company B, First United States Dragoons, for over two years, during the war with Mexico. He is in receipt of a pension at the rate of $8 per month under the Mexican service act of January 29, 1887.

He is seventy-four years of age, and totally blind from cataracts of both eyes. He claims that the disease was contracted during the war with Mexico, and, although he has furnished no evidence that said disease existed while he was in that service, he has shown by the testimony of three credible neighbors that he had disease of eyes in 1849, just after his return from service and during each year since.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. GEST. I do not see why $30 should be allowed in this case, while in the case I called up the pension was cut down to $15.

Mr. MATSON. Has the report been read?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. GEST. I move to make it $15 instead of $30.

Mr. MATSON. In the case to which the gentleman refers the woman was blind, but in this case it is the soldier who is blind. There is no doubt of this soldier's service or of his blindness. He was a private for over two years during the war with Mexico. It appears by the testimony of three credible neighbors that he had disease of the eyes in 1849 just after his return from the service and during each year since.

Mr. GEST. I withdraw the amendment reducing the pension to $15.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CASPAR BLANKE.

Mr. HERMANN. I ask consideration of the bill (S. 2833) granting a pension to Caspar Blanke, of Portland, Oregon.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Caspar Blanke, of Portland, Oregon, late of Company C, Fourteenth Regiment United States Infantry, at the rate of $72 per month.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2833) granting a pension to Caspar Blanke, have considered the same, and report it back to the House, recommending its passage.

The committee adopt as their report the statement of facts correctly set forth in the report of the Senate committee, as follows:

[Senate Report 1407, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2833) granting a pension to Caspar Blanke, have examined the same, and report:

This claimant was a private in Company E, Fourteenth Regiment United States regular infantry. He served a term of enlistment from 1876 to 1881, and again re-enlisted in 1881, serving until 1885, when he was discharged for disabilities under a surgeon's certificate. The disabilities were described as rheumatism, partial paralysis, and loss of sight, or double sight.

There is no doubt of the serious nature of these disabilities; that they were incurred by the claimant during the time of his service. They are called technically locomotor ataxia and ophthalmia. The patient at present and for a long time has been wholly blind in one eye, almost blind in the other—discerning light but not objects, and being unable to walk, except with assistance; wholly unable to perform manual labor, and most of the time requiring the attendance of a third person.

The claim has been rejected by the Pension Bureau upon the ground that these disabilities are the results of vice in the claimant, not incurred or incurrable in line of duty.

The medical referee of the Pension Office, after an examination of the papers (not the patient), says:

"I could not, therefore, say that syphilis could with safety be eliminated."

We think this rejection a mild one—a conclusion not very well or firmly assured. On the other side it is shown that four physicians—Wells, Wheeler, Tarlor, and Easton—of Portland, Oregon, where the claimant resides, testify upon a personal examination of the claimant that—

"He is not a syphilitic subject; that locomotor ataxia and blindness are the diseases to which he is subject, and that his disability therefrom is total."

These are known to be persons of credit and character, specialists in eye diseases, eminent in their practice and profession, totally disinterested.

Your committee think the disabilities mentioned were incurred by the claimant in the line of duty by reason of his military service, and therefore recommend passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM J. TONERAY.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 6344) granting a pension to William J. Toneray.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to inscribe on the pension-rolls the name of William J. Toneray, late a member of Company F, Second Tennessee Mounted Infantry, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6344) granting a pension to William J. Toneray, have considered the same, and report as follows:

The claimant was a private in Company F, Second Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, and served from May 20, 1862, to May 20, 1865. He has a record and was honorably discharged.

He claimed, in his declaration for pension, that he contracted a disease of the chest in October, 1862, which has affected him ever since, causing disease of heart.

His claim was rejected, July 13, 1885, on the ground that there is no record of disease of chest, and claimant was unable to furnish competent proof that the said disease was contracted in service and line of duty.

Your committee have examined the evidence in the claim, and from such examination believe that it has merit.

The certificate of the board of examining surgeons at Jonesborough, Tenn., shows that the man is disabled by disease of heart, believed to be fatty degeneration. There is bellows murmur at the apex.

Dr. J. H. Alexander, a United States examining surgeon at Elizabethtown, Tenn., testifies that he has treated claimant for disease of heart since 1872, and Dr. James M. Cameron testifies to treatment of claimant shortly after the war for phthisis.

Neighbors also testify to the continued existence of the disease since date of discharge.

Lieut. Col. R. R. Butler, Lieut. E. Wilmot, Sergt. D. B. Jenkins, John C. Smith, and several other comrades testify that they well remember that claimant was sick in service, and that he was affected by difficult breathing and a cough.

Some of the comrades who were seen by the special examiner of the Pension Bureau testify to the same effect.

That claimant had a long and honorable service is shown by the record; that he contracted disease of the heart therein is also proved beyond doubt, as well as the fact that it has existed ever since. He was sound at the time of his enlistment.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill, amended, however, by changing the method of spelling the claimant's surname, wherever it appears therein, from "Toneray" to "Toneray."

The amendments of the committee were agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to William Toncray, of Tennessee.

THEODORE LEWIS.

Mr. WILKINSON. I ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 10735) for the removal of the political disabilities of Theodore Lewis, of Louisiana.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That Theodore Lewis, of the State of Louisiana, is hereby relieved of all political disabilities imposed upon him by the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The report (by Mr. CULBERSON) is as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary having considered the bill (H. R. 10735) for the removal of the disabilities of Theodore Lewis, of Louisiana, and finding a petition from said Lewis, in due form, asking that his disabilities be removed, recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DULCENA NOEL.

Mr. CONGER. I ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 9341) granting a pension to Mrs. Dulcena Noel.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Dulcena Noel, as the dependent mother of William T. Noel, late a private in company—Seventeenth Iowa Volunteers, and pay her a pension, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. SPOONER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9341) granting a pension to Mrs. Dulcena Noel, respectfully report:

Mrs. Dulcena Noel is the widowed mother of William T. Noel, late a private in Company G, Seventeenth Regiment Iowa Volunteers, who died in said service May 6, 1862.

Her husband, George W. Noel, was a sergeant in Company H, Thirty-ninth Iowa Volunteers, and was killed in service, and she was granted a pension upon account of his death. She subsequently remarried, whereupon her said pension ceased.

This second marriage, however, proving an unfortunate one, she was divorced. She is now aged and poor, having an income of not over $50 per year.

Her said son, William T. Noel, was never married, and no one is now drawing or has ever drawn a pension upon his account.

Although by reason of the facts above stated and because Mrs. Noel's present dependence can not be traced back to the time of the death of her said son she has no standing for a claim for pension in the Pension Office, your committee, following their unvarying practice in such cases, and believing this dependent mother entitled to the relief sought, recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment: Insert the letter "G" in line 6 of the bill as printed.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had had under consideration various bills, and instructed him to report them with sundry recommendations.

HOUSE BILLS PASSED.

House bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House without amendment, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 10906) granting a pension to Fidel Gates;

A bill (H. R. 10414) granting a pension to Hannah L. Irwin;

A bill (H. R. 6001) granting a pension to Sarah J. Fraily;

A bill (H. R. 9653) granting a pension to Henry Alward, dependent father of Henry M. Alward;

A bill (H. R. 10525) increasing the pension of Edward Jardine;

A bill (H. R. 8534) granting a pension to Jacob Copes;

A bill (H. R. 9684) granting a pension to William J. Brown;

A bill (H. R. 10275) granting a pension to Joseph Hunter, M. D.;

A bill (H. R. 5446) granting a pension to William H. Dowdall;

A bill (H. R. 8545) for the relief of Samuel Purcell;

A bill (H. R. 10789) granting a pension to Philip Neuman;

A bill (H. R. 5525) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane Potts;

A bill (H. R. 4039) granting a pension to Mary Pfeiffer;

A bill (H. R. 10954) for the relief of Mary Ann Reid;

A bill (H. R. 204) granting a pension to Frederick C. Shaw;

A bill (H. R. 2120) granting a pension to Elizabeth Evans;

A bill (H. R. 10017) granting a pension to Samuel Anderson;

A bill (H. R. 4038) granting a pension to Victoria, Gertrude, Margaret, and Helen, minor children of Lieut. George R. McGuire;

A bill (H. R. 10705) granting a pension to Mary O. L. Tanner; and

A bill (H. R. 9253) granting an increase of pension to Richard Hogan.

House bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House with amendments, were severally taken up, the amendments concurred in, the bills as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed.

A bill (H. R. 8494) granting a pension to Gilbert Reed;

A bill (H. R. 2908) increasing the pension of W. B. Stokes;

A bill (H. R. 2139) granting a pension to George Rhody;

A bill (H. R. 9372) granting a pension to John Dean;

A bill (H. R. 4575) granting a pension to Michael Horgain;

A bill (H. R. 9717) for the relief of Thomas Shackelford.

A bill (H. R. 8889) granting a pension to Charles Molseed;

A bill (H. R. 9341) granting a pension to Dulcena Noel;

A bill (H. R. 10356) granting a pension to J. T. Vincent (the title was amended so as to conform to the bill); and

A bill (H. R. 6344) granting a pension to William J. Toneray (title amended so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to William J. Toncray").

JOSEPH T. GARRETT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House is the bill (H. R. 6501) granting a pension to Joseph T. Garrett. The question is on agreeing to the amendment made in the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. GEST. I ask unanimous consent to substitute "twenty" instead of the amendment to make it "fifteen," agreed upon in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

SENATE BILLS PASSED.

Senate bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House without amendment, were severally ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed:

A bill (S. 3219) increasing the pension of Keyes P. Cool;

A bill (S. 1162) for the relief of Susan E. Alger;

A bill (S. 2500) granting a pension to Gertrude K. Lyford;

A bill (S. 2724) for the relief of H. Harper;

A bill (S. 2118) granting a pension to Richard H. Van Dorin; and

A bill (S. 2833) granting a pension to Casper Blanke, of Portland, Oregon.

The bill (S. 2106) granting a pension to William Kelsey was reported from the Committee of the Whole House with amendment. The amendment was concurred in, and the bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THEODORE LEWIS.

The bill (H. R. 10735) for the removal of the political disabilities of Theodore Lewis, of Louisiana, reported from the Committee of the Whole House without amendment, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative).

Mr. MATSON moved to reconsider the several votes by which the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The hour of 10.30 o'clock p. m. having arrived, in accordance with the previous order, the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. W. C. P. BRECKINRIDGE: A bill (H. R. 11143) for the benefit of William Burton—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11144) for the benefit of A. W. Harper—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. POST: A bill (H. R. 11145) granting a pension to George W. Gibson—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RICHARDSON: A bill (H. R. 11146) for the relief of Collin Adams—to the Committee on War Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ABBOTT: Petition of citizens of Hill County, Texas, relating to interstate commerce—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. J. M. ALLEN: Petition of W. F. Dilworth, heir of Susan F. Dilworth; and of Sarah J. Ragan, widow of George W. Ragan, of Mississippi, for reference of their claims to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BANKHEAD: Petition of John E. Cooner, heir of Samuel E. Cooner; of T. C. B. Morrow; of E. W. Wright; of William B. Day; and of Joseph B. Ferguson, heir of Joseph Ferguson, of Alabama, for reference of their claims to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BARNES: Petition of depositors of the Freedman's Bank, residing in Augusta, Ga., for the passage of the bill making an appropriation for settlement with the depositors—to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. BAYNE: Resolutions of Fort Pitt Council, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Allegheny, Pa., in favor of Senate bill 553—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. T. H. B. BROWNE: Petition of John L. P. Hopkins, of Accomac County, Virginia, for reference of his claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HEARD: Petition of 26 citizens of the Sixth district of Missouri, for prohibition in the District of Columbia—to the Select Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

By Mr. HOLMAN: Papers from Jacob Berger, Fred. Berger, and William Young, of St. Croix Falls, Wis., in relation to the railroad grant from St. Croix River to Bayfield, Wis., and praying for relief—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. MILLIKEN: Petition of Rev. E. M. Fowler and 44 others, citizens of the Third district of Maine, for prohibition in the District of Columbia—to the Select Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

By Mr. PETERS: Petition of Board of Trade of Liberal, Kans., favoring legislation for "No Man's Land"—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. RICE: Petition of 56 citizens of Ramsey County, Minnesota, for amendment of sections 3 and 10 of the interstate-commerce law—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. J. D. STEWART: Petition of Louisa Walker, of Fulton, Ga., for reference of her claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WHEELER: Petition of heirs of M. W. Roach, of Jackson County, Alabama, for reference of their claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WHITTHORNE: Petition of S. A. Carroll, administrator of John A. Hagan, of Lawrence County, Tennessee, for relief—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. W. L. WILSON: Petition of C. B. Wentzell, president of Jefferson County School Board; of Alexander Murphy, and of A. M. Sponseller, of Jefferson County, West Virginia, for reference of their claims to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

SENATE.

MONDAY, August 13, 1888.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

RAILWAY MAIL TRANSPORTATION DEFICIENCY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Postmaster-General, submitting an estimate of a deficiency in the appropriation for railway mail transportation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, of $562,482; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented the petition of Titus Hutchinson, of Lyndon, Caledonia County, Vermont, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PASCO. I present certain papers relating to the claim of the heirs of Dr. Henry E. Perrine, now pending before the Committee on Public Lands. I move that the papers be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH presented a petition of the Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Washington Territory, praying that an appropriation be made for head-stones for ex-Union soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present the petition of Mrs. Sarah A. Woodbridge, praying for a pension, accompanied with proofs and papers. In connection with this petition, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the vote by which the bill (S. 3276) granting restoration of pension to Sarah A. Woodbridge, on the report of the Committee on Pensions, was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered, and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions with the papers I now present, which furnish the proof the committee called for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed will be reconsidered if there be no objection, and the bill, together with the petition and accompanying papers, will be referred to the Committee on Pensions. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 71) providing for the ascertainment and report by the Secretary of State of the claim of the legal representatives of Walter H. Stevens, deceased, to report the same back, and ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution, and that it, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, which, as the Committee on the Judiciary thinks, is the proper and regular committee for the consideration of matters of that nature.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. TURPIE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 4855) granting a pension to Jacob Newhard;

A bill (H. R. 5529) granting a pension to Flora Heath;

A bill (H. R. 549) granting a pension to Joseph S. Wilson; and

A bill (H. R. 8571) granting a pension to Margaret J. McQuary.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 401) for the relief of Col. Daniel McClure, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WALTHALL. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands to report an original joint resolution, and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for its immediate consideration. I will state that the matter can be disposed of in a moment, the object of the joint resolution being to remove a doubt as to the construction of a joint resolution heretofore passed at this session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read at length for information, subject to objection.

The joint resolution (S. R. 103) to construe joint resolution of May 14, 1888, as amended by joint resolution of July 16, 1888, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the joint resolution approved May 14, 1888, entitled "Joint resolution relating to the disposal of public lands in certain States," as amended by the joint resolution approved July 16, 1888, shall not be construed so as to deny to any State the right to select lands in place, or indemnity lands, in accordance with existing laws making land grants to States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that had better be printed and go over. It covers a very important subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7013) to place the name of Delia Newman on the pension-roll, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 8885) granting a pension to Eliza A. Woods;

A bill (H. R. 10607) granting a pension to Rachel Morgan;

A bill (H. R. 9228) for the relief of Nathan Cook; and

A bill (H. R. 9227) for the relief of Mary Newton.

Mr. PADDOCK, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7410) for the relief of settlers upon Old Camp Sheridan military reservation, reported it without amendment.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10082) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of the widow and orphan children of Col. William R. McKee, late of Lexington, Ky.," reported it without amendment.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3419) providing for an additional associate justice of the supreme court of Idaho, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

ATTENDANTS AT INSANE HOSPITAL.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask unanimous consent at this time to have the Senate reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. 7785) for the relief of the attendants on the insane at Hospital for the Insane in the District of Columbia, which was reported on Friday last, was indefinitely postponed, and then I shall move that it be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRIS. There is no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed will be reconsidered, if there be no objection, and the bill referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 3434) to prohibit bridges over navigable streams of the United States without consent of Congress; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, introduced a bill (S. 3435) granting a pension to J. D. Haworth; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

OVERHEAD ELECTRIC WIRES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, directed to inform the Senate as soon as may be, whether, since the 1st day of January, 1888, they have granted any permit or given any other authority for the erection of overhead electric wires of any kind in any of the avenues, streets, or alleys of Washington or Georgetown, and if so, in what instances, for what purposes, and under what authority.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I just wish to say that my attention was attracted to this subject by seeing an article in a newspaper in this city within two or three days stating that the commissioners had granted a permit for some overhead electric wire (I think a motive-power wire, instead of a light wire, which would of course carry a very heavy charge of electricity) somewhere on New York avenue. I had supposed that both Houses of Congress were of opinion, as every other sensible person ought to be, that the erection of overhead electric wires of any kind in this city any more was to be stopped entirely, and I was very much surprised at that statement. I hope it is not true. This resolution is intended to get the earliest information possible in order to see if we can prevent any more overhead business of that kind.

The resolution was agreed to.

REGISTRATION AND ELECTIONS IN NEW YORK.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] coming over from a previous day.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. EDMUNDS August 10, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all correspondence and communications passing between the Department of Justice, or any officer thereof, and any officer under the Government of the United States in the State of New York, since the 1st day of January, 1887, on the subject of registration, elections, or any matters connected therewith, or with the conduct, duties, or powers of any such officer in respect of registration or election matters.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator from Vermont, in order that there may be no possible doubt about the force of the resolution, to put after the word "powers" the words "or compensation," if he has no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not, if I understand the suggestion. Will the Senator state it again so that the clerks will get it?

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to put after the word "powers" the words "or compensation." I am informed that the Department of Justice refused to execute the law in regard to security of elections by refusing the compensation provided by law for officers on those duties. There was a correspondence between Mr. Garland and one of my colleagues in the other House, Dr. DAVIS, last year on that subject, which was printed as an executive document. I wish to know whether they still adhere to that practice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. Before the word "powers," in the last line but one, strike out the word "or," and after the word "powers" insert "or compensation;" so as to read:

Or with the conduct, duties, powers, or compensation of any such officer in respect of registration or election matters.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is right. I accept the amendment.

I wish to state (and I hope my information is incorrect) that in this year of our Lord, 1888, and in the month of July last past, a high officer of the Government, an officer of the Department of Justice, it is alleged, has undertaken in advance to inform the supervisor of elections of members of Congress, etc., in the city of New York, or some other officer of that nature if that be not his title, that while the statute authorizes that supervisor appointed by the courts of the United States there to perform his duties during a whole period of ten days connected with the election of members of Congress, he will only be paid for five days.

If that statement be true, which I most earnestly hope it is not, it would seem to require some explanation from the Department of Justice in respect of what authority it claims to have in determining how long an officer shall be paid for a service that the statute imposes upon him, the length of time being fixed by the statute during which he is to perform that service, and the law saying that he shall be paid for it.

In other words, I should be glad to know, if this statement be true (and I hope it is not), where the Department of Justice or any other Department gets its authority to undertake to begin to squeeze or otherwise operate over the discretion of officers provided for by law and appointed by the courts in the discharge of their duties.

It has been stated in some public declaration of a powerful party, I believe, that the franchise is a right of all rights fundamental, and that it ought to be pure, and that it ought to be secure, and guarded against fraud or violence. So, as I say, I am bound to imagine that these published statements imputing to the Department of Justice or any of its officers an attempt to begin to exercise a discretionary, coercive, or even persuasive control over the discharge of the duties of these officers appointed by the courts in respect of that most sacred right are entirely an error. If the fact be otherwise, I think the sooner we find it out the better.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont if the law compels these officers to be appointed for ten days, or the time named, and to remain on duty all that time, or is there a discretion as to the number of days not exceeding ten?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The law authorizes the circuit court or a circuit judge to appoint these officers. Being appointed, the law itself imputes to them their functions and says that they are to be performed, if I correctly remember, within the period of ten days. It does not confer, and it did not intend to confer—it would have been an outrage if it had conferred—upon the Attorney-General of the United States or the Solicitor-General or the President or any other executive officer the right in any manner to interfere with the performance of those duties by threats, by disallowing accounts, or any other sort of control over them.

The law says they shall be paid. The law does not direct a judge of the United States to hold court for any particular length of time; and it would be a very extraordinary thing for the Attorney-General or the Solicitor-General to send to the district attorney or the marshal, officers who by law are under his supervision, a statement, "If you attend this term of the court, which the law says you are to attend, for more than five days, you will not have the allowance that the law says you shall have for attending court." That would be a gross usurpation, as I take it everybody would admit.

In this case, if I correctly understand the law, and I think I do, the Attorney-General of the United States has no more authority over these supervisors of election than I have, and he ought to have less, because I could only appeal to them in my character and sense and situation as a citizen to urge them to perform their duties, while a great official at the head of the Department and having a particular bias might approach them in a different way.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator how many subordinates these supervisors can appoint; whether there is any limit to the number they can appoint? I simply desire to say that, as I understand, without ever having seen what has been done or having examined the law since this question has come up, the Attorney-General may have designated the length of time during which these multitudinous employés should be upon duty. If he has done that, I apprehend he has done simply his duty, and that when the report comes in he will show a full, just, and legal ground for having done so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I certainly hope it may be so, whatever is done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] having been accepted by the mover of the resolution, is the Senate ready for the question on the adoption of the resolution?

The resolution was agreed to.

JACKSON (MISS.) MUNICIPAL ELECTION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? If there be none, that order is closed.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate proceed——

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the Senator from Maine to yield to me just a moment. I desire to state that on next Thursday, if the business of the Senate will allow, it is my purpose, after the morning business shall have been closed, to call up for the consideration of the Senate the resolutions reported from the Committee on the Judiciary relative to the alleged suppression of the vote of colored citizens at Jackson, Miss.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 204) granting a pension to Frederick C. Shaw;

A bill (H. R. 793) for the relief of William Collins;

A bill (H. R. 1029) for the relief of J. S. Flake, guardian of Samuel Howard;

A bill (H. R. 1067) to amend the war record of Alfred H. Thomas, deceased;

A bill (H. R. 1073) for the relief of the Roman Catholic Church of St. Peter and St. Paul, at Chattanooga, Tenn.;

A bill (H. R. 2120) granting a pension to Elizabeth Evans;

A bill (H. R. 2139) granting a pension to George Rhody;

A bill (H. R. 2661) for the relief of James Caler;

A bill (H. R. 2908) to increase the pension of W. B. Stokes;

A bill (H. R. 4038) granting a pension to Victoria, Gertrude, Margaret, and Helen, minor children of Lieut. George R. McGuire;

A bill (H. R. 4039) granting a pension to Mary Pfeiffer;

A bill (H. R. 4575) granting a pension to Michael Hargain;

A bill (H. R. 5446) granting a pension to William H. Dowdall;

A bill (H. R. 5525) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane Potts;

A bill (H. R. 6001) granting a pension to Sarah J. Fraily;

A bill (H. R. 6347) for the relief of Alexander Moffitt;

A bill (H. R. 6501) to grant a pension to Joseph F. Garrett;

A bill (H. R. 8494) granting a pension to Gilbert Reed;

A bill (H. R. 8534) granting a pension to Jacob Copes;

A bill (H. R. 8545) for the relief of Samuel Purcell;

A bill (H. R. 8889) granting a pension to Charles Molseed;

A bill (H. R. 9253) granting an increase of pension to Richard Hogan;

A bill (H. R. 9341) granting a pension to Mrs. Dulcena Noel;

A bill (H. R. 9372) granting a pension to John Dean;

A bill (H. R. 9464) for the relief of Hudson G. Lamkin;

A bill (H. R. 9653) granting a pension to Henry Alward, dependent father of Henry M. Alward;

A bill (H. R. 9684) granting a pension to William J. Brown;

A bill (H. R. 9717) for the relief of Thomas Shackelford;

A bill (H. R. 10017) granting a pension to Samuel Anderson;

A bill (H. R. 10275) granting a pension to Joseph Hunter, M. D.;

A bill (H. R. 10356) granting a pension to John T. Vincent;

A bill (H. R. 10418) granting a pension to Hannah L. Irwin;

A bill (H. R. 10525) to increase the pension of Edward Jardine;

A bill (H. R. 10705) granting a pension to Mary L. Tanner;

A bill (H. R. 10735) for the removal of the political disabilities of Theodore Lewis, of Louisiana;

A bill (H. R. 10789) granting a pension to Philip Neuman;

A bill (H. R. 10906) granting a pension to Fidel Gates;

A bill (H. R. 10954) for the relief of Mary Ann Reid; and

A bill (H. R. 11007) for the relief of the Catholic Church at Macon City, Mo.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution:

A bill (S. 1162) for the relief of Susan E. Alger;

A bill (S. 2118) granting a pension to Richard H. Van Dorin;

A bill (S. 2500) granting a pension to Gertrude K. Lyford;

A bill (S 2724) for the relief of H. Helper;

A bill (S. 2833) granting a pension to Caspar Blanke, of Portland, Oregon;

A bill (S. 3219) to increase the pension of Keyes P. Cool; and Joint resolution (S. R. 62) in recognition of the services of Joseph Francis.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2106) granting a pension to William Kelsey, with an amendment in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8662) to accept and ratify an agreement made with the Shoshone and Bannock Indians, for the surrender and relinquishment to the United States of a portion of the Fort Hall reservation, in the Territory of Idaho, for the purposes of a town site, and for the grant of a right of way through said reservation to the Utah and Northern Railway Company, and for other purposes; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PEEL, Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi, and Mr. PERKINS, managers at the conference on the part of the House.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the fisheries treaty with open doors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule VIII being in order, the Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now in open executive session. If there be no objection, the reading of the Journal of the last open executive session will be dispensed with. The Executive Clerk will report the treaty by title.

The EXECUTIVE CLERK. Treaty between the United States and Great Britain concerning the interpretation of the convention of October 20, 1818, signed at Washington February 15, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to postpone the further consideration of this treaty until the Wednesday after the first Monday in December next.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, it has not been my purpose to enter into the discussion of this treaty, but I am impelled to do so from the fact that the State which I in part represent has a seacoast from the Atlantic to the Gulf of Mexico of nearly 1,400 miles. That seacoast abounds in fish; and the privileges of the fisheries upon the Atlantic and the Gulf coast of Florida are of very great value, and are destined in the future to become still more valuable. In that point of view the principles upon which the fishery rights shall be decided by our Government in its relations with others becomes a question of very great importance.

This subject has been alluded to in the discussions which have already taken place before the Senate. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], in his speech a few days ago, made the following observations:

> Do not the merits of this treaty affect just as much all the fishermen along the Southern coast and the Gulf of Mexico and the Pacific Ocean as the fishermen of New England? There are provisions of this treaty, including the fifteenth article, so wide-reaching that if adopted they would in their consequences open the ports of the Southern States to every Canadian vessel that chose to come into your ports to fish in your waters. It would open all that vast fishery on the Pacific, infinitely more valuable than the Newfoundland fishery has ever been, to the depredations of people from British Columbia. It would open up controversy there. It is just as important to the people of Ohio as to any other, although we have few fishermen there and do not care who furnish our fish.

If that be so it is a just ground of objection to this treaty. The fifteenth article of the treaty is as follows:

> ARTICLE XV.
>
> Whenever the United States shall remove the duty from fish-oil, whale-oil, seal-oil, and fish of all kinds (except fish preserved in oil), being the produce of fisheries carried on by the fishermen of Canada and Newfoundland, including Labrador, as well as from the usual and necessary casks, barrels, kegs, cans, and other usual and necessary coverings containing the products above mentioned, the like products, being the produce of fisheries carried on by the fishermen of the United States, as well as the usual and necessary coverings of the same, as above described, shall be admitted free of duty into the Dominion of Canada and Newfoundland.
>
> And upon such removal of duties, and while the aforesaid articles are allowed to be brought into the United States by British subjects, without duty being reimposed thereon, the privilege of entering the ports, bays, and harbors of the aforesaid coasts of Canada and Newfoundland shall be accorded to United States fishing vessels by annual licenses, free of charge for the following purposes, namely:
> 1. The purchase of provisions, bait, ice, seines, lines, and all other supplies and outfits.
>
> 2. Transshipment of catch, for transport by any means of conveyance.
>
> 3. Shipping of crews.
>
> Supplies shall not be obtained by barter, but bait may be so obtained.
>
> The like privileges shall be continued or given to fishing vessels of Canada and of Newfoundland on the Atlantic coasts of the United States.

I do not so interpret this treaty, Mr. President. The "like privileges" manifestly refer to the first, second, third, and fourth specifications of this article, the purchase of provisions, the transshipment of catch, the shipping of crews. I do not understand that by any just construction of this treaty, either of the twelfth or fifteenth article, or of both, it is true that it would admit to any other than the enumerated privileges the fishing vessels of Canada on the coast and in the bays and harbors of the United States.

In the construction of this treaty and in the negotiation of any treaty, it is quite manifest that it should be framed with reference to the principles which are of importance to the interests of the people of the United States, not only in respect to the particular subject-matter of negotiation, but with reference to the general and future interests of the country. This treaty in relation to the contention between the United States and Great Britain in respect to the fishery rights in her North American provinces, if adjusted upon principles which surrender the jurisdictional rights of the United States, would be objectionable even though it might furnish a measure of relief in respect of the rights involved as between the Canadian provinces and the United States. It is, therefore, I think, in this point of view that this treaty must have its principal consideration.

This treaty, therefore, is to be considered not alone in reference to the settlement of the troubles on the Northeast coast as between the Provinces and the United States in respect to the fisheries upon that coast and upon the bays, creeks, harbors, and the high seas, but in reference to its future relations to the coasts of the United States, to its great fisheries; and it is for the reason that the treaty preserves the jurisdictional sovereignty of the United States over our own dominions and does not concede the right to any foreign government to demand any share or any participation in them that the treaty presents itself in a favorable view to my mind.

The proposition that this treaty opens our Southern waters to Canadian fishing ships is without any foundation in my judgment. The treaty says:

Whereas differences have arisen concerning the interpretation of Article I of the convention of October 20, 1818, the United States of America and Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, being mutually desirous of removing all causes of misunderstanding in relation thereto, and of promoting friendly intercourse and good neighborhood between the United States and the possessions of Her Majesty in North America, have resolved to conclude a treaty to that end.

The objects of the treaty are the promotion of friendly intercourse and good neighborhood between the United States and the possessions of Her Majesty in North America. The twelfth article, which has been the source of this claim that the treaty opened the coasts and inshore fisheries all along the Atlantic and the Gulf coasts of the United States to the Canadian ships, is as follows:

ARTICLE XII.

Fishing vessels of Canada and Newfoundland shall have on the Atlantic coast of the United States all the privileges reserved and secured by this treaty to United States fishing vessels in the aforesaid waters of Canada and Newfoundland.

What privileges are reserved to United States fishing vessels in the waters of Canada and Newfoundland? The limited and restricted privileges defined in this treaty, and none other; no fishing privileges whatever, but simply defining the privileges acquired under the treaty of 1818, prescribing in definite terms and in a manner which can not be mistaken, the ground for the exclusive right of fishery on the part of the United States, and modifying the conditions upon which vessels engaged in fishing shall be allowed privileges in the ports of the North American colonies, namely: The purchase of provisions, bait, ice, seines, all other supplies and outfits—transshipment of catch for transport by any means of conveyance—shipping of crews.

How then can it be said with this express limitation of the privileges conferred upon vessels of the United States in Canadian waters, that there is any grant whatever to Canadian fishing vessels of rights and privileges to catch fish in the waters of the United States upon the Atlantic and Gulf coast? I think, Mr. President, that this ground of objection to this treaty is without force. But what is the contention? It is that in the treaty of 1783, as the majority report states it, "property rights" were conferred upon the United States in the jurisdictional waters of the British Empire in her North American provinces. I take issue with that proposition.

I think it is a bad precedent to establish. If it could possibly be true that the jurisdictional sovereign power of a government over its own waters could be dispossessed by a right of property given under a treaty, whether it be termed a right or a privilege, I affirm if the United States to-day were to make a treaty with Spain or with England by which the fisheries upon the shore of the coast of Florida within 3 miles of our coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks, might be used by the subjects of either of those governments, that it would convey no property right, that it would not disturb the jurisdiction of this Government. It would be a right resting in treaty, understood to be, and properly understood to be, subject at all times when the convenience or the interests of this sovereignty demanded it to be repealed or set aside, and it would be the duty of this Government, as it would be the understanding of the contracting parties by virtue of the fact of the entire sovereignty of the Government of the United States over its own soil and its own territorial waters, to terminate that right whenever the interests of this people demanded it.

But the contention of the majority report is that the treaty of 1783 conferred a property right which was subject to revocation, and was not subject to the continuous power of Great Britain. The proposition is untenable, Mr. President. The position of Great Britain on this subject is well stated in the correspondence in the American State Papers, and is precisely the position which the United States and every sovereign government must take in regard to their own territory.

In the letter of Lord Bathurst of October 30, 1815, to Mr. Adams, he says:

The minister of the United States appears to be well aware that Great Britain has always considered the liberty formerly enjoyed by the United States of fishing within British limits and using British territory as derived from the third article of the treaty of 1783, and from that alone, and that the claim of an independent state to occupy and use at its discretion any portion of the territory of another without compensation or corresponding indulgence can not rest on any other foundation than conventional stipulation.

* * * * * * *

To a proposition of this novel nature Great Britain can not accede. * * * Nor can she consider any one state at liberty to assign to a treaty made with her such a peculiarity of character as shall make it as to duration an exception to all other treaties, in order to found on a peculiarity thus assumed an irrevocable title to all indulgences which have all the features of temporary concessions. * * * The grant of the liberty (to fish) has all the aspects of a policy temporary and experimental, depending on the use that might be made of it in the consideration of the islands and places where it was to be exercised, and the more general conveniences or inconveniences in a military, naval, or commercial point of view, resulting from the access of an independent nation to such islands and places.

The result of this correspondence was the following letter from James Monroe, President of the United States:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 27, 1816.

It appears that * * * although the British Government denies our right of taking, curing, and drying fish within their jurisdiction, and on the coast of the British provinces in North America, it is willing to secure to our citizens the liberty stipulated by the treaty of 1783, under such regulations as will secure the benefit to both parties and prevent smuggling of goods in the British provinces by our vessels * * * and the signing of the treaty of 1818.

It thus appears that the treaty of 1818 was accepted by our Government with the knowledge that Great Britain would not consent to any other interpretatian of this question than that stated by Lord Bathurst. In American State Papers, Foreign Relations, volume 4, page 373, will be found this letter from Mr. Adams, Secretary of State:

The President authorizes you to agree to an article whereby the United States will desist from the liberty of fishing and curing and drying fish within the British jurisdiction generally upon conditions * * * and the privilege of entering for shelter, wood, and water in all the British harbors of North America.

This letter settles the point as to the extent and meaning of the renunciation as to "bays."

But the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] bases his argument in this case, notwithstanding these facts and notwithstanding the incontrovertible propositions confirmed by history, by the concurrent opinions of the ablest statesmen of New England—by Mr. Webster, by Mr. Adams preceding him, by the history and experience of this Government for three-quarters of a century—the Senator from Ohio claims that by international law the waters upon the coast of Canada and upon the coast and bays of the United States, within 3 marine miles, are the public ocean, the common property of mankind, and that this principle of international law enters into the bays over 6 miles wide, and that they are high seas, the common property, the public ocean, the highway of all nations.

If that be true the inshore sea fisheries in my own State between Key West and the mainland, 60 miles out in the open Gulf, and, connected by a chain of keys, the wide bays and estuaries which are to be found on the Atlantic coast, the indentations of the coast which were claimed by all the earlier precedents to be within the jurisdiction of this Government by a line drawn frow Key West to Mobile, Pensacola, or New Orleans—all these are public property open to everybody; to the people of Spain and all nations. There is no exclusive right in the American fishermen upon the coasts of the Northwest in Alaska, in all the great seas and inland waters there.

If the contention of the Senator from Ohio is right, we surrender all this vast line of territorial possession and jurisdiction. To my mind the treaty that asserts the jurisdictional power and the exclusive right of the Government of the United States and the people of the United States to this vast inland shore and sea fishery is to be commended, and there is a principle of jurisdictional right far more important than to give the inshore fisheries of the Gulf of St. Lawrance and the North American British colonies to the fishermen of this country. The one would be a fatal surrender; the other is a recognition of a principle of sovereign territorial jurisdiction and exclusive right which is beneficent and necessary to the preservation of the rights of this people.

Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio is wrong in his contention. There is no such principle of international law, and there never was, that in waters inclosed within the dominions of a country the shores to within 3 miles of the coast were the common property of nations, the high seas, the public ocean. I challenge the production of any respectable authority to prove that at any time since history began there has ever been a recognition of that proposition. It is true that upon the coasts of the ocean generally, without reference to the clausum mare or the principle of inter fauces terræ or the waters inclosed within the jurisdiction of a sovereign power—it is true that outside of these limitations, as a rule of convenience, the jurisdictional power of a country has ordinarily been held to extend to the distance of a cannon shot, or a marine league, or 3 miles from the shore; sometimes one and sometimes the other.

In the second volume of Grotius, an authority, as we know, most highly respected and cited by all tribunals which have been engaged in the settlement of disputed points of international law for centuries, we have the following:

By this instance it seems to appear that the property and dominion of the sea should belong to him who is in possession of the lands on both sides; though it be open above as a gulf, or above and below as the straits, provided it is not so great a part of the sea that when compared with the lands on both sides it can not be supposed to be some part of them. And now, what is thus lawful to one king or people may be also lawful to two or three, if they make themselves masters of the sea betwixt them at one and the same time, and agree upon the terms of property; for it is in this manner that rivers running through lands of two different nations have first been possessed by both and then divided.

* * * * * * *

Now, it may very easily be that the sole jurisdiction or sovereignty over some part of the sea may be held without any other property. Nor do I think that that law of nations, of which we have spoken, does any ways oppose or contradict it. The Argives did formerly complain of the Athenians, that they suffered the Spartans, who were their enemies, to pass unmolested through their seas, looking upon this as a breach of a contract that was betwixt them, in which it was decreed that no one people should permit or tolerate the enemies of the other to pass, διὰ τῆς ἑαυτῶν, through any part of their jurisdiction.

* * * * * * *

The Romans, therefore, Salust, Flora, Mela, and others, call all the sea with the strait's mouth theirs; but Dionysius Halicarnassensis adds more, πάσης κρατεῖ θαλάσσης, etc. They (the Roman people) command every sea, not only that within Hercules's Pillars, but the whole ocean, too, as far as it is possible to be sailed on. And Dion Cassius, speaking of them, πασης σχεδὸν βασιλευοντες γῆς κὶ θαλάσσης, governing almost every land and sea.

And this proposition has been followed by the experience of nations. Thus in the Hellespont from the days of Constantine a tax was imposed upon all shipping under the Roman Emperor. The sea inclosed by Turkey's dominions, a vast sea, has been until recently, when Russia has acquired a portion of those, held to be a mare clausum, with rights acquired by the consent of the Turkish Empire.

So, Mr. President, when we came to treat of this question, as shown by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], in the treaty of Utrecht, this rule was followed by the express affirmation of Great Britain and Spain and France, although, as Bancroft states, the fisheries upon the northeast in the great banks had been resorted to by the Normans and various other people in the earliest part of the sixteenth century, yet these three maritime nations, then holding rights prescribed by the Pope of Rome, except England, and acknowledging the jurisdiction of the Supreme Pontiff to prescribe territorial limits and boundaries, affirmed in the treaty of Utrecht that these were territorial rights depending upon the nearest soil, and that they were transferred to and dependent on it and became a part of the dominion of Great Britain. It was precisely in the line of this precedent which had come down from the days of the old Roman Empire, which had been a part of the Carthaginian law, as stated in the instance cited by Grotius, and which had continued to be recognized as a proper rule of action between nations up to that period of time, confused and uncertain as were then the rules upon which international rights were predicated; but it is sufficient for this proposition to affirm that the Government of Great Britain, which then represented the colonies, affirmed the principle of a territorial possession and an exclusive sovereignty over these fisheries.

When we came to negotiate the treaty of 1783—I will not weary the Senate by reading what has been read, which I have before me—Mr. Adams's express declaration was that these rights were not claimed under international law, but were claimed as the peculiar and exclusive territorial right of Great Britain. It is true that the French minister, as is stated in Bancroft's History perhaps a little more succinctly than anywhere else, did in that negotiation, while objecting to what he regarded as the persistent demands of the colonies for an extension of their fishery rights, declare that it did not matter what should be the action of the commissioners upon that subject or what should be the provision of the treaty, because he said by the international law the fisheries upon the ocean were public property and would be so regarded, not then regarding the question of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors, or the inshore fisheries.

To the end that we may have, Mr. President, a little insight into the view which was taken of this subject by our forefathers and by the representatives of this Government in their negotiation with Great Britain in the treaty of peace of 1783, I read from Bancroft's History:

In the hope of a settlement, Parliament was prorogued to the 5th of December. On the same day on which the final instructions to Oswald were written, Vergennes declared in a letter to Luzerne: "There exists in our treaties no condition which obliges the King to prolong the war in order to sustain the ambitious pretensions which the United States may form in reference to the fishery or the extent of boundaries."

In spite of all the cajoleries which the English ministers lavish on the Americans, I do not promise myself they will show themselves ready to yield either in regard to the fisheries or in regard to the boundaries as the American commissioners understand them. This last subject may be arranged by mutual sacrifices and compensations. But as to the first, in order to form a settled judgment on the probable issue it would be necessary to know what the Americans understand by the fishery. If it is the drift fishery on banks remote from the coast, it seems to me a natural right; but if they pretend to the fisheries as they exercised them by the title of English subjects, do they in the name of justice think to obtain rights attached to the condition of subjects which they renounce? France would not prolong the war to secure to the Americans the back lands and the fisheries.

It was in this spirit and with this feeling that the assent of France was obtained in the negotiation of the treaty of 1783, and the provision relating to the fisheries as contained in that treaty was due to Benjamin Franklin, who said:

This was, after a great deal of conversation, agreed to by John Adams, as well as his colleagues, upon condition that the American fishermen should be allowed to dry their fish on any unsettled parts of the coast of Nova Scotia.

Franklin said further:

I observe as to catching fish you mention only the banks of Newfoundland. Why not all other places, and among others the Gulf of St. Lawrence? Are you afraid there are not fish enough, or that we should catch too many, at the same time that you know that we shall bring the greatest part of the money we get for that fish to Great Britain for your manufactures?

It was upon this argument and the urgency of the French minister and the French Government that Great Britain made this grant of—what? Not of a property right, binding herself not to exercise sovereign power and jurisdiction over these fisheries whatever, but of rights in the sense of a right existing under and by the provisions of this treaty and under the incentives of these arguments of mutual interest, of the expenditure of the proceeds in the commercial relations and business of the former colonies, then to be an independent nation, and Great Britain, as a wise public policy for herself, grants this liberty or privilege to us, holding unaffected her absolute sovereignty over the right thus given.

In the discussion which occurred here some days ago the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] asked the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] if he understood any one to assert that this fishery claim of the United States was predicated upon a disturbance of the jurisdictional sovereignty of Great Britain in these waters? Mr. President, it can be predicated, in my judgment, on nothing else. If it be a property right, if it be a right to the water and to the fisheries, then it is a right which can not be disturbed without condemnation or without voluntary sale; and if it be a property right in the sense that Great Britain may at any time determine it when the interests of her sovereign power, her commercial interests, or her people may demand it, in what respect does it differ from an easement or a privilege or any other term—a liberty existing by a treaty, subject at all times to be determined by her?

Mr. President, in my judgment this treaty is to be regarded from a different point of view. We have passed the days when treaties are to be made upon the basis of advantages to be gained by one people over another. We have passed the day when international relations are to be considered in the light of extortions by one people from another. We are commanded by the spirit of the age and the interests of this generation and of the great public policies which have grown up, to treat this subject in a different form, not in the shape of national prejudice or the shape of supposed exclusive and peculiar rights, but upon ideas which are of a broader significance and a wider influence. A very gifted man, a son of New England, richly endowed for the investigation of great public questions, a student contributing much to the advancement of the human race in his day and generation, has written in a recent number of a popular magazine, the Forum, for August, a few words which I think may have a proper application to this treaty, and which I cite for the purpose of vindicating the President, whose dignified message presenting this treaty has been read, and the Secretary of State under whose influence and by whose eminent ability this treaty has been negotiated. Mr. Edward Atkinson, in the August number of the Forum, writes as follows:

As it has become more and more fully admitted in political science that each man, each race, each state, each nation, serves the other by exchange, the pressure of want has been diminished, and one can dimly foresee the time when the prophecy of the poet may become a living truth, when—

"Down the dark future, through long generations,
The echoing sounds of war grow fainter and then cease."

Again he writes:

When the day dawns in which the English-speaking peoples of the world may become united under a system which shall give to every man the utmost liberty consistent with the rights of his fellow-men; when national prejudice is abated, and the whole great body moves onward in its efforts to benefit the people of the world by mutual service, the word will then go forth to all other nations, disarm or starve. The Statue of Liberty which stands at the mouth of the great harbor of our country may then, in truth, enlighten the world. This is the vision which lies back of the dry columns of figures, and which brings the imagination into play on the part of him who can read between their lines.

Mr. President, this treaty is thus to be regarded. It must stand or it must fall as it is in correspondence with these great principles of industrial life, of popular comfort, of the well-being not only of ourselves but of those who are our neighbors and of the world. Let us see then on the one side, notwithstanding our own example, notwithstanding the Senator from Ohio, the Senator from Massachusetts, the Senator from Vermont, who has led the Republican party for so many years, have advised and consented to the public action of this Government in the treaty of 1871, and in acquiescence for this long period of time in the provisions of the treaty of 1818, notwithstanding the President has been advised by the authority of Daniel Webster, by the authority of John Quincy Adams, to make a treaty by which the rights of American fishermen should be prescribed and limited—it does not matter how prescribed and limited—by which the jurisdictional sovereignty of Great Britain over these North American British coasts, seas, gulfs, and harbors should be affirmed and acknowledged; notwithstanding our example in the initiation of our independence in 1783 in asking Great Britain, not an international right but a concession of privilege, and notwithstanding we repudiated expressly the idea that we were claiming what the French negotiators sought to impose upon us, a public right, a right under the law of nations; notwithstanding the majority report and the minority report here contain the instructions of Mr. Seward in 1866, supported by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], for a treaty with Great Britain which may be regarded as their advice to the President and to Mr. Bayard to make this treaty with these provisions as found in the draught communicated by Mr. Seward to Mr. Adams, as follows:

Mr. Seward to Mr. Adams.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 10, 1866.

SIR: I send you a copy of a very suggestive letter from Mr. Richard D. Cutts, who, perhaps you are aware, was employed as surveyor for marking, on the part of the United States, the fishery limits under the reciprocity treaty. Mr. Cutts's long familiarity with that subject practically and theoretically entitles his suggestions to respect.

It is desirable to avoid any collision or misunderstanding with Great Britain on the subject growing out of the termination of the reciprocity treaty. With this view I inclose a draught of a protocol, which you may propose to Lord Clarendon for a temporary regulation of the matter. If he should agree to it, it may be signed. When signed it is desirable that the instructions referred to in the concluding paragraph should at once be dispatched by the British Government.

As the fishing season is at hand, the collisions which might be apprehended may occur when that season advances.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Draught protocol communicated by Mr. Adams to the Earl of Clarendon in 1866.

Whereas in the first article of the convention between the United States and Great Britain, concluded and signed in London on the 26th October, 1818, it was declared that—

"The United States hereby renounce, forever, any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, not included within certain limits heretofore mentioned;"

And whereas differences have arisen in regard to the extent of the abovementioned renunciation, the Government of the United States and Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain, being equally desirous of avoiding further misunderstanding, have agreed to appoint, and do hereby authorize the appointment, of a mixed commission for the following purposes, namely:

1. To agree upon and define, by a series of lines, the limits which shall separate the exclusive from the common right of fishery, on the coasts and in the seas adjacent, of the British North American colonies, in conformity with the first article of the convention of 1818. The said lines to be regularly numbered, duly described, and also clearly marked on charts prepared in duplicate for the purpose.

2. To agree upon and establish such regulations as may be necessary and proper to secure to the fishermen of the United States the privilege of entering bays and harbors for the purpose of shelter; and of repairing damages therein; of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water; and to agree upon and establish such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent the abuse of the privilege reserved by said convention to fishermen of the United States.

3. To agree upon and recommend the penalties to be adjudged, and such proceedings and jurisdiction as may be necessary to secure a speedy trial and judgment with as little expense as possible, for the violation of rights and the transgression of the limits and restrictions which may be hereby adopted.

Provided, however, that the limits, restrictions, and regulations which may be agreed upon by the said commission shall not be final, nor have any effect, until so jointly confirmed and declared by the United States and Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain, either by treaty or by laws mutually acknowledged and accepted by the President of the United States, by and with the consent of the Senate, and by Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain.

Pending a different arrangement on the subject, the United States Government engages to give all proper orders to officers in its employment; and Her Britannic Majesty's Government engages to instruct the proper colonial or other British officers to abstain from hostile acts against British and United States fishermen respectively.

That was in 1866. The Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Massachusetts were leading spirits of that administration. This may be said to be their work and their advice to the President of the United States. Certainly it is part of the public authority of the United States.

Now, my proposition is that when this Government has affirmed a principle of settlement for three-quarters of a century at least—yes, we will say for a longer period of time than that—when it has affirmed and recognized the exclusive territorial jurisdiction and right of property in another government over a certain territory; when so late as 1866 it has instructed its ministers to negotiate a settlement of differences upon the principle of this recognition of the exclusive sovereignty and right of a nation and such a treaty has been negotiated, how are we to stand in the face of the world, how are we to stand in comparison with this principle of public policy, of fair exchange, of honorable commerce, of good faith, when we go back upon it and assail the President and the Secretary of State for negotiating a treaty upon these principles which we have instructed and advised them shall be the public policy of this Government? So much, Mr. President, for this branch of the subject.

This whole matter rests in this contention over the inshore fisheries of Great Britain, the subject of her absolute territorial domination over the fisheries within 3 miles of her coast. So of the coasts and bays, creeks and harbors of the United States, in Florida, in South Carolina, in the Gulf of Mexico, upon the Northwestern coast—are they the subjects of our exclusive territorial sovereignty or are they not?

Mr. GRAY. Bays?

Mr. CALL. Yes, and bays everywhere. If they are not, if it is to the interest of mankind that the principle of public property common to all mankind shall be adopted, it must be not only in respect to the North American Canadian fisheries, but in respect to all. We can not predicate a right upon that fact whatever we might do as a claim of equity, of kinship, of comity, of being of one origin, and the same people. One hundred years ago we accomplished our independence, we made war upon them, and by virtue of that war it is now claimed that we acquired that which we did not before have, the right of a sovereign people to own property within the territorial sovereignty of another people—not a privilege, not a right, but something that could not be disturbed by war.

Mr. President, I take it that that idea has no recognition anywhere in the history of this Government before this time. I take it that in the negotiations which followed the war of 1812 it was affirmed simply that this was a right resting in good faith, resting in comity, resting in an original equitable consideration that we had borne our share in the wars against the French, which resulted by this treaty in being made the property of Great Britain, we being then colonies subject to her sovereign control, and not that we affirmed any status of international right by international law or by virtue of sovereign territorial right or of property right, and upon this subject of the exclusive right, the absolute sovereignty of a country, whether it be Great Britain or the United States, over the waters and seas adjacent to her coast.

I desire to read a reference to one of the earliest cases which arose in the United States, and which has ever since been recognized as giving the law upon that subject. It is quoted in Phillimore in his book. I have the volume of the reports here before me, but I will not read it:

4. Mr. Phillimore says: "The courts of the North American United States have decided that foreign ships which have offended against the laws of the United States, within their jurisdiction, may be pursued and seized upon the ocean and rightfully brought into the ports of the United States for adjudication." (Volume III, page 228, Rose vs. Hinsley, 4 Cranch, 287; Hudson vs. Guestier, Cr. 6, 284.)

So exclusive is this right of sovereign jurisdiction and power that any offense committed against the municipal law, against the law of the sovereign, may be followed even to the capture upon the high seas of the offending vessel.

3. During the civil war raging in Portugal, in 1827, 1828, 1829, four vessels left Plymouth ostensibly for Brazil, with six hundred and fifty-two officers and men. The British Government of that day, believing that it was destined for Portugal, dispatched a fleet to Terceira (which, it may be observed, was the place to which the Alabama first went after departure from England), with orders, if the expedition appeared, to give them warning against hovering about or making any effort to effect a landing, and in case of their persistence against the warning, to drive them away from that neighborhood, and to keep sight of them until convinced that they had no intention of returning to the Western Islands or proceeding to Madeira.

It became necessary in carrying out these orders to fire upon the expedition. One was killed, some were wounded, and the expedition was broken up. This act gave rise to an extended debate in Parliament, and the conduct of the Government was approved. (Hansard, vols. 23 and 24 N. S. Annual Register History, etc., A. D. 1829, vol. 72, p. 187 et seq.)

So that there can be no question that we have ourselves, by our Supreme Court, affirmed the doctrine set forth in this treaty, that the territorial jurisdiction of the Government of Great Britain or of the United States in her own waters extends properly and justly to the arrest of any vessel violating the municipal regulations and to dealing with that vessel in accordance with municipal law. That law may be harsh, it may be the proper subject of negotiation, but it is precisely the law of the United States in all respects.

Now, then, shall we assume that this treaty makes any improper concession whatever to Great Britain? We have the treaty of Utrecht; we have the treaty of 1783; we have the orders in council and the statutory legislation of 1830; we have the treaty of 1871, which itself expressly recognizes the provisions of the treaty of 1818 as construed by the minority report here.

Article XVIII of the treaty of 1871 provides:

It is agreed by the high contracting parties that, in addition to the liberty secured to the United States fishermen by the convention between the United States and Great Britain signed at London on the 20th day of October, 1818—

Now, here the United States expressly agree that it is a liberty contained in the treaty of 1818. In 1871 the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Massachusetts and the party to which my friend the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] belongs, and the party of which the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] has been so conspicuous a leader, he, speaking through them, affirmed to the President and Mr. Bayard in negotiating this treaty and instructed them that it was a liberty—of taking, curing, and drying fish on certain coasts of the British North American colonies therein defined, the inhabitants of the United States shall have, in common with the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty—

That is what the United States and these Senators affirmed—

the liberty, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, to take fish of every kind, except shell-fish, on the seacoasts and shores and in the bays, harbors, and creeks of the Provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick and the colony of Prince Edward's Island, and of the several islands thereunto adjacent, without being restricted to any distance from the shore, with permission to land upon the said coasts and shores and islands, and also upon the Magdalen Islands, for the purpose of drying their nets and curing their fish.

Mr. President, it is immaterial whether this liberty entered within these bays or did not, though it will be well noted, if we consider the language of this treaty, that it so reads by its plain and necessary intendment. The treaty of 1818, of the 20th of October, reads as follows:

It is agreed between the high contracting parties that the inhabitants of the said United States shall have forever, in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau Islands, on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland; from the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands, on the shores of the Magdalen Islands, and also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks, from Mount Joly, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Belle Isle, and thence northwardly, indefinitely, along the coast, without prejudice, however, to any of the exclusive rights of the Hudson Bay Company. And that the American fishermen shall also have liberty forever to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland hereabove described, and of the coast of Labrador; but, so soon as the same or any portion thereof shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such portion so settled without previous agreement for such purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground. And the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish, on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits.

It is very clear that Mr. Webster's interpretation of this provision was the necessary one. If we leave out such of the words as are not connected with the subject, it would read thus: "The United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed to take, dry, or cure fish on any of the bays of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits," or within 3 miles, etc.

It can not be questioned that for the subject of bays that is the proper and correct reading. We are not considering coasts or creeks or harbors, but a liberty of fishing within 3 miles of one of the bays of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits. And that is in strict accordance with the practice of this Government both before and since, and with the treaty of Utrecht, with the treaty of 1783, with the declarations of the French minister who negotiated that treaty, or under whose direction it was negotiated, Count de Vergennes, and with the necessary public law. Who will base the relations of this Government with Great Britain upon the proposition that a property right in fisheries within the bays and territorial jurisdiction of the United States can be created by a treaty which can not be set aside by subsequent negotiations?

Who can deny that the treaty of 1871 in express terms, agreed to by this Government, affirmed the exclusive sovereign right and power of the Government of Great Britain over these inshore fisheries, when we consent not only in words, but to a different arrangement, and agree to give a consideration for permission or liberty to exercise that right?

Now, Mr. President, how shall we stand in this age of progress when the people of the world are to be fed, when the great question is a question of public economy, to bring joy and gladness to the poor man's home, not for free fish, but the free right to eat fish, and eat cheap fish; when the great question is the subsistence of the downtrodden, perishing people who are found not only abroad, but in our own country by hundreds of thousands; when we undertake to base our relations with this Government, not upon right, not upon a broad policy of right and mutual interest, but upon propositions of the character contained in this majority report, namely, a property right in the jurisdiction of Great Britain conveyed by the treaty of 1783, which neither the negotiations and public treaties of the United States of 1871 and of 1818 sustained, nor the contemporaneous opinion and interpretation of New England statesmen and of Mr. Webster himself supported? A property right which can not be set aside, and making a demand from us upon Great Britain which reverses all our public action and goes back upon the action of the Secretary of State, and denounces him for doing what honor and public duty and right required, and for doing that which all our past public action has declared it was his duty and our interest that he should do.

Why, Mr. President, we have gone back a long time. Let us see what the people in the olden time had to say on this subject. We have a very great and prosperous people and we live in a very wonderful age; but there were great people who lived before us; there were people whose achievements had placed the world in subjection to their civilization and who had found it necessary to acquire principles of public action. These are alluded to in this quaint and learned old book of Grotius, which has always been an authority upon this subject, in which he says:

Scipio Africanus said the Romans have conquered because in entering into war they have always relied upon justice and right and good faith.

Cicero says:

"For by faith not only every state is preserved but that grand society of nations is maintained. If this be taken away, says Aristotle rightly, ἀνήρηται ἡ ωὺς ἀλλήμος χρεία τ ἀνθρωπῶν, all human correspondence ceases."

Therefore the same Cicero calls it detestable to break faith, which is the preservation of life; and Seneca says the most sacred good of the rational soul, which sovereign princes ought the more solemnly to keep, by how much they offend with more impunity than others. Wherefore take away faith, men will be like mere brutes, whose rage all men dread. Justice indeed in her other parts has something that is obscure, but the bond of faith is self-evident, and to that end do men engage their faith in their dealings that all doubts may be removed.

How much more, then, does it concern princes religiously to observe their faith, first for the sake of their conscience, then for that of their reputation, wherein consists the authority of a kingdom.

Now, what shall be said of this contention on our part by the treaty of 1783, that because we had participated as subjects of Great Britain in the war by which these fisheries were gained and the territorial sovereignty of Great Britain established, therefore, that right being recognized by the treaty of 1783, it could not be displaced by any subsequent action of this Government, although time and again we have acknowledged in public negotiations, in the opinions of our statesmen who negotiated the treaties, that whatever rights we had we had by virtue of cession from Great Britain?

As a matter of argument, how much stronger is this right, except that it had what is claimed to be a recognition in the treaty of 1783, as a right than the right to any other portion of the domain of Great Britain in the North American provinces? They were all acquired by the blood and the treasure and the participation in the war of the men of the colonies and of the colonies as organized forces. The right extended quite as much to Canada or any other part of the dominion as it did to the territorial waters, and it lacked only the element of recognition which the British Government have always claimed was given to us simply as a liberty, and which we ourselves declare to be a liberty in the treaty of 1871.

So, Mr. President, I take it that this treaty affirms the doctrine of exclusive territorial sovereignty in the nation or government that controls the soil, the land around a closed sea, of a gulf, according to the old doctrine of the Latin publicists and the Greeks, that the country owning the soil and the mouths of the straits has sovereign and absolute dominion over the inclosed sea; if it be one, then in that one government; if it be two, then in those two governments; and I affirm without the fear of contradiction that as a matter of public law from the days of Aristotle, who was the first writer upon the subject of whom we have any record as stated by Grotius, to the present time, no publicist has ever denied the justice of this affirmed principle of international relation extending through this long period of time.

I therefore say that to this country, to my own State of Florida abounding in fish and fisheries, the right to say upon what terms, what condition that right of fishing shall be enjoyed by foreign nations and foreign people is an important consideration. This treaty affirms that principle in recognizing the right of Great Britain to declare what portion of her inshore fisheries shall be the privilege and liberty of the people of the United States; for we can not establish the reign of force.

Senators talk a great deal about the power of the United States. We are a great people and we are a powerful people, but we are great and powerful only so long and so far as we conform to right, to humanity, to justice in our relations with other people. I am thankful that the day has come when a great congress of nations, actuated by principles of humanity, recognizing the business of governments and of associations and of men, is to advance the interests of humanity, to extend the comforts of human life, to establish policies which will relieve poverty, which will reward merit alone and banish force, and fraud, and violence, and the suffering that results from it so far as possible. This treaty is in that direction.

It has been said that this treaty is a concession to the desire of the Canadian provinces to enforce what is called free fish, and that the outrages perpetrated upon the American fishermen demand different relations. Suppose we admit that to be true, I am myself in favor of the policy which the Secretary of State is pursuing in this matter, which I understand to be a demand of justice to every citizen who shall be wronged in his property by the harsh and improper administration of Canadian municipal laws.

But how shall that be done? Shall it be done by war, or shall it be done by the orderly course of negotiations as they are now taking place? But that is a different question altogether. If Canada seeks to enforce a change in the financial laws and administrations of this Government by oppression of our citizens, we need not refuse to do what is right in avoiding causes of future trouble by negotiating a treaty to adjust and define the limit of their right and ours, because we still demand reparation and damages to those who have been injured.

The two subjects are entirely distinct. The one does not belong to the other. The settlement of the relations which we shall hereafter keep with a foreign government upon terms satisfactory and the demand for damages are two different questions.

Why is it that Senators claim there is a vast concession? A vast concession of what? Of fishing rights, of territorial waters within the sovereign territorial dominion of Great Britain in the North American provinces. Yet here we have the report stating that these fisheries are of little or no value. The President and the Senate have been advised by Senators that this renounced territory ought not to be contended for. Each one of the Senators who has made this objection to the treaty has solemnly affirmed to the President, as a Senator, "I advise you in your negotiations with Great Britain that this renounced territory is not of sufficient value to be the subject of contention between that Government and ours."

Is there any doubt about that, Mr. President? Is there any doubt that every Senator who has spoken in opposition to this treaty has officially, under his oath and in his place here, advised the President and the Secretary of State that these renounced waters were not of any value, that the whole inshore fishery was not of any value to the public interests and the public policy of the United States in relation to these fishermen? I say it is so. I say that the reports here assented to by the Senate, unobjected to, quoted here, and now before me, establish that public fact in the public history of this the constitutionally authorized advising body of the President, the Senate, as to the negotiation of this very treaty here.

But, Mr. President, let us go a little further and observe the relation which these questions bear to the general commerce, comfort, and prosperity of the people of the United States in respect of their exchange of products with other peoples and our own subsistence and industries, all of which must be considered and ought to be considered in a treaty between two sovereign nations. I apprehend there can be no doubt in regard to this statement. No person will contest that. Now, let us see what it is that we are to make this war or this contention about, for it does not matter whether it is war or whether it is not.

I take it between two enlightened nations as between two civilized men it is not a mere question about whether they are going to fight to the death that will justify them in the negotiations or the relations which they bear to each other. I take it that the civilized nation and the civilized man must be held to respond to right, to justice, to sound public policies, to humanity, to the interests of his own people and the world, and not to the mere question whether he is going to be put to death or injured, or some great calamity come upon him.

I take it there is a higher idea of right that has come from our Christian religion and from the great institutions of the church and its teachings and civilizing influences than the mere question of doing what we may be compelled to do by war, or which may avoid or bring about a war.

What is it that we are doing in this treaty? We are negotiating with the people along our border. Much has been said of Canadian internal improvement, of great lines of transportation, as if that was a menace to the people of the United States.

I agree with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in saying that these two English-speaking people are the vanguard of civilization, of human happiness, of the relief of the world from the evils which a bad and evil condition of government have inflicted upon mankind from the earliest history. We and they are the great agents and lights of civilization, and if these people along our border with their great improvements could take every pound of freight in the United States free who would be hurt? If they would bring the products of the Eastern World here for one-half less than they can be brought for now, what injury would it be to the people in these United States? The dresses which they wear, the silks that are imported, the tea that is drank, whatever is imported would be within the reach of the poorest man at one-half the cost that it now is.

I think it may be harmonized with all the transportation interests of this country by a just and a wise interest, giving abundant employment for all, but it is not the occasion of war, the occasion of envy, the occasion of ill feeling. Perhaps there may be some restrictive legislation that may be wise, but not in a hostile spirit.

Let us see what this country is. Mr. Manning, in his report a year or two since—I have not the date, but I have here an extract from it—states as follows:

From 1812 to 1832 the aggregate annual traffic between the United States and the British North American provinces averaged only $3,257,153; from 1832 to 1845 it rose to $6,313,780, but, under liberal transportation arrangements, it rose from 1846 to 1853 to no less an annual average than $14,230,763, leaving in our favor, during that period of eight years, a balance of trade of over forty and a quarter millions of dollars.

How much harm was that to this country? A balance of trade was left in this country of forty and a quarter million dollars from Canada. Who wants to cut that out? What harm will it do to rich or poor?

It was in 1845 that England, changing her colonial policy, empowered the Canadian provinces to make a tariff on imports to suit themselves. During the next year those provinces removed the barrier against American products which existed, in the form of differential rates in favor of British products, and admitted commodities from our side of the line on the same terms as commodities were admitted coming from British ports. In 1849 England, having by her minister at Washington previously communicated with the Treasury Department, presented a further proposition.

* * * * * * *

Under its influence the aggregate interchange of commodities between ourselves and the inhabitants of all the British provinces—numbering not as many as those of the State of New York—rose from an annual average of a little over $14,000,000 in the previous eight years to over thirty-three and a quarter millions in gold in 1855, to nearly fifty millions in 1856, and to eighty-four millions in the last year of its existence.

During the thirteen years the British provinces, according to their official returns, purchased from us articles valued at over three hundred and fifty-nine and a half millions of dollars in gold, and we bought from them one hundred and ninety-seven millions, thus making an international trade of nearly five hundred and fifty-six and a half millions of dollars on a gold valuation.

It seems we are negotiating a treaty with a people who have paid us over $160,000,000 within a few years past, a balance of that amount. They have paid it to whom? They have paid it to those who manufacture goods, who grow products of the earth. They have paid it in all the avenues of our diversified industrial and agricultural life.

Shall we say to these people what our Government has ever refused to say, what Mr. Adams denied to be a fact, what those who negotiated the treaty of 1818 affirmed was not true, what the treaty of 1871 declares to be untrue? Shall we say it to these people, because you do not recognize our absolute right of property in the inshore fisheries of your bays? Because you do not recognize our right—to do what? What I affirm no people have ever done, what I am unwilling shall be done on the coast of Florida, give commercial rights to the fishing smacks that come within the sovereign jurisdiction of this country and fish, and that they shall be received into our ports upon free, equal terms, with all the benefits of commercial vessels; that we shall open our fisheries everywhere, without restriction, without condition, and give commercial privileges to every fishing smack. Because you do not recognize our right to this we are going to do what? We are going to legislate against you; we are going to retaliate against you.

Now how are we going to retaliate? We are going to make our poor people pay two prices for every fish they eat. That is the retaliation! We are going to increase the price of fish so that you can not sell them in competition with the American producer.

Mr. President, I do not acquiesce in that policy; first, because, while it may be very proper under certain circumstances and conditions to have a public policy that will more or less hold within our own control questions of foreign trade and foreign importation, it is not wise to deny to a people alongside our border, with whom we have been living upon terms of mutual interchange and reciprocity, fair and just consideration, because upon the productions which are necessary to support human life the great question is to make them cheap to the poor man, cheap to the starving millions, cheap to the laborer's household, to make them as cheap as they can be made.

The subsistence of mankind, as Mr. Atkinson says in this article entitled "Must humanity starve?" is a question addressing itself to the statesmen and the economists everywhere. Must we starve? How shall it be avoided? Certainly not by increasing the cost of subsistence to the mass of mankind.

Mr. President, I shall not delay the Senate much longer by these desultory remarks. This treaty I regard as a fair and a just and a proper treaty. It is submitted to us by the President in a dignified message, a message based upon public considerations which are such as should actuate a body like this, dealing not in prejudice, but dealing with great public questions, not that concern us alone, but which concern our future, which concern other nations, which concern the great interests of exchange and of peaceful relationship.

Do what we may, commerce of thought, of production, of exchange is the great business of civilized man. You can not fence it; you can not confine thought. Our people's thought is free; their hopes are free; aspirations must be free. Communication and intercourse of thought and action and product are the normal and the absolute law of human life.

What does the President say in this message of his? I think I have rarely read a fairer and a more dignified and a calmer presentation of a subject. He says:

A review of the history of this question will show that all former attempts to arrive at a common interpretation, satisfactory to both parties, of the first article of the treaty of October 20, 1818, have been unsuccessful; and with the lapse of time the difficulty and obscurity have only increased.

Who doubts that? He goes on to specify the advantages of this treaty. Nobody will deny that he states them correctly. The objection made is not to what is in the treaty so much as what is not contained in it. The objection is that it does not provide for retaliation, for retaliatory measures, for indemnity, or reparation. The objection that it is the renunciation of a vast territory of waters amounts to little or nothing.

The objection is that it does not provide commercial privileges for fishing vessels. For one I wish to say that I think this treaty goes just as far in that direction as it could be expected to go. It actually copies the laws of the United States in regard to the treatment of vessels in the harbors, ports, and jurisdiction of the United States, and applies them to American fishing vessels in the waters of the North American British dominions. That is the truth. You can not assail that. That is the proposition. It is the application of our laws to American fishing vessels in the British dominions of North America. I affirm that that proposition can not be denied.

Now, what does this mean? It means that the grant of commercial privileges to a fishing vessel is something unusual. Why? Because it destroys the advantage of the people possessing the fishery. It gives common right and privilege to everybody. You can not have exclusive possession, ownership, and enjoyment of a fishery if you give to the foreign fishing vessel commercial privileges, if she can come in and supply and go out. If she can enter your ports daily and hourly and sell her fish, the exclusive right is entirely gone. If the fishermen from Havana can cross over upon the coast of Florida, catch our fish, enter our ports, make entry, sell their fish, and go out, where is the exclusive right of the people of Florida? It is utterly impracticable.

I undertake to say that from all ages, as shown by Grotius, the fishing vessel has been respected. Why? It has been respected as exempt from capture in war because it fed the armies, it procured food for mankind. In all ages it has been the subject of exclusion from commercial right and commercial privilege, for the reason that there can be no exclusive right or enjoyment in any fishery when commercial privilege is granted to the fishing vessels of other nations to come and go as they please to catch fish and enter the ports of the land on which it is dependent. That was the old ground of dominion; it was the dependence upon an adjacent soil, an adjacent territory.

That is one thing. Commercial right and privilege is another. If it be considered desirable that commercial right and privilege shall exist, that fishing interest shall be encouraged and fostered in the United States and Canada, how are you going to get it? You have got to abolish these treaties, as they did in 1871. Canada and Great Britain have a right to be consulted.

For myself I should vote against a treaty that admitted to the fisheries of the State that I in part represent, and the Atlantic coast, and gave commercial rights to fishing vessels; but if our friends on the Northeast desire such reciprocity in occupying the waters and in commercial privileges I should have no objection to voting with them for it, for their coasts and bays. But why assail the President? Why find fault with this treaty for doing that which the uniform and unvarying policy of this Government has directed him to do, and expressed to be the public opinion and the public policy of the Government.

Mr. President, I shall soon close these desultory remarks. I believe I have covered the few points that I proposed to make upon this subject. The question of fishery rights is one of very great importance to the people of my State and all the Southern and Gulf States. The fish of that region are abundant. They are sufficient to feed the entire population of that country, and perhaps of many other countries. The waters are alive with them. They seek the coast, bays, harbors, and inlets of Florida and Southern Alabama, and we demand their preservation upon just and fair terms, conceding to other people such rights as will promote the interests of our people and allow them the privilege of obtaining subsistence. That is the kind of relationship which we desire.

I have introduced at this session of Congress a bill, which has been referred to the Committee on Fisheries, for the protection of those fisheries, for the seizure of vessels as the Canadian people have done, and for fining of vessels found fishing within the jurisdiction of the United States, or in the State of Florida, in her bays, within 3 miles of her coast, or between Key West and the mainland.

This serves to show that in this great country of ours, with its widely extended coast and its diversified interests, we must have some broad principles of public policy in making our treaties with foreign countries. What suits Canada, what suits our friends in Maine and Massachusetts in their relations with Canada, would not suit us. The treaties which we make with foreign countries should contain provisions for this diversity of interests; but in no case can you afford to give up the principle of the absolute sovereignty of this country over the mare clausun—the inshore fisheries of the bays and the waters which are inclosed by our own country and our own soil.

Mr. President, the future of our country will not depend, in my opinion, upon prejudice. It will not depend upon appeals to excited feeling. The great business men of this country, I think, will apprehend the fact that it is not within the power of man to control the great causes that give necessary course to public action, to public thought, and public feeling. All economies must tend to feed the people. The doctrines of starvation and want have been shadowed by many of the great economists so as to make political economy what is called the dismal science, which Mr. Atkinson attempts to answer in the article "Must humanity starve at last?" All public policies must be in the direction of providing the agencies that will prevent humanity from starving. Before this imperious public necessity and public policy all imaginations of men, all policies of government must fail unless they correspond with it.

Therefore the enlightened public opinion of this country, of the men who control public opinions, sooner or later must look to this end, not to war, not to strife, but to the development of these higher economies which shall abundantly feed, abundantly clothe, abundantly educate and provide for the advancement of mankind.

The public man who looks to these sources of action for his inspiration is the man to be trusted, not the man who seeks to live upon the excitements and the prejudices of the moment, or upon theories of peculiar and local advantage confined to one country and leaving out of consideration all the rest of mankind. The action of the President and the able and distinguished Secretary of State in making this treaty is in the line of this broader, higher, and more beneficent public policy. This treaty has been subject to adverse criticism, both in this country and Canada, and that our people may see that the people of the Dominion think that we have gained the advantage over them, I append the following:

[Extract from a review of the fisheries treaty in London Law Magazine May, 1888.]

Whatever may be the fate of the fisheries treaty which was concluded at Washington on the 15th of February, 1888, there can be no doubt that the British plenipotentiaries abandoned all the material contentions of this country up to the end of last year from the date of the fisheries treaty in 1818 between Great Britain and Ireland on the one hand and the United States of America on the other. In this matter our country can not boast of having obtained a diplomatic success. The American plenipotentiaries have practically obtained everything which they asked and for which they contended.

* * * * * * *

No wonder, therefore, that Mr. Secretary Bayard has spoken of the new treaty as giving his country 99 per cent. of all the fishing grounds they had ever claimed, or of any value, in the maritime provinces of Canada. Nay, more, no wonder the British plenipotentiaries, who negotiated this treaty, speak very modestly of their work, and have left their enthusiastic admirers to boast of what our plenipotentiaries had accomplished. From the point of view of international law, the British plenipotentiaries surrendered everything which the American plenipotentiaries could have asked with any reasonable ground of success.

If the treaty has any justification at all, it is as a commercial treaty. As such it does not lie within the province of this article. But, even as a commercial treaty, I am at a loss to see what, in the way of barter and sale, the Canadians and the Newfoundlanders are to get under the treaty in exchange for the rights which they have agreed to surrender. I should like to know, for example, whether the United States Government has abandoned all claims against us for compensation for alleged illegal seizures of ships and cargoes.

Summing up this treaty, I would say that it stipulates for a delimitation commission; gives an interpretation of the territorial jurisdiction of the 3-mile limit from the shores; confers certain privileges by issuing free licenses; determines the penalties for infringement of the treaty, and makes arrangements for a future and hypothetical adoption by the United States of free-trade principles as to fish and fish-oils. It is, therefore, very much more limited in its scope, in certain commercial respects than the treaties of 1854 and 1871. It is clearly and decidedly American in its origin, and in all its essential features bears a striking likeness to the proposals made to us by the United States in 1866, 1870, and 1886, save in two or three important particulars.

Whether there shall or shall not be free fish between our American cousins and our American fellow-citizens, the fishing rights of the latter in the bays of Chaleur, Miramichi, and of other regions are practically gone forever. In fact, the labors of the delimitation commission will be permanently binding for all time as soon as the several Governments ratify the treaty; but reciprocal free trade, though granted hereafter, need not last for a single day. Worse still, we can never get back to our former position. The British home government conferred full powers of negotiation on their representatives. But the correspondence which passed during the negotiations between the British plenipotentiaries and Lord Salisbury has not been made public.

It would have been very satisfactory to me if I could have seen it before writing this article. Can we wonder, then, that there exists a widely spread opinion that the interests of our colonial fellow-citizens have been sacrificed in the interests of the Empire, or, at all events, in the interests of peace and good neighborhood? Why we alone and our American fellow-citizens should be obliged to surrender our legal rights, which have a great and real money value, to the American Government for little or nothing in the interests of good neighborhood I do not understand. Why should not the United States have given up something as an actual equivalent for the rights surrendered? If so, what have they given up?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to postpone the further consideration of the treaty until the Wednesday after the first Monday in December next. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. HOAR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts calls for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOAR. I did not see the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] present. I withdraw the call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts withdraws the call.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, before the yeas and nays are called upon the motion of the Senator from Alabama to postpone the consideration of this treaty until December next, there are some things to be said, I think, that have not yet been said, and by other Senators than myself. I did not expect to be called upon to-day to make any remarks upon the motion of the Senator from Alabama to postpone, but as well now as at another time I may express the views I have in regard to the propriety of that motion.

It has become evident from various outgivings on this floor from Senators on the other side who have opposed this treaty that the treaty is not to be ratified at this session of Congress. We have been told in more or less of a minatory tone that it is not only to be rejected but it is to be rejected at once and without delay.

No special reason for this, as it seems to me, unseemly haste has been given by any Senator who has thus proclaimed the fact that the consideration of this treaty is not to be postponed. Senators on that side, in the plenitude of their partisan power, do not deign to give us reasons, except when it seems good to them to do so, for any proposed or threatened action on their part. But, whatever may be the reasons or the motives that actuated the Senators in hastening the consideration of this treaty and in declining any proposition for its postponement, there are good reasons to support the motion of the Senator from Alabama that lie upon the surface and are easily stated.

This treaty is now being discussed in the very midst of an excited political campaign. The Senators who have discussed it have not been able to refrain from allusions to the effect that its disposition may have upon the fortunes of one party or the other. We have been told here that we are arguing the British side of this case, and the whole gamut of offensive imputation has been run by Senators in their reply to those who have advocated, supported, and defended this treaty as a wise and sagacious means of settlement of the existing difficulties between this Government and that of Great Britain.

Why should it not be postponed to a more quiet season? Why should we not invoke those influences that come from the sober second-thought, from calm consideration, from the absence of extraneous influence and excitement? Why should we not, in a matter that involves the relations of the two greatest powers of the world, endeavor to put this great debate between them into an atmosphere where the interests of our country and the welfare of our people may be considered without excitement and with due regard to their enhancement and security?

Mr. President, I do not like to deal in imputations or charges against those with whom I am engaged in debate, but I am compelled to ask, why is it that the interests involved in this treaty should not be given the poor opportunity of being considered when they can be debated without the heat and without the bias which now seems to possess the minds of Senators on that side whenever the treaty is before the Senate?

Is it that for the last six months absolute peace has reigned over all those waters that have hitherto been the scene of these vexatious and irritating interferences with American fishing rights? Is it that Senators fear to trust the experimentum crucis that will be made during this fishing season in those northeastern waters by the fishermen themselves under the modus vivendi, and that it will be demonstrated that there is a mode pointed out and attained by this treaty by which these great interests may be pursued in peace and the harvest of gain garnered without danger and without molestation? It would seem that that was not an altogether unfounded or unjust imputation to make, else why should such a challenge as this not be accepted by gentlemen who oppose the ratification of the treaty? What harm is to come to the interests involved even from their standpoint of opposition to and adverse criticism of the provisions of this treaty?

Mr. President, the issues involved in this debate are too momentous, the consequences that may result are too serious and grave to be lightly dealt with. When a proposition such as is contained in the motion of the Senator from Alabama to postpone the further consideration of the treaty until December next is made, when no interest that is involved or concerned in the treaty can possibly be affected injuriously, when the very fishermen whose rights are the subject-matter of the treaty are pursuing their vocation now unmolested and undisturbed under the protocol attached to the treaty, I say the burden is on those who deny that this postponement should be made, to give some good, strong, and potent reason for their opposition.

We are dealing with the interests of our countrymen. This treaty has been made not in haste. It has been considered in all its articles and all its provisions gravely and sedately, by men as competent to deal with their country's interests and defend its honor as exist in all this broad land of ours; by men who are in every way, in ability, in integrity, and in patriotism the peers of any man upon this floor. So, coming to us as a co-ordinate branch of this great Government, as joint negotiators under the Constitution, I say that it is the duty of those who object to this most reasonable proposition to show us the ground of their objection. I venture to say that a proposition so reasonable as this would never have been debated one moment if it were not for some extraneous cause, some abhorrent forces that have intruded themselves into the Senate Chamber and directed the course of this debate.

Mr. President, that is all that I expect or wish to say in regard to the motion of the Senator from Alabama; but while I am on my feet, though I had no intention to extend my remarks beyond those I have already made, I wish to say a word or two on a topic which has been presented to me this morning by the reception through the mail, and I doubt not every Senator has received a like paper, of a broadside which purports to be a letter to a paper called the Evening Bulletin, where published or circulated I know not, but purporting to be written by Mr. Charles Levi Woodbury in regard to the twelfth article of this treaty.

This is no new suggestion. Almost ever since this treaty has been before the Senate I have been receiving, and doubtless other Senators have received, suggestions of the same kind from different newspapers who have been very active in opposing the Administration—suggestions that the treaty has in some manner given away the rights of the States to control their own territorial waters; but never until now have I seen that suggestion made over so respectable a name as that of Mr. Charles Levi Woodbury, and I do not propose, until I am better advised, to make him responsible for the absolutely fatuous argument that is made in this paper, nor to impute to him views which are so unlawyerlike and illogical.

Now, what is this suggestion? Article XII of the treaty now before the Senate reads in this wise:

ARTICLE XII.

Fishing vessels of Canada and Newfoundland shall have on the Atlantic coast of the United States all the privileges reserved and secured by this treaty to United States fishing vessels in the aforesaid waters of Canada and Newfoundland.

This paper then goes on to state in effect, without quoting its language, that that gives to Canadian fishermen the right to fish in all the waters on the coast of the United States, that there is a reciprocal right of fishing conferred by Article XII, which will inure to the benefit of Canadian fishermen on all the coasts 3 miles from shore, in all the bays, estuaries, and other territorial waters of the United States.

Mr. President, I need not say that, for one, if this absurd interpretation of Article XII had any foundation whatever, then I should not vote for the ratification of the treaty while it remained a part of it. I would go further, perhaps, than some Senators on that side in my objection to an article that was susceptible of that interpretation. I do not believe that it is within the competence of the Government of the United States under its treaty-making power to confer upon any foreign government or the subjects thereof the right to participate in the fisheries of the territorial waters of the States that compose this Union. That power was never conferred on the General Government by the States, and therefore it is not in this case attempting to negotiate such a treaty. If it should do so, it would be ultra vires. Such a treaty would be without constitutional authority, and therefore not obligatory on any one. You can not divest the State of Maryland of its jurisdiction over the waters of the Chesapeake Bay. You can not interfere with or control, except in the manner that the Constitution of the United States points out, the absolute right of the State of New Jersey and the State of Delaware to control, in the interests of their own citizens, the use which may be made of the waters of Delaware Bay. The Constitution of the United States has conferred upon the General Government the power to control and regulate the navigation of all navigable waters, but with that exception and only in that regard the jurisdiction of the State is absolute, unqualified, and unsurrendered, and that right which is given to the General Government comes under the commercial clause of the Constitution, and the State of Maryland, which is a most conspicuous illustration of this subject, has not parted with one iota of her sovereignty and control over the waters of the Chesapeake Bay and the power to regulate all business that may be carried on in or on them, except so far as the General Government, under the power to regulate commerce, has the right to secure its free navigation or in whatever other respects that power may be justly exercised.

Why, Mr. President, I do not suppose that any lawyer will dispute what I have stated in this respect; and if that be so, how idle it is to suggest that the gentlemen who negotiated this treaty, as good and as well-instructed constitutional lawyers as we have in this country, should have ever attempted to have invaded this absolute right of the States. They do not belong to a school of politics that would have permitted them to have thus trifled with the great rights of sovereignty that are retained by the States and not conceded or surrendered to the General Government. So it would hardly be necessary to go further than I have done to show the absurdity of any such interpretation being sought to be attached to this Article XII. But look at its phraseology:

Fishing vessels of Canada and Newfoundland—

Not "fishermen," but—

Fishing vessels of Canada and Newfoundland shall have on the Atlantic coast of the United States—

What?—

all the privileges reserved and secured by this treaty to the United States fishing vessels in the aforesaid waters of Canada and Newfoundland.

What does that mean? Why clearly it means that the privileges that are gained for our fishing vessels in the waters of the Northeastern Provinces, to wit, the right of refuge from storm, to obtain wood, water, and fuel, and commercial privileges to buy on all occasions needful supplies, to be exempt from harassment where resorting to these waters for these purposes—that these and similar privileges, which were the only privileges that are secured by this treaty, shall also attach to Canadian vessels when they visit the waters of the United States on the Atlantic coast.

That is all; and no Senator on that side who has spoken in denunciation of this treaty, bitter as have been some of these denunciations, has so far forgotten what he owed to himself as a lawyer and as a Senator as to suggest that that was a possible consequence of the ratification of this treaty, unless it be—I am not prepared to say that I understood it myself—unless it be, as I thought the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] suggested, that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] had made that statement. Well, now, Mr. President, if that be so, all I can say is that if the Senator from Ohio, for whose ability and character I have the greatest respect, made that argument, as was said by the Senator from Florida, it was made in haste and without due consideration, and that when he comes to reflect upon the contention and to examine the language of Article XII he will abandon it altogether.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator tell us whether he thinks the fishing vessels of Canada and of Newfoundland are under the same limitations in our waters as ours are in their waters?

Mr. GRAY. In what respect? I do not understand the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. In any respect. Must they report at the custom-house in forty-eight hours if they are driven in by storm, and is it only for wood and water and repairs that they can come into our waters?

Mr. GRAY. I understand perfectly now the drift of the Senator's question.

Mr. DAWES. If they are to have the same privilege, does that mean privileges with the same limitations?

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Massachusetts is asking a question that would lead off in quite another direction. I will have something to say about the suggestion made by his query perhaps after awhile, when we come to discuss the articles of the treaty. I will answer, though, so far as it is pertinent at the present time, that of course vessels from the provinces visiting the waters of the United States will be subject to all those limitations in the regard in which he speaks that are imposed by the statutes of the United States, and that they will be entitled to no other privileges except those that are secured to American fishing vessels in the waters of the northeastern provinces, and those privileges are not fishing privileges.

The treaty now before the Senate does not attempt to confer a fishing right upon any fishing vessel. It is what it purports to be by its preamble, a treaty of interpretation of the convention of 1818, and has undertaken to settle some of the vexed questions that have arisen upon the interpretation of that convention of 1818, and, as I have contended before and contend now only more strongly as this debate has gone on, has settled them entirely in favor of our fishermen and of our fishing vessels.

Mr. DAWES. Then, before the Senator passes from this, will he tell us exactly what are the privileges reserved and secured by this treaty in the waters of Canada and Newfoundland to our fishing vessels? If he will state exactly what they are, we shall know what to attach to their vessels when they come into our waters.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I have on another occasion discussed at some length, and at greater length perhaps than I shall do again, the provisions of this treaty. If the Senator from Massachusetts did me the honor to listen to the remarks that I then made, he would know that I attempted as well as I was able to show just what we had gained in the way of privileges and exemptions for our fishing vessels in the Canadian waters; and it would be a pretty long story just now, when I have risen for a specific purpose for which I do not expect to occupy much time, to attempt to go over the whole of that argument again. But I merely repeat that the privileges secured to American fishing vessels—not to the fishermen, but to American fishing vessels—in Canadian waters are secured to Canadian vessels in the waters of the United States.

Those privileges, as I said just now, are none of them fishing privileges. They refer only to those acts of hospitality, if you please, and of convenience for vessels resorting to those waters, which have been discussed here at great length, the right to buy provisions on all occasions, the right to resort to those waters in distress, to purchase fuel, for repairs, etc., exemptions from certain dues on that occasion, the privilege of not being called upon to report at the custom-house until after twenty-four hours, and other privileges of a like nature.

I have called attention to this paper, as I said at the outset, because it appears over so respectable a name as that of Charles Levi Woodbury. There is only one other point that seems to be new, so far as I have observed, made in this paper, which, as I said before, I will not impute to him until I have better evidence than the report of this printed broadside. There is only one other point that I think it necessary to call attention to. The writer of this paper says:

> This is not an idle construction of Article XII. The treaty becomes a part of Article I of the treaty of 1818—see its preamble. It embraces a wider scope than the renunciation clause, and as the interpretation of the treaty of 1818, its clauses become grafted and incorporated integrally as one substance with the clauses of that treaty.

I do not believe that the eminent gentleman whose name appears at the bottom of that sheet ever risked his professional reputation, which I concede is a high one, by making such an argument as is there imputed to him. Why, what is the preamble to the present treaty? I will read it:

> Whereas difference have arisen concerning the interpretation of Article I of the convention of October 20, 1818, the United States of America and Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, being mutually desirous of removing all causes of misunderstanding in relation thereto, and of promoting friendly intercourse and good neighborhood between the United States and the possessions of Her Majesty in North America, have resolved to conclude a treaty to that end, and have named as their plenipotentiaries, etc.

A distinct treaty, not an amendment of the treaty of 1818 whereby the provisions of the amendment would be incorporated into the body of the treaty amended, but a distinct treaty of interpretation of certain clauses, so that the mere reading of that preamble and this simple plain statement of what it is is sufficient, without more, to dispose of this seemingly ingenious argument of the writer of this paper. I do not think that any Senator here will take up the cudgels for this contention and upon the floor of the Senate contend that Article XII and the other articles of the present treaty are incorporated by that amendment in the treaty of 1818, made a part of its body, its blood and its flesh. It is a distinct treaty, apart from, independent of, the treaty of 1818, and therefore this specious suggestion utterly falls to the ground.

Now, Mr. President, I only say, as I said at the outset, that I would not for one moment think of voting for this treaty if it was susceptible of the interpretation that this paper attempts to put upon it. I am a little more careful of my country's interests, a little more thoughtful about what concerns its welfare, than to do any such thing. I know that the treaty of 1871, negotiated under different auspices and under different leadership, did this very thing, and gave away, or attempted to give away, north of the thirty-ninth parallel the rights of the States to control their own fishing waters, gave them away to subjects of Great Britain. Had my duty been to consider that treaty in its provisions I would never have consented to such an attempted surrender.

I do not believe, as I said before, that the General Government has any such right. We have rights in the waters of Her Majesty's dominions to the northeast of us, but we never will surrender and the American Senate will never be a party to a compact that gives away again the territorial waters of the Atlantic States or of any of the States along our seaboard, east or west. We have this magnificent easement, it is true, in those northeastern waters unparalleled in the history of the world. They are subjected in our favor to a servitude that this country long ago would have become so restless under, if the case had been reversed, that we would have broken asunder, treaty or no treaty, the bands placed upon our limbs and asserted the right of the American people to enjoy the heritage that God and nature had given them and that no government and no administration can take away from them. If we do enjoy that very thing up in these British waters and are maintaining it, and this treaty maintains it, we are enjoying rights to-day in British territorial waters that the State of Maryland will not allow you, sir [turning to Mr. FRYE], a citizen of the State of Maine, to enjoy in her waters. We are enjoying privileges of taking and packing fish in those waters of the British Dominions that no citizen of Massachusetts can enjoy in the waters of the little State of Delaware, or the State of New Jersey, or the State of Virginia, for I have examined the statutes of all those States in that regard. The States of this Union undertake to exercise territorial rights as against citizens of other States that you are seeking to deny to other governments and to the Dominion of Canada in regard to those who are aliens to her institutions and to her government entirely.

The right of the States, the absolute right of the States over their territorial waters has been more than once asserted and maintained in the Supreme Court of the United States, but the last case with which I am familiar, the case of McCready vs. The State of Virginia, decided in 1876, was a case which very distinctively and emphatically upheld and maintained this very right of territorial jurisdiction over all the waters within the boundaries of a State with regard to their extent or their width. Certainly that case maintains in all its breadth the doctrine for which I have contended.

Let me read a few sentences from the opinion of the Supreme Court, which was unanimous, and delivered by Chief-Justice Waite.

Mr. GEORGE. What year?

Mr. GRAY. In the October term, 1876.

Mr. GEORGE. What volume?

Mr. GRAY. Ninety-fourth United States Supreme Court Reports, McCready vs. Virginia, page 394:

> The precise question to be determined in this case is whether the State of Virginia can prohibit the citizens of other States from planting oysters in Ware River, a stream in that State where the tide ebbs and flows, when its own citizens have that privilege.
>
> The principle has long been settled in this court that each State owns the beds of all tide waters within its jurisdiction unless they have been granted away. (Pollard's Lessee vs. Hagan, 3 How., 212; Smith vs. Maryland, 18 How., 74; Mumford vs. Wardwell, 6 Wall., 436; Weber vs. Harbor Commissioner, 18 id., 66.) In like manner the States own the tide waters themselves, and the fish in them, so far as they are capable of ownership while running. For this purpose the State represents its people, and the ownership is that of the people in their united sovereignty. (Martin vs. Waddell, 16 Pet., 410.) The title thus held is subject to the paramount right of navigation, the regulation of which, in respect to foreign and interstate commerce, has been granted to the United States. There has been, however, no such grant of power over the fisheries.
> These remain under the exclusive control of the State, which has consequently the right, in its discretion, to appropriate its tide waters and their beds to be used by its people as a common for taking and cultivating fish as far as it may be done without obstructing navigation. Such an appropriation is in effect nothing more than a regulation of the use by the people of their common property. The right which the people of the State thus acquire comes not from their citizenship alone, but from their citizenship and property combined. It is, in fact, a property right, and not a mere privilege or immunity of citizenship.
> By Article IV, section 2, of the Constitution, the citizens of each State are "entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." Mr. Justice Washington, in Corfield vs. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C., 380, thought that this provision extended only to such privileges and immunities as are "in their nature fundamental; which belong of right to the citizens of all free governments." And Mr. Justice Curtis, in Scott vs. Sanford, 19 How., 582, described them as such "as belonged to general citizenship." But usually when this provision of the Constitution has been under consideration the courts have manifested the disposition, which this court did in Connor vs. Elliott, 18 How., 593, not to attempt to define the words, but "rather to leave their meaning to be determined in each case upon a view of the particular rights asserted or denied therein." This clearly is the safe course to pursue when, to use the language of Mr. Justice Curtis, in Connor vs. Elliott, "we are dealing with so broad a provision, involving matters not only of great delicacy and importance, but which are of such a character that any merely abstract definition could scarcely be correct, and a failure to make it so would certainly produce mischief.
> Following, then, this salutary rule, and looking only to the particular right which is here asserted, we think we may safely hold that the citizens of one State are not invested by this clause of the Constitution with any interest in the common property of the citizens of another State. If Virginia had by law provided for the sale of its once vast public domain, and a division of the proceeds among its own people, no one, we venture to say, would contend that the citizens of other States had a constitutional right to the enjoyment of this privilege of Virginia citizenship. Neither if, instead of selling, the State had appropriated the same property to be used as a common by its people for the purposes of agriculture, could the citizens of other States avail themselves of such a privilege. And the reason is obvious: The right thus granted is not a privilege or immunity of general but of special citizenship. It does not "belong of right to the citizens of all free governments," but only to the citizens of Virginia, on account of the peculiar circumstances in which they are placed. They, and they alone, owned the property to be sold or used, and they alone had the power to dispose of it as they saw fit. They owned it, not by virtue of citizenship merely, but of citizenship and domicile united; that is to say, by virtue of a citizenship confined to that particular locality.
> * * * * * * *
> Neither do we think this case is at all affected by the clause of the Constitution, which confers power on Congress to regulate commerce—Article 1, section 8. There is here no question of transportation or exchange of commodities, but only of cultivation and production. Commerce has nothing to do with land while producing, but only with the product after it has become the subject of trade. Virginia, owning land under water adapted to the propagation and improvement of oysters, has seen fit to grant the exclusive use of it for that purpose to the citizens of the State. In this way the people of Virginia may be enabled to produce what the people of the other States can not; but that is because they own property which the others do not. Their productions do not spring from commerce, but commerce to some extent from them.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator will allow me?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. In that same case was not the holding of the Supreme Court of the United States that fishing within the territorial waters of the State and the fishing privileges therein belonged exclusively to the State itself?

Mr. GRAY. That such waters belong exclusively to the State itself by reason of ownership of the soil and its absolute jurisdiction over its own territory.

Mr. MORGAN. That suggests a question that I desire to mention merely. It is not necessary that it should be discussed at all, but I want to put it on record for the reflection of Senators. I do not propose to discuss it myself, nor do I know that I could ask the Senator from Delaware to do it now.

Our Constitution, in the organization of our system of government, having reserved these rights of which the Senator from Delaware has been speaking, and which have been so clearly proven by the Supreme Court decision he has read, belong to the different States, and the suggestion being incontrovertible made by the Senator from Mississippi that within the jurisdiction of the States the Government of the United States has no right to make a cession to a foreign country of privileges of fishing, the question arises whether in the 3-mile belt of ocean water that lies outside the jurisdiction of the bays the Congress of the United States would have the right, or the President and Senate by treaty arrangement or the Congress by legislation, to admit foreign governments within that 3-mile limit to enjoy fishing rights, or whether the jurisdiction of the States extends in the ocean 3 miles beyond the shore at low-water mark.

The same question came up when a committee was sent out from this body to investigate the rights of the State of New Jersey to put limitations and restrictions upon the menhaden fisheries within 3 miles of the coast of New Jersey, and it was the opinion of a majority of that committee, I think, that the State of New Jersey had the right to regulate beyond her coast for 3 miles, the exclusive right of course, in respect of the fisheries; not in respect of navigation or commerce of any kind, but in respect of the fisheries.

I merely desire to suggest this to the Senator from Delaware now, because I have always supposed that the reason why in the treaty of 1783 no mention was made of the correlative or corresponding right of the colonial people to fish in our bays and along our coasts, why that attitude was taken by the British Government and by our Government also was because neither the congress of the confederation nor the Congress of the United States had a right to grant to the subjects of Great Britain whether abroad across the ocean or whether they lived on these shores, the right to fish within 3 miles of the coasts of the different States then bordering the Atlantic Ocean, and therefore Great Britain conceded to us the right to fish in all the places where we had been accustomed to fish along the coasts of her Northeastern possessions on this continent, and we were not called upon or expected to make, and did not make, any concession to British subjects of the right to fish along our coasts in the treaty of 1783 within the 3-mile limit.

Prior to the treaty of 1783 and prior to the Revolutionary war, all the different colonies had perfectly free access to fishing privileges, but the treaty of 1783 put an end to that and made a new line, so that after that treaty was made the people of the United States had the right to fish along the shores where they had been accustomed to fish in colonial times, and in all the bays and harbors as they had been accustomed to do, and that right was secured to them while no corresponding right whatever was secured to the Canadians or any other British subjects along our coast. I have always taken that to be an admission that under the Constitution of the United States the treaty-making power in this country had no right to grant to any foreign country the power to fish within the 3-mile limit.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Alabama state the names of the committee to which he alluded a little while ago as entertaining a certain opinion about the fisheries on the coast of New Jersey?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not recall the names of the gentlemen just now.

Mr. GRAY. I quite agree with the proposition which the Senator from Alabama suggests. Undoubtedly the territorial ribbon of 3 miles which by international law attaches to the coast of a country under our peculiar system belongs to the State to which it is attached. There is no territorial sovereignty of the United States over any portion of a State that is not granted to it by the State, or exercised under some general specific power of the Constitution itself, and it can not attach any more to a territory that is covered by water than to a territory which is entirely dry land. So that while that is a little abstract from the argument on which we are engaged, it is still interesting in passing to notice that as one of the incidents and results of our peculiar Federal system.

Now, Mr. President, I had not intended to discuss at length, and do not intend now to discuss at length, the topics that I have already addressed the Senate at large upon, but since I had the honor of submitting my views to the Senate when I believe no other speech had been made except that of the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Maine, a good deal has been said over and again about the proposition to ratify this treaty, a good deal has been said by those who oppose the treaty in regard to the question of the territoriality of the waters of the bays that indent the northeastern provinces. I have tried as well as I could to consider the argument that has been made in regard to the provision of the treaty which delimits those waters, which has been denounced as a surrender of large areas of water to the provinces.

I have tried earnestly and faithfully and impartially to consider the contention in that regard made by the Senators who have addressed the Senate on that side, and I have only been confirmed in the position which I took at first, that whatever may have been said at times by the statesmen of this country, whatever may have been said by the Secretary of State of the present Administration in his correspondence with the foreign office of Great Britain, where it was his duty, as representing the United States, to place his stakes out as far as he possibly could, to make his contention as broad as he possibly could in the interest which he had in charge; and although he, in performing this duty, has suggested some narrow limitations and spoken of the double cannon shot and the 6-mile limit, yet considering this on my oath and in reference to my duty as a Senator of the United States as a joint negotiator in this treaty, I am compelled—compelled here in the open Senate by the vote of a majority of this body—to say that that contention is without foundation either in international law or in any broad interest or policy of our own country. We can not, at least I can not, undertake to administer any rule to the Government with which we are treating that I am not willing to apply to ourselves.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him right there?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Upon the point of the habit of negotiators of a country presenting the extreme right and more than the extreme right of the country which they represent, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a historical fact, which has now passed out of the public mind, perhaps.

In 1818 there was a negotiation going on between the United States, represented by John Quincy Adams, and Spain, represented by a gentleman by the name of Don Luis de Onis, in relation to the acquisition of Florida. In that discussion it became very important to ascertain what were the boundaries of Louisiana and what were the boundaries of Florida. I hold in my hand a book, being the fourth volume of American State Papers—Foreign Relations—in which there is a letter of Mr. John Quincy Adams, dated March 12, 1818, and embracing eleven of these large pages, directed to the Spanish minister, Don Luis de Onis, in which Mr. John Quincy Adams, with an array of historical learning and ability rarely if ever equaled, undertook to prove that the western boundary of Louisiana was the Rio Grande; and the Spanish minister, in order "to see that"—to quote an expression—"and go one better," wrote a very learned letter to prove that the western boundary of Louisiana was the Mississippi River. I mention this negotiation between these two gentlemen, the Spanish minister contending that the eastern boundary of Mexico was the Mississippi River, in order that the country may know the value——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will allow me to ask him a question in regard to this historical fact of which he is speaking. I desire to ask the Senator from Mississippi if he means to intimate a belief that Mr. John Quincy Adams, in making that claim, claimed anything which he did not religiously believe.

Mr. GEORGE. I mean to assert this, Mr. President, that our negotiator, just like attorneys employed in cases, one upon one side and one upon the other, presses to the utmost extreme every possible right which he conceives that this country possesses.

Mr. HOAR. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. Let me get through. And to show the Senator from Massachusetts how much confidence John Quincy Adams had in this extreme claim, I have but to call the attention of that Senator and of the Senate and of the country to the fact that when the treaty was written, the Sabine River, 800 or 900 miles this side of the Rio Grande, was adopted as the western boundary of Louisiana; and to show how much faith the Spanish minister, Don Louis de Onis, had in his contention, the western boundary of Florida was fixed, I believe, at the Perdido River. So I do not think that it is a fair argument to say that our negotiators in time past claimed so and so.

I will mention another historical instance. In 1846 there was something said about "54° 40′ or fight" as the northern boundary of Oregon or Washington Territory, our Pacific country, and I believe the British pretension was that they went down to Mexico; and yet with the acquiescence of the whole country, everybody being satisfied that we had got all that we ought to have when the line was run between Great Britain and the United States, the forty-ninth parallel was adopted, between five and six degrees south of 54° 40′, as the true boundary. And so, I believe, though I am not familiar as to the details of it, that when Mr. Webster was Secretary of State, he concluded a treaty, called the Ashburton treaty, in which the boundary between Maine and Vermont and Canada was fixed; and whilst there were contentions upon the one side and upon the other that the line should go further south or further north, yet a line not consistent with the convention of either party before was adopted; and so it has always been.

Negotiators regard themselves, and I think properly, as the attorneys and representatives of their respective governments, and when they enter into negotiations they make contentions, they make claims, they assert rights upon the one side and upon the other, which in the end neither party insists upon, but some common and intermediate ground is occupied by both parties.

Now, to go back to the treaty of 1819, by which we acquired Florida. The Sabine River, I believe, is about 100 or 150 miles west of the Mississippi River—not exceeding 150 miles. The Rio Grande was 800 or 900 miles farther west. Our Government, through John Quincy Adams, insisted that we had a right to go to the Rio Grande, and yet when we came to settle down upon the final line to be agreed upon between the parties, we went very little over one-sixth of the ground which we had claimed.

So, Mr. President, it would be unfair, it would be unjust to the memory of that great man, it would be unjust to the memory of the American Senate, who in 1819 ratified the treaty with Spain by which we acquired Florida and fixed the boundary line between Mexico and the United States, for us now to say that here we prove by John Quincy Adams's letter that we had a clear title to that territory up to the Rio Grande, and when we came to settle we surrendered about four-fifths of it.

It is that incident to which I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Delaware, who has just been speaking to the Senate about the claims asserted on behalf of the American Government by the present Secretary of State.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, if the Senator from Delaware will allow me to make an observation in reply to the statement of the Senator from Mississippi, I should like to do so.

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Those two Senators, especially the Senator from Mississippi, seem to adopt as the guiding rule of American diplomatists in modern times the ancient definition of Sir Henry Wharton, that an embassador is a person sent to lie abroad for the service of his country, which gibe is said to have cost that eminent statesman and scholar (who, by the way, was merely speaking in joke, and who was one of the most honest and noble men who ever served the English Government anywhere) his position as embassador at the hands of King James I. Whatever may be said by the Senator from Mississippi in regard to Signor Don Luis de Onis, or whatever may be said by any other Senator in regard to any other negotiator in whose good fame he has an interest, I desire to repudiate with all the indignation of which I am capable the existence of any such rule of action in the brave and honest breast of John Quincy Adams. He believed, with as absolute sincerity as he believed in the right of his country to exist, in our title derived from the Louisiana purchase west to the Rio Grande. It was a belief which he not only urged at the time of the negotiations when he was Secretary of State in the Cabinet of James Monroe, but which he asserted and reasserted during the Texas controversy and the Mexican war down to the day of his death, and he spoke, as did many Democratic politicians of that time speak, of the addition of Texas to our confederacy as a reannexation or a recovery.

It is true that Mr. Adams was the guiding spirit on our side in the negotiations which fixed the boundary at the Sabine River, but it is also true that that treaty gave us Florida, and that the yielding to Spain, as a part of her then possession of Mexico, this unsettled, uninhabited, almost unknown territory to which we had a right, was not because of our abandonment of our original title to it as a matter of right, but because we received as an equivalent the noble purchase of Florida to the Gulf, essential to the preservation of our commercial and political empire in that part of the country.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask under whose advice the 800 miles of territory were given up?

Mr. HOAR. I do not see that that is a pertinent question, under whose advice it was given up. It was a good bargain. It was the great triumph, the great diplomatic triumph, the only triumph of any kind, almost, except the treaty of 1818, of the administration of Mr. James Monroe; and the two Florida Senators sit here by virtue of the action of that Massachusetts diplomatist.

I should not think the Senator from Mississippi would enjoy recalling to the memory of the American people the other instance which he gave us, that is the abandonment of our, as we always believed, plain and clear and unquestionable title to that noble territory, including Vancouver Island and a great part of British Columbia, which lies between the degrees of 49° and 54° 40′. That was not given up because the American negotiators or the American administration of the time did not believe we had the title to it, which, as an electioneering cry, they pretended they were about to enforce. The Democratic party that went into the Presidential election against Mr. Clay with "Polk, Dallas, and the Tariff of '42" written on its banners, professed to the loyal and patriotic States of the Northwest that they meant to stand by the title of the United States to 54° 40′; and when the time came Mr. Polk sent the members of his Cabinet around to consult in private different Southern Senators to know whether they would stand by the profession which had been made by that party in the election, and they refused. The men who were then serving the interests of slavery in this country did not mean that there should be any addition to the American empire——

Mr. GEORGE. Who were the Southern Senators? Name them.

Mr. HOAR. On whatever grounds——

Mr. GEORGE. Name them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi will take his seat.

Mr. HOAR. They did not mean that that empire should be added to the free loyal North when the contest between freedom and slavery was going on. I have been told within six months by the surviving member of Mr. Polk's Cabinet of his own conversations with some of the statesmen of that day.

Mr. President, it is not true that the honorable men charged with diplomatic service state, in the interests of their country, or their own, falsehoods that they do not believe. I do not think any person connected with the present Administration of the Government either has done or is capable of doing anything of that kind. When the Secretary of State said in regard to the numerous outrages on the fishermen of Massachusetts that they were brutal, that they were inhospitable, that they were outrages, when he said, and Mr. Phelps said, in the diplomatic correspondence, that our title to our fisheries stood on the grounds which have been discussed this morning, he said what he believed in good faith and in truth and on good ground; and when the Republican side of this Chamber stands to-day in the position which the Administration and which every one of its supporters on this floor occupied twelve months ago, we stand on it to-day in the same good faith, for the same reasons, and on the same ground unchanged as far as we are concerned, with no political bias causing us to eat our words or abandon our position, just where we stood and they stood twelve months ago.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] is entitled to the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. GRAY. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I think the Senator from Massachusetts would have had some occasion for his manufactured indignation if I had charged that John Quincy Adams had deliberately surrendered the magnificent territory now comprised within the State of Texas, when he believed we had a good title to it. Then there would have been ground for the Senator from Massachusetts to have become indignant at a betrayal of his country's rights by the Secretary of State, John Quincy Adams. Nor does he help himself out of that difficulty when he asserts that we got Florida in exchange for that territory. Read the treaty, sir. There is no language in that treaty which professes to cede away American rights to American territory. When you read in that treaty the language of cession, of grant, it is the language of Spain ceding the territory of Florida to the United States. When you come to the boundary line, when you come to the fixing of the Sabine and then up to the Arkansas as a boundary line between the two countries, you will find, if I am not mistaken, that the language of the treaty is that this is the boundary between the possessions of the two countries.

Mr. President, the Senator alluded to certain communications between Mr. Polk and certain Southern Senators in relation to the boundary of Oregon. I asked him to name the Senators. He declined to do it. I do not believe that any such communications took place. If they did take place, they were communications from somebody to somebody. There was a man on one side sending the communications, and upon the other there were men receiving them. Who were they? The Senator is dumb when that question is propounded to him; and if I desired to get up a little factitious indignation, I might say with great propriety that the Senator from Massachusetts has no right at this day, when these men are in their graves and can not be heard, to cast an insinuation which in the general terms in which he puts it may apply to any one of the eminent statesmen who represented the South in the American Senate in 1846. Who are the men? Who are the men from the South who bartered away their country's rights in that treaty? Who are the men who, knowing, as the Senator says John Quincy Adams knew with reference to the State of Texas, that it was a clear and indubitable right of the United States as the purchaser of Louisiana to all that territory up to the Rio Grande, surrendered it, and who, upon the other hand, knowing the rights of the United States were clear to Oregon up to 54° 40′, surrendered those rights?

Mr. President, there were doubts and disputes about all these things, just like there are about this treaty. Why, in the very treaty about which we have been discussing here for weeks, there is a plain acknowledgment on the part of the United States as well as on the part of Great Britain that neither country's rights were clear in that territory, for in one article of the treaty there is an express provision—this very fishing treaty of 1818—for a joint occupancy of all that territory both by the United States and England, to make it in common, and with an express stipulation qualifying this article that this agreement should not be held or treated as impairing the rights of either country to that part of the North American continent on the Pacific coast.

So, after all, Mr. President, we have come to this common point, that there was dispute, that there were claims, there were extraordinary claims, claims not borne out, made upon the one side and upon the other, and all compromised, a settlement made of them.

Mr. President, my attention was first called to this matter when I was a boy in 1846, the war with Mexico going on, Mr. Polk then being President, and the Democratic party contended that Texas extended to the Rio Grande. General Taylor was sent beyond the Nueces, sent almost in sight of the Rio Grande, and there he met the Mexican forces and two battles were fought, and who does not remember, is it not fresh in the memory of all, that it was denied by the Northern Whigs then that Texas extended to the Rio Grande? Who does not remember the contestation, the bitterness growing over the insertion of this phrase in the declaration of war made by the United States against Mexico, "Whereas war exists by the acts of Mexico?" And who does not remember that during the whole of Mr. Polk's administration, during the whole of that war, it was denounced as a falsehood, and it was claimed that Mr. Polk had invaded without the authority of Congress the territory of a peaceful and unoffending neighbor, and that the recital in the preambie to the declaration of war was, to use a phrase then common in the Northern portion of this country, "a flaunting lie."

That is the way things were done then; and if, as the Senator from Massachusetts says, John Quincy Adams asserted later in life that the annexation of Texas was a reannexation, then all this criticism, all this condemnation, all this opposition to Mr. Polk and the war of 1846 with Mexico was without just foundation.

Mr. President, I have said about all I intended to say upon this subject. I had no idea when I stated the historical fact here that we were going to have any controversy or excitement over it—none in the world. There stands the fact, the uncontroverted fact, the admitted and confessed fact by the Senator from Massachusetts, that John Quincy Adams believed that the claim of the United States under the purchase of Louisiana was good to the Rio Grande. There stands the other fact that the line was run to the Sabine by the treaty of 1819, and notwithstanding the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts that it was an exchange of territory, a swap, the language in that treaty when it came to put us in possession of Florida is the language of cession and grant, which it was right and proper that the party owning the territory should use, and when it came to the territory between the Sabine and the Rio Grande it is not based on any such language.

Mr. GRAY and Mr. HOAR addressed the Chair.

Mr. GRAY. If I may be allowed to interrupt the Senator from Mississippi and also the Senator from Massachusetts——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say one word in response to the Senator from Mississippi, with the leave of the Senator from Delaware.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HOAR. When I applied to the Senator from Delaware before for leave to respond to the Senator from Mississippi, he answered that he should be very glad to have me do so.

Mr. GRAY. I was very glad to hear the Senator, but that admission does not stretch out to the crack of doom.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the Senator now interposing seemed as though it was some invasion of his right.

Mr. GRAY. All right, Mr. President.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think that it will require more than two or three minutes to say what I have to say in regard to that marvelous logician, the Senator from Mississippi, and I beg to assure that Senator that his manifestations of anger or ferocity or personality will not in the least affect me in the discharge of any duty which it seems to me I am called upon to discharge in this Chamber.

Mr. John Quincy Adams believed, always believed to the day of his death, that the purchase of Louisiana gave us the territory to the Rio Grande. Spain denied that claim, insisted that it came to a point far east, to the east bank of the Mississippi, the Senator says, and I dare say that may be true. When we came to make a treaty Spain ceded us Florida, which did not belong to us before, and the words of cession were appropriate; but when we were fixing the western boundary of Louisiana, as we yielded to Spain something of our claim and she yielded to us something of hers, it may be that the parties did not use the language of cession on either side there, but only of fixing or declaring the boundary; and that is not in the least inconsistent with the belief of Mr. Adams on one side or of Spain on the other.

When we came to the Mexican war we were demanding back territory that we had by that solemn treaty given up to Spain, territory the title to which we were estopped in honor and in law from denying further. Therefore, it was not in the least inconsistent with Mr. John Quincy Adams's belief that that territory originally belonged to us before the treaty with Spain in 1819, to denounce the undertaking to wrest it from Spain's successor, Mexico, as an unwarrantable and unjust proceeding.

I do not think the logic of my honorable friend from Mississippi holds out very well. He starts out very well, but when he begins to get angry his logic seems to depart from him.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, if I am able to recall the argument I was endeavoring to make an hour and a half ago it was that the contention in regard to the territoriality of the bays that indent the northeastern provinces made on the other side of this Chamber was not justified by international law and found no proper basis in the interests or the policy of the United States; and the fact that our negotiators, or that a Secretary of State in his correspondence with a foreign secretary in regard to the rights of American fishermen in those waters, put out, as I said, I believe, his stakes as far as he could and made his contention as broad as he could, did not justify us who are here now, not to make a claim, not to present a demand, but to consider whether it is not a fair basis for an agreement; that is, to shut out all differences, to compose all strife, and settle all vexatious questions which have so long disturbed the diplomacy of both countries.

I say that the Secretary of State, contending for the proposition that our rights in those bays were not renounced by us in the treaty of 1818, wherever they were over 6 miles at their mouth, does not bind me, does not bind any Senator here, for we are bound upon our oaths by our duty as Senators to state what we believe the interests of our country demand in this exigency and what we are justified in contending for by international law and by a true public policy of the United States.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] interrupted me with my permission to state a very apt illustration of what often occurs in negotiation in the case of the claims made by John Quincy Adams for the western boundary of the Louisiana purchase. It does not follow at all that a diplomatic agent, not in negotiating a treaty, but in making a demand and stating the case of his country, is derelict to his conscience, is in default to good faith if he states all that can possibly be claimed, any more than a lawyer and advocate who, in stating his client's cause, places his damages at a large sum. He would not be justified in a preliminary statement of his case in leaving out any contention that had ever been made or suggested to him that had even the semblance of plausibility; but it is quite another matter, when we are debating here what is a just settlement and compromise between these two countries in regard to the territoriality of these bays, to contend for more than the policy of this country will ever concede in negotiation with a foreign government.

Mr. President, I do not propose to go over again the argument I submitted to the Senate in regard to the territoriality of these bays, but I do assert here in open Senate, because I am compelled to make the assertion in open Senate or not make it all, that the claim of Canada to jurisdiction over those bays, all of them, is as complete and as absolute as the claim of the State of Maryland to jurisdiction over Chesapeake Bay, or of the State of New Jersey and the State of Delaware over Delaware Bay.

You can not state the proposition otherwise unless you are forced into the position which I conceive no honorable man would like to be forced into, of saying that we have the right to enter their bays on account of their public character and at the same time exclude and drive out the parties with whom we are dealing from our bays on account of their private character.

There has been no argument adduced, there has been no authority cited by the other side to maintain the position that we have surrendered anything in those waters that properly belong to us. All the writers on international law who are now accepted as authority state, as I have before recited to the Senate, that bays which indent the territory and the body of a country are a part of the territory of that country. Mr. Wheaton, in his Elements of International Law, says:

> The maritime territory of every State extends to the ports, harbors, bays, mouths of rivers, and adjacent parts of the sea inclosed by headlands belonging to the same State.

Again, he says:

> We have already seen that, by the generally approved usage of nations, which forms the basis of international law, the maritime territory of every State extends:
>
> First. To the ports, harbors, bays, mouths of rivers, and adjacent parts of the sea inclosed by headlands belonging to the same State.
>
> * * * * * * *
> Thirdly. To the straits and sounds, bounded on both sides of the territory of the same State, so narrow as to be commanded by cannon-shot from both shores, and communicating from one sea to another.

In regard to the bays which indent the territory there is no settled rule except the one which appeals to the common sense and to the common fairness of great nations negotiating with each other. The configuration, the relation of the waters to the territory that surround it, all go to determine the territoriality of the waters in question. Such bodies of water thus situated, thus surrounded, are as much the territory of the State or nation as the cornfields that wave under the August sun. They are as much a part of its jurisdiction as the solid ground that is covered by its houses.

There has been no citation here that goes to show that this Government has ever admitted, or permitted itself or its agents to admit, a narrower contention than this. Self-respecting and powerful and great governments decide this question for themselves, and must decide it for themselves; and unless that decision is so gross, so violates common sense, is so subversive of accepted doctrines that it could not in fairness be admitted, it is acquiesced in by all other civilized countries.

I alluded to the fact that Delaware Bay had been decided by the Attorney-General of the United States in 1793 to be the territorial waters of the United States in regard to a ship which was sailing out of that bay, and which was seized in it as upon the high seas, and the Chesapeake Bay in 1808, in the case of another vessel, had also been decided to be territorial water of the United States. Great Britain, through her courts, has decided that the Bristol Channel, 20 or 30 miles wide, is part of the realm of England, and that its waters are within the body of the countries which border upon its shores. In a late case, which I did not have by me at the time, but I referred to it, between the United States Cable Company and the Anglo-American Telegraph Company, it has been decided that Conception Bay, on the coast of Newfoundland, a bay 15 or 16 miles wide—I do not know but 20 miles wide—is a territorial bay. It was decided after grave argument by the court of last resort in England, the judicial committee of the Privy Council. That case was argued by eminent counsel. Mr. Benjamin, who had achieved a position at the very head of the English bar, argued that case for the respondents, and his ability and character as a lawyer are sufficient to justify a citation from his argument. He said:

The point in question—

That is, a point in Conception Bay 10 or 12 miles from shore, where the cable company had fixed a buoy and attached their cable to it—

The point in question is as much part of the Island of Newfoundland as if it were dry land. The 3-mile rule is not applicable to this case; for in the case of a bay like this, distinctly formed by well-marked headlands, its area and waters fall within that territorial jurisdiction which includes its shores. Conception Bay is a bay in the sense in which that word is used by writers on international law when they lay down the rule that the jurisdiction of the sovereign of the territory extends over bays. It is unnecessary to lay down any abstract rule, but as a matter of fact, having regard to the extent and configuration of this bay, it is contended that it is within the territorial jurisdiction of the English Crown. All authorities concur that "parts of the sea" may be subject to territorial jurisdiction, and that bays and estuaries are parts of the sea.

He goes on further, after citing some authorities, to say:

But nothing can be more vague and inconsistent than the dicta which have been relied on in favor of some limitation of the extent of territorial bays. Vattel (bk. i, c. 23) makes the test the facility of occupation, which is vague enough, and his only illustration of a bay which is not a territorial bay is that of Hudson's Bay, an unfortunate illustration, since the Hudson's Bay Company not only held a grant from the Crown of England of the exclusive right of navigation in that bay, but they exercised it until Rupert's Land was transferred to the Dominion of Canada. In like manner Hautefeuille gives as his only illustrations of bays which are "in reality great parts of the completely open sea," the Bay of Biscay and the Gulf of Lyons, neither of which is inclosed within the territory of a single state.

I agree with Mr. Benjamin that the dicta on this subject are vague and inconsistent where they attempt to establish any limitation to the extent to which bays may be territorial and subject to the absolute jurisdiction of the country whose soil they indent. Whatever may be the rule as to the 3-mile ribbon along the coast of a country, whatever may be the foundation of that rule, whether it be the range of a cannon shot now or the distance to which the ordnance at the time the rule was first enunciated would carry, the law and usage in regard to these bays was upon a different basis. They were encircled in the arms of the land. They were locked in its embrace. They were necessary to its fiscal, to its administrative, and to its defensive policy. They never were and never could be given up by a self-respecting nation powerful enough to resist aggression. It is idle to talk of the United States ever conceding the waters of Long Island Sound, the waters of the Delaware Bay, or the Chesapeake, or of the Albemarle, or of any of the great bays which indent our coast. I care not what their extent may be, if they were as large as the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the United States would assert her jurisdictional right to the last man and the last dollar before she would concede one inch of such territory.

It is not in my blood to stand here and argue against those little provinces up there, weak in numbers, in wealth, and resources, when compared with the United States, for a contention which we would repudiate when sought to be applied to ourselves. I will never gain my own consent to so far abdicate every feeling and every obligation which ought to animate the citizens of a free country that stands right in the advance of the civilization of the world, as to try to impose upon a neighbor who has been sneeringly spoken of by Senators on that side as weak in its numbers and in its resources a rule which we would never submit to when applied to ourselves.

I heard the Senator from Maine speak with justifiable pride of the resources, the area, the population, the martial prowess, and strength of this great country of ours; and he contrasted it with the weakness and the poverty of resources of those provinces on our northern border. He did not advance to the logical conclusion, it is true, in words, but he left it to be drawn by those who listened to his interesting and able address, that for that reason, if for no other, it was incumbent upon us to crowd those provinces to the wall in this negotiation in which we are here taking a part, to listen to nothing on that side by way of remonstrance, to take as unworthy of consideration everything that might be urged by her representatives in behalf of their own country.

I say that this treaty came to us ear-marked with the justice and magnanimity that should belong to a great people. It comes to us surrendering nothing which belongs to the United States, and asking nothing that a proud and free people should not ask from those with whom they are brought into relation.

The Senators who oppose this treaty do not agree as to the grounds upon which they deny the territoriality of those waters, or the grounds upon which they assert the right of American fishermen to sail into those bays and estuaries at will, and to work their own pleasure when there. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] some weeks ago, when I had the honor of addressing the Senate on this subject, interrupted me to ask:

Does the Senator know of a human being in this country who puts any claim to these fishery rights on a denial of the jurisdictional rights of Great Britain's waters?

Again, further on, the Senator from Massachusetts said:

The Senator will pardon me. Perhaps I ought not to interrupt the Senator further. I will say, if the Senator will pardon me, that having studied this matter as faithfully as I could—

I was then arguing more in detail than I am now doing this very question of the territoriality of these waters—

I do not know a single man in the world who puts the American claim to these fishery rights on a denial or on any question made in regard to the jurisdictional rights of Great Britain's waters. I did not know it until the Senator stated it, and I think he will on reflection find that the present Secretary of State took a different position. On the contrary the Secretary of State in a letter to the citizens of Boston, which I shall comment on before this debate is over, begins by saying that this question solely relates to the fishery rights of one nation in the jurisdictional waters of another.

That is true; but it certainly does not bear out the statement of the Senator that no respectable authority can be cited to show that its jurisdictional rights had been denied, as a basis for the contention made by those who are opposing this treaty. The Secretary of State was perfectly right in his statement to the effect that this question relates to the fishing rights of one nation in the jurisdictional waters of another. We have to-day an intimate participation, under the treaty of 1818, not disputed, not denied, a tenancy in common with the subjects of Great Britain in large tracts of her coast, and we are enjoying that without molestation, without interference, and without protest of any kind, so far as I have ever heard or seen in any diplomatic correspondence that has been published between the two countries. There is no let and no hinderance of any kind to the enjoyment of those exceedingly intimate rights of a common fishery on certain coasts and bays which the convention of 1818 secures to American fishermen.

But notwithstanding this large easement in favor of American fishermen, notwithstanding this burdensome servitude to which those provinces are subjected in our favor, we did in the treaty of 1818 undertake to renounce the right of fishing in certain prescribed coasts and bays; and we are brought to-day face to face with that stipulation, and we can not argue around it, and we can not evade it, and the sophistry and ingenuity of learned Senators can not obscure or obliterate the plain requirements of the written word.

If the Senator from Massachusetts does not deny, as he says he does not deny, the jurisdictional rights of Great Britain in these waters of which I was then talking—for, of course, he does not deny them himself when he asks the question whether any human being had ever denied them—I would like to know upon what ground he bases his contention that notwithstanding the words of renunciation contained in the treaty of 1818 we have the right at our will, and without asking leave or license, to vex those waters with the keels of our fishing vessels except for the four purposes specified in the convention of 1818.

Now, Senators, we have these articles of this treaty presented to us which delimit those waters by way of interpretation of what the first article of the treaty of 1818 meant. This, as I said before, is a treaty of interpretation and not a new and independent treaty of "give-and-take" on one side and the other.

These commissioners on both sides were called upon to say what in common fairness and what in reason and in the intention of the parties the language of the treaty of 1818 meant, so that we might be relieved from the harassments and the annoyances that were constantly occurring and constantly inflicted upon our fishermen under color of a varying interpretation of language. That is what the office of this treaty professes to be; that is what it undertakes to perform, and in performing it it delimits certain bays and makes a rule of 10 miles width at the mouth as the rule of exclusion, not going to the whole length of Canada's contention, for it contended that every bay of the British dominion was excluded in that language of renunciation of the treaty of 1818, and so it was.

But they conceded something—the 10-mile rule suggested in the convention back in 1839 between Great Britain, Holland, and Denmark, in relation to the fisheries of the North Sea, and, later on, between France and England, in relation to the fisheries that they held in common. The extreme pretensions that were made by the Canadian Government were not acceded to in this treaty. They were obliged to recede somewhat from them.

Sir Charles Tupper, from whom the Senators on the other side are so fond of quoting, and with whom he is such a high authority, said in that debate, in which he produced the treaty and in which he was defending it as his handiwork before criticising eyes on the floor of the Canadian house of Parliament—defending himself against those who charged him with surrendering his country's rights—and who charged him with giving away great areas of water that were secured to the fishermen of Canada by the treaty of 1818—Sir Charles Tupper says:

I need not inform the house that in diplomatic intercourse it is customary, it is right for the representatives of a government to state the strongest and most advanced ground that they possibly can sustain in relation to every question, and I would not like, I confess, to be tried before the house by the ground taken by my honorable friend the minister of justice and by the minister of marine and fisheries. The ground they took was quite right.

They charged him with surrendering to the United States large areas of the waters which were secured by the treaty of 1818.

The ground they took was quite right; they were authorized by the strict terms of the treaty in taking the strong ground they did; they would have failed in their duty to this House and to this country if, called upon to deal with this question as a matter of diplomatic intercourse and discussion between the Governments of the United States and of Canada, they had not taken the extreme contention that the literal terms of the treaty of 1818 would warrant. They did their duty in adopting that course; but when it comes to a question of conference, to a question of international discussion for the purpose of ascertaining whether between the extreme contention on the one side and the extreme contention on the other, any standing ground may be found on which the two parties may meet and settle a dispute of great international difficulty by mutual concession, the case is entirely altered, and the responsibility resting upon the plenipotentiaries of any country would be very great if they refused to consider fair and reasonable concessions on the one side and to meet them by fair and reasonable concessions on the other. So that I have no hesitation in saying, that dealing with this great question in that spirit, dealing with a question that is of vital importance to the British Empire, of vital importance to the Government of Great Britain, who were constantly threatened with embarrassment and serious difficulties and collision with the great country to the south of us, a question, too, of great magnitude to the United States of America, a question of still greater magnitude, in my judgment, to the people of Canada, one on which we had more at stake and more to lose in a great struggle of that kind than either of the great countries to which I have referred—I say looking at the question in that broad and national spirit, looking at it with a desire to remove the possibility of what I consider would be the greatest misfortune that could happen to the civilized world—a collision between the two great English-speaking nations—looking at it from that broad standpoint, it would have been criminal on my part and on the part of those who represented Her Majesty's Government and the interests of the people of Canada if they had not endeavored by making fair and reasonable concessions to find a common ground that would present a solution of those important and serious questions, that might enable a treaty to be formulated and accepted as a just and equitable settlement upon both sides. As I have said, our concessions did not rest at the delimitation.

Mr. President, Senators may say what they please about Sir Charles Tupper; Senators may say that the Canadian people, the Canadian authorities, are not fit to be dealt with at all, and that the United States ought not in its own interest ever to negotiate with them on any subject, but press them to the wall with our sixty millions against their five millions, all the time. But, nevertheless, that language of Sir Charles Tupper will stand there to rebuke them. It will stand there in its fairness and in its honor—in its conformance to the rules of Christianity and civilization—to shame them long after this discussion has passed away and become a mere record of our parliamentary history.

I have been led on at greater length than I expected to discuss again this question. My only excuse for thus trespassing upon the patience of the Senate at this hour is that since I last spoke some speeches have been made to which I have listened with interest. One was made by a distinguished Senator whose ability and character I greatly respect, the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS].

That Senator, in his long argument the other day in regard to this matter, though he dwelt upon it, did not seem to me to be able to advance one step in the direction in which it was necessary for him to go in order to establish his contention.

I was not able, by the most attentive hearing, to discover what rule or what policy it behooved the United States to lay down in respect to the territoriality of bays that indented a country. He pointed out upon the map a certain bay on the southern side of Prince Edward Island—Egmont Bay, I think it was—and said it was absurd to call that a bay, and, with a general sweep of his hand in regard to all those bays, he seemed to dismiss them from the discussion as not being worthy of consideration as to whether they individually were or were not such bodies of waters as Canada was justified in claiming jurisdiction over.

The Senator spoke of the Franconia case. I was familiar with that case, but I did not see its applicability to any contention that is made on this side nor as to any question or issue that has been made between those who oppose and those who support the ratification of this treaty.

The Franconia case was this: She was a vessel beating down the English Channel in or near the Straits of Dover, and in one of her tacks came over to the English coast and within the 3-mile belt, and while thus navigating those waters, while exercising her right of navigation on the high seas, which allowed her to go, for the purposes of sailing, within the territorial waters of countries that bordered the seas upon which she was—while within that 3-mile limit a murder was committed upon her deck; and the question arose in the English courts, not whether there was any territoriality or territorial jurisdiction attaching to the realm of England in regard to those waters, but a question whether the court of assizes of the county which bordered upon that coast could entertain jurisdiction of the case, could try it, and could convict and condemn the prisoner whom it had before it.

Upon an appeal, it was decided, by 7 to 6, that that court, which professed to exercise a jurisdiction which had been conferred by a statute of William the Fourth—a statute conferring upon the county courts in criminal cases the jurisdiction of the high admiral's court—could not, under that act, entertain that jurisdiction, and also that the high court of admiralty did not possess that jurisdiction at the time the act was passed, and therefore it could not have been transferred. But it expressly asserted the right of England, by Parliament, to provide for just such a case, and to assert jurisdiction over that ribbon of water, only declaring that as yet Parliament had not made that provision and had not invested any court with a jurisdiction in that particular case.

That is all there is in the Franconia case that was cited at great length and commented on by the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS]. I mean all that was in it that could by any posssbility be pertinent to the question here.

There was a great deal said by the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] that was interesting and philosophical in regard to the act of Parliament that was passed afterward and the tentative way in which that act of Parliament undertook to deal with that jurisdiction, but it was all beside that question that is now occupying our attention.

No, Mr. President, we have surrendered nothing. If we look for surrenders in treaties we must go far back of this one now proposed to the Senate; we must look for it under other administrations and under other negotiators.

The treaty of 1871, following a series of annoyances and pestering harassments, made for the very purpose of bringing about a reciprocity treaty, and to get, what I confess they all want, the right to sell fish free in our markets, it is regarded as a horrible crime that they should even want it or try to get it. That treaty was made when Consul Dart, I think it was, who was at the time consul-general at Montreal, had written to the Secretary of State that he had conversed with members of the Canadian Parliament and had been told by them, when protesting against these harassments of our fishermen, that they were made and continued for the purpose of bringing about a treaty of reciprocity.

There it was upon the files of the Department, there it is published in the correspondence to-day. Under the pressure of these seizures—there were ten or twelve vessels seized and forfeited and not a cent of money or compensation of any kind was ever returned—no remonstrance was made by our Government, no demands for indemnity or compensation was made; and in the face of all that we negotiated a treaty, and we gave them our markets and we gave them five and a half million dollars besides.

I am not charging the President of the United States or his able and patriotic Secretary of State, Mr. Fish, with basely surrendering any American right. I accord them the full meed and tribute of my praise, that they were patriotic and representative American citizens, and that they were endeavoring to discharge their duty to the country by the best lights that they had, but we heard nothing then by way of denunciation of this proposed surrender. No Senator here rose and paced these aisles and in his wrath denounced President, Secretary, negotiators, and all, as men who made a humiliating and cowardly surrender of American rights. No, that treaty was taken into the Senate and the doors were closed, and we are to suppose that it was discussed decorously and fairly as a convention and treaty between two great countries, and the benefits on one side and on the other were weighed; and when the doors were opened and it came out, it was found that the treaty was ratified.

Mr. President, what is it that makes the difference? It is not a difference of facts, not a difference of conditions, except that the condition of things in 1886 and 1887 was far less exasperating and far less exacerbating than in 1870 and 1871. Ten vessels were then seized and forfeited, and the Government of the United States, then in the hands of General Grant and Mr. Fish as Secretary of State, never opened their mouths, as the correspondence discloses, by way of demand for indemnity to the citizens who had thus been treated. In 1886 and 1887 three vessels have been seized; two have been forfeited, and only two, and the other returned. Those are the conditions. And after, and not before, the English Government had modified its instructions to its minister of marine and to the captains of these cruisers, and forbidden the Canadians to exercise the extreme authority which they had pretended to, the year before, in seizing American fishermen and calling them "within the bounds"—on the remonstrances of this Administration—I say after that, and not before, negotiations were entered into which have resulted in the treaty now before us.

What do we see here? Those who wish to oppose this treaty not coming here to argue as to what each section and article really means. I am not impugning the right of judgment of Senators. I accord to them the same privilege that I exercise myself, of judging of each article and of all the articles by the best lights that I can bring to shine upon them. But instead of that we have a denial of patriotism to those who happen to support the Administration and are opposed in politics to Senators on the other side of this Chamber.

They taunt us here in open session with arguing on the British side of this matter. Ah, Senators, you know that no taunt was ever so irritating to a Democrat; you know that you never could insult a Democrat so much as by telling him that he was taking the British side against the side of his country. The Democratic party has no history and no policy and no position in regard to foreign matters or in its attitude to Great Britain or to all the world that it is ashamed of. Democrats have always been ready to press to the extreme when their country's right and their country's honor were concerned every contention which concerned a foreign government or a foreign country. They do not need to be incited to stand up for their country. They need rather to be repressed and their ardor checked until negotiation and statesmanship have stated the issues and given them the position and standing of a national quarrel which they can maintain against all the world.

As my friend from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] said the other day, in endeavoring to give this question such a position and such a status that we can stand upon it, and such as a decent respect to the opinion of mankind requires that we should give, we are not trifling or bartering or trafficking, but mean business. When that sort of negotiation and that sort of appeal shall fail, I know that the country feels safe in the hands of a Democratic Administration and feels secure while it remains in the hands of the men who now wield executive power in this country.

Senators may say what they will, there is an abiding faith in this country in Democratic methods; that Democratic administrations have never sacrificed the honor of their country, or meant anything or done anything that could be characterized as a surrender, in the faintest possible degree, of their country's right. And so, instead of a calm discussion of these articles, item by item, giving the Administration credit for endeavoring to do its whole duty in the exigency which came to it, and which it did not seek, we hear denunciation and imputation.

Outrages are recited; every seizure, no matter how much within the law or how much within the rights given by the treaty of 1818, no matter how violent might have been the infraction of the law, all are paraded as outrages, no statement upon the other side being made. I do not care to state the other side; but, in my duty as a Senator, I have undertaken to read as many of these cases as I could. Many of them were unjustifiable; many of them were of a character that justice or fairness could not warrant. But all these infractions in inhabited waters are put down as outrages. The fact of not being allowed to ship crews is the grand outrage of all. I pointed out, in the speech I made some time ago, some thirty or forty cases reported to the Secretary of State, in which the complaint was, and was alone, that the vessel was not allowed to ship her crew in Nova Scotia, but was compelled to bring them down by rail, thereby incurring great expense.

Mr. VANCE. And violating our laws.

Mr. GRAY. And violating our laws, as the Senator from North Carolina says—our laws against contract labor. Ay, even the hauling down of the flag has been cited. Ah, Senators, those who have been brought up in the school in which I have been brought up—those who have shared the political faith of the Democratic party—can laugh in your face when you undertake to teach them how to resent a national insult.

And yet more than one Senator on that side has, with evident delight, taken the statement that the Marion Grimes, when seized, and being in Canadian control for an alleged infraction of the Canadian customs laws, had the flag hauled down from her masthead. Well, I do not know about that, except that no Democratic administration ever permitted the flag to be hauled down without ample apology under any circumstances. But I do know that if a Canadian vessel had been seized for an infraction of the customs laws of the United States in the port of New York, our laws, and international usage, would require that her flag be hauled down until she was released.

But the Senator from Massachusetts, the Senator from Maine, and, I believe, all the other Senators who pick this up as a matter with which to cloud and obscure the judgment of Americans, as it is natural it should be clouded and obscured when an insult to our flag is spoken of, flaunt this before us here over and over again. When they have been told, and have read from the record, just what was said by the Canadian authorities and the British Government, and the apology that was demanded and made in regard to that matter, some Senators said that no such thing had ever happened under any other Administration.

Ah, Mr. President, they forget. In 1872, after the treaty of 1871 had been negotiated, but before the legislation necessary to carry it into execution had been enacted, an American fisherman was seized by a Canadian cruiser, and her flag was hauled down, but then put up again with the British flag on top of it, and the American flag union down—an aggravated, unnecessary, and intentional insult. Hauling it down in obedience to their general orders was one thing, but putting it up in a position of degradation was another. That was in 1872.

I am not here to charge General Grant or Mr. Fish with not being patriotic; I know that they were both of them as patriotic as they were eminent and able, and brave as they were both. But they did not see it worth while to go off into a tantivy about this thing. They resented this outrage and they received an apology, not from Great Britain, but from Canada, and the Canadian officials said that it was a mistake of the commander of the cruiser. Although he had general orders to haul down the flag of every vessel that was seized, he had no right to raise it again, union down, under the British flag, and they said they regetted that he had done so, and had sent him a reprimand. But the orders of the Dominion Government, that the flag should be hauled down from every vessel seized, was stood upon, and no recision was asked by our Government from that position.

That is all. Mr. Fish properly enough conformed to diplomatic usage and diplomatic language, and I [illegible] no fault to find with him.

Let me read what the consul says upon the subject.

He (the captain) said:

He acted by orders, meant no insult; offense repeated next morning, but American flag not upside down. Lavoie, senior of Lachance, arrived, directed his attention to spectacle of flags; desired him to rectify fault; agreed to, but about thirty minutes after vessel sailed for Quebec with flags flying; captain of schooner originally from Nova Scotia; did not desire consul's assistance; reported to consul-general and consul at Quebec; believe Lachance was encouraged to act by shore influence, but respectable people express regret.

Now, Mr. Fish says to Mr. Thornton, who conveys, not the apology of the English Government, but the explanation of the Canadian official, who regrets the occurrence. Mr. Fish says:

It only remains for me to express my thanks for the prompt measures which have been taken by yourself and the Canadian authorities, to do away with the unpleasant impression produced by the error of the captain of the vessel who made the seizure of the James Bliss.

Mr. DAWES. You said the captain was reprimanded. By whom?

Mr. GRAY. He was reprimanded.

Mr. DAWES. I did not know he was reprimanded.

Mr. GRAY. Yes, he was.

Mr. DAWES. No, he was not. The record does not show it.

Mr. GRAY. He was carrying out the orders which have been cited as the authority for hauling down the flag, which were never complained of, and never apologized for at all. There was no apology for hauling down the flag in the case I refer to in 1872, only an expression of regret that the officer should have so far forgotten his duty as to put it up again under the British flag and union down.

Mr. DAWES. I thought you said he was reprimanded.

Mr. GRAY. So he was.

Mr. DAWES. Who reprimanded him?

Mr. GRAY. I hope the Senator will not interrupt me by putting questions like that.

I am stating the two cases and do not want to quibble about them or about words. I am comparing the attitude of the Administration in the two cases. I say that when Senators are comparing them, they are estopped by their manhood and by their American citizenship from continuing the imputations which they have already made.

It is not the fishermen whose rights this treaty was intended to protect who come here, but the orators of the fishermen, the retained counsel who come here and complain of this treaty.

The men who complain are the men who own schooners which have gone into those waters with two men and a boy, and are expecting to ship in Nova Scotia hardy American seamen. These men who are supposed to be conducting a primary school of American seamenship, lo and behold! are doing nothing of the kind, but are pursuing their own profit, just as all other Americans have the right to do under this glorious flag of ours. And yet, when it was first alluded to, indignant denial came up on that side that there was any percentage at all, or any large percentage, of these men that were not American fishermen; but finally the denial has become more and more faint until now we we hear nothing of it.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], when he comes to make his speech, "confesses and avoids," and says that it is good policy for us to let these Nova Scotians come here and let them see what a great State we have in Massachusetts, and that it will have a missionary effect on these Canadian fishermen! But they go back home, nevertheless, with great regularity, to spend the profits that they have put into their pockets, honestly earned on the decks of American ships. When formerly addressing the Senate on this subject I was not prepared to say that there was a majority of these men employed by these fishing craft who were not American fishermen. I feel justified now in saying that there are more than 50 per cent. of them that belong to the Canadian Provinces and are not American citizens.

This very morning, since I came here, I happened to be looking, for another purpose, over the argument at the Halifax Commission, and I find that Mr. Foster, in arguing the case of the United States, and in performing his duty with great ability and learning, as he undoubtedly did, tried to minimize the value of the privileges for which we were to pay. In the course of his argument he said:

It might be a curious question, if it were important enough to dwell upon it, whether, in assessing against the United States the value of the privilege of fishing inshore, you were or were not to take into account the fact that half of the people who fish on shores in United States vessels are subjects of Her Majesty, and having disposed of their half of the fish, having paid half of the fish for the privilege of using the vessel and its equipment, they sell the other half of the fish and bring the proceeds home; and whether it is a just claim against the United States if British subjects go in United States vessels, to require the United States to pay money because they do so.

Mr. GEORGE. Whose languge is that?

Mr. GRAY. It is the language of Mr. Foster, the agent of the United States before the Halifax Commission.

It is impossible to get exact figures about this matter, but I have enough information to justify me in the belief that the people who are objecting to this treaty—the people in whose interests objections to this treaty are made—are not the hardy young American fishermen to whom we look to man our Navy in time of war, and for whom I have as much admiration as any Senator on this floor—a hearty sympathy and a proper pride in all their achievements, their character, and their courage.

But I say that this treaty, in that, among other respects, it does not permit their employers to go up to Canada and employ Canadian fishermen, is made in their interest and that a large part of the objection and complaint to us, as to its motive and its origin, is in that fact, that these men who have found it profitable to employ Canadian fishermen have found that this treaty has left them out in the cold in that respect.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi appeals to the Senator from Delaware. Does he yield?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. On that point I desire to read a little. I wish to read from the Boston Herald of August 10, of this year, some "proceedings of the Deep Sea Assembly of the Knights of Labor, whose membership is largely composed of fishermen." The Boston Herald of that date says that they "adopted the following resolutions this evening."

I only propose to read one paragraph of the preamble now. They are denouncing the fishing trust. They say:

Whereas, should said trust be successful in its aims and intentions, the business would be rendered so unprofitable that the comparatively few American citizens now found on board of the vessels will be obliged to seek other employment.

This is from the proceedings of the Knights of Labor at Gloucester, Mass.

Mr. MORGAN. What is the number of the society? Is the number of the society or assembly given?

Mr. GEORGE. It is said to be the "Deep Sea Assembly, Knights of Labor." What I have read is a slip cut from the Boston Herald, and sent to my friend, the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], who handed it to me. I will read the whole slip at some time during the debate. That part is enough now to sustain the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. GRAY. I am much obliged to the Senator from Mississippi. I do not propose, Mr. President, to weary the patience of the Senate by dwelling longer on this point.

In the course of the discussion that I have had heretofore in regard to the meaning of the words of renunciation in the treaty of 1818, I quoted Mr. Webster as admitting, as I felt myself compelled to admit, that the strict and literal interpretation of these words excluded us from the bays that were mentioned in the renunciation, and I quoted his language in his famous circular to the fishermen, written at his home at Marshfield, in which it was said that it would appear to be an oversight in the commissioners that negotiated the treaty of 1818 to have made so large a concession as they did in framing the language of that renunciation.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] interrupted me to ask whether I had seen it stated that Mr. Webster was not the author of that circular, that he was up in Massachusetts and had, I think, been injured by a fall from a carriage at the date of that circular, and that the circular was supposed to have been issued here in the State Department by some subordinate officer and without Mr. Webster's personal or direct authority, although it was ascribed to him and came regularly from his Department.

The Senator from Colorado, when I asked him what his authority was, said that he had no direct authority for the statement, but said he had seen that it was stated in debate. The Senator the other day in his speech, while not adopting as his the suggestion that he then made that that circular might possibly have been without authority, stated again that it had been suggested in the course of the debate had in 1852 that it was without Mr. Webster's direct personal authority but declined to discuss it on that assumption. It will be of interest to the Senator from Colorado as a matter of history, and perhaps to other Senators, to know how directly Mr. Webster is connected with this matter.

After my colloquy with that Senator I had occasion to look up the matter and find it in volume second of the Private Correspondence of Mr. Webster, at page 239.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will pardon me, I did not make any statement about it, but asked the Senator whether he had seen that statement controverted, that was all. I made no statement myself about it at all.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Colorado was not in when I began my statement. I stated that fact substantially when I commenced, and the Senator from Colorado has stated it correctly. But that Senator did call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in the debate had in 1852 in the Senate the authorship of this proclamation, so far as Mr. Webster was concerned, was doubted, but not denied. Mr. Webster's authority was so great and his ability and name of such influence that anything coming from him that made against the contention of the other side would naturally be questioned.

I now read from volume 2 of the private correspondence of Mr. Webster this letter written by him to President Fillmore on the 17th of July, 1852.

[Copied from volume 2 of private correspondence of Daniel Webster, page 539.]

Mr. Webster to Mr. Fillmore.

FRANKLIN, July 17, 1852.

MY DEAR SIR: The interruption of the usual occupation of our fishermen in the British provinces is a very serious business. I fear much difficulty may arise from it.

Following your suggestion to Mr. Hunter, I have prepared a paper which will appear in the newspapers in this part of the country immediately, and have directed its publication in Washington. I hope you will approve of it. If I felt well enough and strong enough I would proceed immediately to Washington, but I do not. I wrote to-day a letter to Mr. Crampton, a copy of which I now inclose to you. We shall be obliged, I am persuaded, to look up this business of the fisheries as well as the whole subject of the Canadian trade as matter of negotiation. Congress will never do anything. I will thank you, at your earliest convenience, to signify to me your wishes and your opinions.

I leave these mountains and valleys with great reluctance, but it seems to be necessary.

Yours always truly,

DAN'L WEBSTER.

Mr. GIBSON. What date is that?

Mr. GRAY. It is dated July 17, 1852, and is addressed to President Fillmore.

Here is the letter to Mr. Crampton to which Mr. Webster referred in his letter to the President.

Mr. Webster to Mr. Crampton, British minister at Washington.

FRANKLIN, July 17, 1852.

MY DEAR MR. CRAMPTON: The threatened interruption by force, of that enjoyment of the fisheries which the fishing vessels of the United States have so long practiced and possessed without interruption or molestation, is a serious affair, and I fear full of danger. I wish to see you as soon as you can possibly come North.

If I am not in Boston at the Revere House, please proceed immediately to Marshfield, bringing with you as many of your adjuncts as you please.

I have recommended to the President that we take up the whole subject of the fisheries and the Canada trade at once, as matters of negotiation.

You will see in the Boston papers of Monday an official publication by me. Is it not possible for you to prevail with the provincial authorities to institute no hostile proceedings against American fishing vessels till longer notice be given, and until you and I may have conferred together on the subject?

I am anxious to see you at once. On receipt of this, inform me by telegraph when you can be in Boston.

I am, with great regard, yours always truly.

DAN'L WEBSTER.

These letters I thought would be interesting to the Senate in view of the fact that Mr. Webster's name had been used in this debate, and his authority had been quoted for the proposition that those bays in the northeastern provinces were inhibited by the treaty of 1818 from American fishermen.

I have only one comment to make, in passing, on the letters of Mr. Webster that I have just read; that, to his great mind at that time, it did not seem undiplomatic or unpatriotic to suggest to the President of the United States that these troubles, which were evidencing themselves in seizures on the northeastern frontier, and in inhibitions by force, to use his own language, against our fishermen using those waters, should be the subjects of negotiation. In his letter to Mr. Crampton, the British minister, he invites negotiation, and we know that that negotiation invited in 1852, and no doubt accepted then in the short interval that intervened between that letter and his death, resulted finally in the reciprocity treaty of 1854.

I have been somewhat desultory in my remarks, Mr. President. I did not intend to address the Senate to-day, but I have been led on to speak about some of these things as they came to my mind. I think this great question of jurisdiction over the waters that are commonly called, fairly called, properly called "bays" lies at the very foundation of this discussion. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in his remarks the other day so considered them. I had intended to make some specific reply to the argument of the Senator from Ohio, to which I listened with great attention and interest, but as I did not see him in his seat until this moment I allowed the occasion to go by. I say that I listened to that speech with interest, with pleasure, and with satisfaction; that is, to the greater part of it. I agree with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] that the attitude of the Senator from Ohio is statesmanlike and becoming his great reputation.

I was disappointed, however, and very much disappointed, after such an exordium, that the argument of his speech seemed to betray, I say it with entire respect to the Senator, a good deal of confusion of mind as to what the treaty really provides for. I had intended to point out to the Senator from Ohio and to the Senate (because any argument of his on this or any other question is entitled to great weight) what I conceive to be errors of fact into which he has fallen in discussing this matter.

He certainly confuses the fifteenth article with the operative clauses of the treaty. He spoke of the mere offer of the British or Canadian Government to give us certain privileges when the legislative department should grant free fish, an article that might be stricken out of this treaty and not affect its operation one iota. It was merely that the negotiators upon our side in dealing with the negotiators on the other side, who were evidently much disappointed when they came down here to find that they could not even discuss the question of free fish, by way of letting them down easy, I suppose, said "make your offer of what you are willing to give for free fish. It is not within the competence, in our view, of the Executive to treat concerning matters of revenue, but you can make your offer to the American people, and their Congress, when they see fit, can pass upon it." That was all there was about that fifteenth article, yet the Senator from Ohio dwelt upon it and inveighed against it eloquently and strongly, as if it was an operative and substantial part of the treaty itself. He told us what we wanted. He said, "We must have everything that we want in those waters." Surely he could not have intended all that his language would seem to imply. He continued:

I believe that if our Government had demanded commercial privileges such as our fishermen want, they would have been conceded.

He did not allude to the commercial privileges that were actually secured to them by this treaty, but he went on to say:

I read a little paragraph from a fisherman which strikes me as giving an exact statement of what they want:

"What our fishermen want is the right to go anywhere and everywhere, use their harbors, ship men, get provisions, land and mend our nets, buy salt and barrels, and ship our catch home by rail or steamer without expense or annoyance, the same as we have heretofore."

I suppose the Senator from Ohio indorses that.

Yet he seems to have forgotten that shipping the catch home by rail would put the Canadian fishermen at a great disadvantage.

He said that we want equality with the Canadian fisherman, who can ship by rail from Halifax to this country all his catch! It would be a reciprocity, I am sure, of which the Senator would be ashamed to be the suggester, if he demanded from those poor Canadians that Americans should go into Halifax and transship the catch by rail to Boston, paying no duty whatever, while the Canadian can only transship by paying a duty. There is no equality about that.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will allow me, I would say that the Canadians now, to-day, ship their fresh fish packed in ice, frozen fish, down into our market, and although our fishermen may catch their fish side by side with these Canadians in an open sea, our fishermen can not send them in that way, although the railroad itself is owned largely, as I am told, by Americans.

Mr. TELLER. They send them to the far West by way of Chicago.

Mr. SHERMAN. They send them to the far West, as has been suggested by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is talking about fresh fish, about which he did not talk in his speech, while I am talking now about salt fish. The fresh fish matter is a matter distinct by itself, and about which there is a great deal to say. I admit that fresh fish was made free in 1870.

With a Republican Congress in both branches, the bill being signed by a Republican executive, I admit that under the new process of treating it there has been brought about a condition of things not contemplated at the time. But we are not responsible for that. This Administration is not responsible for that. Fault is found with the Secretary of the Treasury for admitting frozen fish as fresh fish free for immediate consumption. I think that is the language under the law.

Now, I do not see how the Secretary of the Treasury could have avoided in the performance of his duty, putting that construction on the law, and he was justified in it by a decision of a circuit court made by a judge who was appointed long ago in the good old Republican times—and I hope they will get older and older, those Republican times [laughter]—that this law admitting fresh fish for immediate consumption to come in free did apply to this frozen fish that was brought in. So that that takes away that ground of complaint even against the Secretary of the Treasury for the construction which he felt obliged in the performance of his duty to put upon that clause of our law.

Mr. BECK. Now, will the Senator yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. GRAY. With pleasure.

Mr. BECK. Will it trouble the Senator from Delaware if I answer the question of the Senator from Ohio and make a few remarks now?

Mr. GRAY. Not at all; nothing will trouble me.

Mr. BECK. I do not know much about the details of this treaty, but the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] having put a question in regard to fresh fish being now admitted duty free, I desire to say a word. I suppose it is known to all of us that a Republican Congress, then Republican by over two-thirds majority, with a Republican President, in July, 1870, admitted fresh fish duty free without any sort of connection with the Canadian fisheries, Canadian interests, or English interests. We admitted fresh fish free because the American Congress thought it was in the interest of our own people to do so.

Mr. GRAY. Yes.

Mr. BECK. I heard the speech delivered by the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] the other day—I picked it up in the RECORD just now. I hope I do not interrupt the Senator from Delaware too much——

Mr. GRAY. Not at all.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] said:

Then, again, when the Republican party put fresh fish on the free-list there was no conception of the present condition of things in this country. When fish were put on the free-list under the item "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption," it was understood that that meant fish fresh for immediate consumption—taken to-day and used to-morrow or the next day. But since that time there have sprung up under the inventive genius of this country refrigerator cars and refrigerators on every fishing vessel.

This method of freezing the fish and keeping them on board the vessels themselves for two months at a time is now in vogue, and to-day you can take on the banks a cargo of halibut, you can keep them on that vessel for two months, you can land them in Gloucester, you can send them to Boston frozen, packed in ice; you can put them into the great refrigerators of the Boston market, you can keep them three months there, you can take them from that great refrigerator and put them on the refrigerators in the cars, and you can land them in two thousand nine hundred and eighty counties of this Republic in as good and perfect condition as if they had been salted or smoked. Now, I say when fish for immediate use were put on the free-list it was never dreamed that these fish would be transported all over the United States and kept for six months.

So long as free fresh fish could only reach such points as Boston and Portland, Me., and the people of the New England coast could get them cheap, at say $2 a barrel cheaper than they would if they had paid the tariff tax, that was eminently satisfactory to New England statesmen; but as soon as a process was discovered or invented whereby the people of Ohio, of Kentucky, and of the interior of the country could have the benefit of the law that the American Congress passed to give them free fresh fish, then it became an offense in the eyes of the New England representatives; and that is at the bottom of all the fuss that is now being made about this treaty, which all agree is much better than the treaty of 1818.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], better perhaps than most Senators, recollects when Bessemer steel was taxed $28 a ton, that was only the equivalent of 45 per cent. ad valorem when the duty was imposed, but the basic process, the Siemens-Martin process, and the open-hearth process brought it down until——

Mr. FRYE. The tariff again!

Mr. BECK. Yes, the tariff is at the bottom of all your clamor about fish and fisheries. It is an attempt to make a grab, if I may use a vulgar word, by the trusts or combinations in New England to put money in their pockets at the expense of American consumers of fish that has brought about all this trouble; it is done in the interest of Gloucester and Boston syndicates. That fact is so patent that even the laboring men of New England are protesting against it as a job set up by combinations of capitalists, who, under patriotic pretenses, are seeking to rob the people of this country.

Let me go on. When Bessemer steel was 45 per cent. at $28 a ton duty at first, and afterwards doubled, all the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber sought to maintain it; even after it became 120 per cent. they were content to give Mr. Carnegie, as he told Mr. SCOTT he got, a million and a half in one year. No wonder that he could build castles and libraries and schools, and carry your distinguished—not President, but the Warwick of your party, the power behind the throne—in his coach and four all over England and Scotland. He ought to contribute liberally to your campaign fund, and doubtless the Gloucester fish syndicate will also.

The purpose is evident when we look at the remedy these patriotic gentlemen propose? Stop free fish, enrich the syndicates because the men of the country who are now getting them cheap under American laws ought not to be allowed to have them unless they pay tribute to the Gloucester syndicate and to the combinations that are freezing out all the independent fishermen and small dealers as well as all the laboring men of the country. They insist that the President shall not negotiate with England. They insist that the time for consultation or agreement has passed. One thing only must be done—stop the importation of free fish and New England will be satisfied! Is not that a wonderful panacea for all the evils we have had recounted here for months? We are dealing with England in this treaty, not with Canada, or Canadian fishermen. We can no more treat with Canada than England could treat with Kentucky or Ohio. England is the country we have to deal with.

The Government of Canada forced Nova Scotia, against the protest of that province as I can show, into the Dominion. The Dominion Parliament controls all. The Parliament passes the laws that are complained of. They or England send their cruisers to the coast and do whatever damage is done to our fishermen, and we are told here day after day the time for negotiation has passed, and that we must punish the poor Canadian fishermen. Why not England or the great interests of the Dominion of Canada through her subsidized railroads and canals? Retaliate, you say.

Retaliate on whom? On Great Britain? No. On the Dominion of Canada? No. Republican Senators declare that would be an outrage. They demand that the President shall retaliate upon the poor individual fishermen along the coasts of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, who are no more responsible for the laws that are passed by England or the laws that are passed by the Dominion of Canada than if they did not live there; yet the patriotic combinations and syndicates along the coast of New England and the Republican Senators will be content if the President will only stop those poor individual Canadian fishermen, who work for their living and who live by their work, who had nothing to do with the laws of which complaint is made, who were not consulted about them, from selling their fish free in our markets, and thus starve them and their families so that the syndicates can control our markets and hire these poor Canadians to work for them at starvation wages. That will be ample satisfaction for all the wrongs England and Canada have done!

They know when Congress does that the poor Nova Scotia fisherman will have no employment in his own country, but he will have to come to them and work on their terms. They will hire him because they can get him 20, 30, or 40 per cent. cheaper than they can hire the American sailor. That boon will heal all their wounds and soothe all their feelings against England and Canada! Starve the Canadian fisherman so that American syndicates can hire him for little or nothing, and when they do hire him, the combinations are already formed at Gloucester and Boston whereby they absolutely control the fish market of the country. After having excluded the production of Canada produced by the labor of individual Canadians, they can hire the poor fellow at any price they please and make him work for them or starve, and do it all in the name of the Lord and for the protection of American labor!

Mr. GRAY. May I interrupt the Senator from Kentucky for a single moment?

Mr. BECK. I am done except to say this: I got hold of a paper—I think the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] called my attention to it—about the number of Canadians employed in our fisheries. These New England gentlemen are very sensitive about that, yet they will accept subsidies from Canada to build railways through Vermont and Maine. The only excuse the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] made for his State being so subsidized by Canada was that the railway was only 22 miles—it was so little, so small that Senators ought not to complain of it. A poor excuse is better than none; yet that 22 miles was all the State had to accept subsidy for; the railroad ran from one side of it to the other, and it runs through Maine, that State accepting a subsidy of $25,000 a mile from Canada. That is all satisfactory so long as they get the money. The Boston Post published, as I was about to say when I switched off, a special dispatch from Gloucester, in which, after furnishing a list of 292 vessels with 1,500 foreigners on board as sailors, it is stated:

The list of vessels belonging to the district of Gloucester, published by Proctor Brothers, of this city, contains a statement in detail of the loss of life from Gloucester in 1887. This statement shows that by wreck, capsizing of boat, or other disaster 124 Gloucester fishermen perished. Of this number 104 were foreigners and 20 were American or of unknown nationality.

And yet gentlemen stand up here and tell us that this great fishing interest is to be kept up because of the American sailor; they boast how much he has added to the glory of the flag; they even go back to the days of Paul Jones, and perhaps before. Now, however, 104 out of 124 on the death-list of Gloucester fishermen last year were foreigners. Eighty per cent. Were they drowned on purpose? Was not that the proportion of men who survived, men raised on the sea and exposed to all the storms on the ocean and all its risks year after year, who know as well how to take care of themselves as any other body of men? And the fact that 104 out of 124 were Canadians can not be got out of the record by denunciation or denial, it can not be argued off the record, and by no sort of false pretense can the fact be made otherwise than that the great bulk of the men engaged in the perils of our fisheries were foreigners, whatever proportion did work on shore; and now it is contended that it will be ample satisfaction to the American people if the President will only exercise the authority that was said to be given him by keeping out Canadian fish that Congress made free and New England Senators were willing to keep free so long as Boston and New England and the seaboard cities alone got the benefit of it, but when by freezing or other processes they reached the interior, then it was an outrage. "Stop that," they say, "and we have no further complaint to make!"

The Senator from Delaware will allow me one word more.

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. Great complaint is made because our fishing vessels are not allowed commercial privileges. England to-day gives our American ships equal rights with her own in the coastwise trade of England, Scotland, and Ireland; they can enter every port and go from one port to another and sell their cargoes by the basket-full, beginning at Newcastle and going clear around the island, yet no English ship can land in the United States at one port and even touch, far less sell her cargo at another. We now refuse our coastwise trade to the great country with which we are treating, while she gives us the absolute freedom of her coastwise trade. We can take our fish from Newfoundland and begin at Newcastle and go around to Bristol and London, to Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dublin, and Belfast, and everywhere else, and peddle them out free with her consent. If she were to remove by orders in council, now reserving the coastwise trade of Canada, and allow our ships to trade in Canada, would we open our coastwise trade to her; or if she demanded it and clamored for it as we are now doing for commercial privileges in Canada, would we not denounce her as interfering in an impertinent way with our own domestic arrangements? Of course we would.

To-day, while we are talking about our independence of foreign countries and seeking to destroy all foreign trade and commerce by our home-market schemes, which of course break down agricultural exports and break down everything except a few manufactures whose machines make all the money—for the machine is the only American laborer protected—the Chinaman, the Canadian, the Hungarian, the Italian, everybody can be brought here free to drive the American laborer out, but the machine that does nine-tenths of the work and can make more in six months than this country can consume in twelve, having more power, owned by a few men, than all the human labor in the world combined, is to be protected in order that the advocates of protection may call upon men who own it, in Mr. Foster's eloquent language, and "fry the fat out of them," to corrupt by money American freemen to vote for their schemes in order that the machines of the combined ring may be protected.

From a business standpoint a quarrel with England is absurd. England takes now 60 per cent. of all we sell. We are taking from them less than 35 per cent. of what we import from them. We are taking less than 12 per cent. of British manufactures, as the following table shows:

Total exports of United States	$703,022,923
Exports to British possessions	423,920,708
Percentage exports to British possessions bears to total, 60 per cent.
Total imports into United States	$692,319,768
Imports from British possessions	244,662,842
Percentage imports from British possessions bears to total, 35 per cent.
Total exports British produce for year 1886	$1,062,163,770
Exports to United States for year 1886	134,124,380
Percentage exports to United States bears to total, 12⅔ per cent.

The ports of the continent are closed against our beef and our pork because they cry trichinæ against our pork and pleuro-pneumonia against our beef. Notwithstanding all their clamor England takes our cattle and hogs and insists that they are as healthy as any in the world. Great Britain is taking $433,000,000 out of the $703,000,000 we send abroad, while all the balance of the world is taking $245,000,000. We are taking from her 12 per cent. of her home exports, and yet because a Gloucester syndicate wants to get $2 a barrel more from our own people for fresh fish, we must retaliate without negotiation and close the ports of the country against the poorest class of laborers in the world, the Canadian fishermen, who, as I said, are each working for himself in an humble, inoffensive way, violating no law, and not responsible for the bad laws we complain of. All this to make fish dear at home and to allow Gloucester and Boston combinations to hire the people we have starved out for wages at which they can not hire American fishermen. That is the New England idea of patriotism!

I beg pardon of the Senator from Delaware for taking so much of his time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. GRAY. I hope the Senator from Ohio will withhold his reply to the Senator from Kentucky until I get through, which I hope will be very soon.

Mr. SHERMAN. I sympathize so much with the Senator from Delaware that I will not do what I should like to do, answer some of those old chestnuts of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. GRAY. I shall be glad in a short time to give the Senator from Ohio an opportunity to try his hand on the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. HOAR. I want to ask the Senator from Delaware a question at some convenient time in his speech. I do not know whether it is convenient now. I have been obliged to be absent a great part of the day on business connected with the Senate and I simply want to know whether I understood the Senator correctly in the early part of his speech when I understood him to say that it was not within the competence of the treaty-making power under our Constitution to negotiate so as to confer upon foreign nations any rights in fisheries or other territorial rights which belonged to the several States.

Mr. GRAY. I made that proposition.

Mr. HOAR. I simply wanted to understand it.

Mr. GRAY. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that what I said, or intended to say, was that it was not within the competence of the Government of the United States, under its treaty-making power, to confer upon any foreign nation or its inhabitants a right of fishery in the territorial bays and waters of the States. That was my proposition.

Mr. TELLER. I suppose, then, the Senator means to say, of course, that Congress would not do it either.

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask one additional question? Does the Senator deny that in dealing with the question of territorial boundaries constitutionally the United States Government has the entire soil and jurisdiction?

Mr. GRAY. I have no difficulty in answering that question, although it is off-hand. I will say in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts that I deny that it is within the power of the United States to do that thing.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator would treat the Ashburton treaty as unconstitutional, then.

Mr. GRAY. No, I would not treat the Ashburton treaty as unconstitutional. I shall have something to say about that hereafter, perhaps.

Mr. President, I do not intend to go into this. Although I have been somewhat drawn off the track of such argument, if it may be dignified by the name of argument, as I have attempted to make, I was speaking to something that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said, and I do not intend to carry out my original intention when I rose, and which I would have carried out if I had seen the Senator from Ohio in his seat, to make some specific reply to the propositions contained in the argumentative part of his speech.

But I have observed what seems to me to indicate a confusion of mind on the part of that distinguished Senator, attributable no doubt to the haste with which he has considered this treaty, and to the fact that he has taken at second-hand from his associates on that side of the Chamber their opinions about this treaty, and has been carried away by the eloquence of denunciation of the Senators from Maine and Massachusetts, and really believes that there was some foundation for those denunciations when he says that—

> What our fishermen want is the right to go anywhere and everywhere, use their harbors, ship men, get provisions, land and mend our nets, buy salt and barrels, and ship our catch home by rail or steamer without expense or annoyance, the same as we have heretofore.

And this without regard to treaty obligations, treaty stipulations, and what we can or can not do in conformity with what we have bound ourselves to do or not to do. It seems to me that he could hardly have meant to be taken seriously when he stated that this was what we wanted and demanded and ought to have. Why, sir, we know very well that our friends up on the New England coast are not at all backward about making claims, but I doubt whether any advocate retained or otherwise by the fishing firms up there would ever formulate seriously through an accredited agent such a demand as that.

It reminds me of what I have heard somewhere of a certain number of citizens who got together—I do not know in what part of the country, whether in New England or elsewhere—and they solemnly resolved, after formally organizing themselves, first, that the earth and the fullness thereof is the Lord's and belongs to His saints, and resolved, second, that we are the saints.

They want the earth, if they want what the Senator from Ohio says they want, and this they ought to have; and I only cite it, not to impugn the sincerity of the Senator's argument, and certainly with no disrespect to his ability or earnestness in this matter, but I submit it to show that when the Senator descended from the high plane of his exordium he could drop into the fog, which is the result of looking at this question through partisan glasses.

The matter of the territorial limits of bays I have dwelt on at some length again to-day, because after all, as seen by the argument of the Senator from Ohio and that of other Senators on that side, it does underlie very much this question and is necessary to its proper determination. I believe that this treaty has wisely compromised that question.

It has not taken the extreme contention that has been put forth by the Secretary of State in his correspondence; neither on the other hand does it accede to the extreme pretension of the Canadian authorities. They have not conceded to them all bays, as they seemed to have a right to contend under the language of the treaty of 1818, but bays that are 10 miles wide at their mouths and those other specially enumerated bays, some of which happen to be a little under and some over 10 miles.

Upon that question I have nothing more to say. The rest of the treaty deals with those questions that were the ground of complaint prior to 1854 and prior to 1871. There was not a great deal of complaint up to 1839. There have not been very long periods that have been open to these differences, because from 1839 to 1854 was fifteen years, and then came the treaty of reciprocity, which swallowed up all these questions in a general freedom of trade, and the natural condition of things between the two countries which followed. Then in 1866, after the treaty of reciprocity came to an end, the license system came in and the Canadians licensed vessels to go up there and fish in their territorial waters, and that continued until 1869. So from 1839 on there has been very little of open periods in which these disputations have occurred, but in 1870 and 1871 they begin to occur, as I have already pointed out, and in a more aggravated form than they have occurred since the treaty of 1871 was abrogated in 1885.

The result has been that this treaty, after defining for the benefit of our fishermen, so that there can be no mistake about it, what the treaty of 1818 meant when it renounced certain waters and secured for the first time in the history of our country the commercial privileges for which they have clamored so long and clamored in vain except when they got them at the expense of free fish, and by opening our market to Canadian fishermen, this treaty comes here, and without attempting to meddle in any way with the legislative question as to whether we shall put fish on the free-list or not, removing from the scope of negotiation all consideration of the revenue policy, for the first time secures for American fishermen the right to go into Canadian bays, harbors, and ports and buy all necessary and needful supplies that an ordinary trading vessel needs without let, without hinderance, and without price.

What remains? Why this complaint? Why this denunciation? We are enjoying absolute peace and have enjoyed absolute peace during this entire fishing season of 1888. Not a murmur comes from that northeastern frontier, not a voice of complaint has been syllabled by any American fisherman during these six or seven months of this fishing season of 1888; and all this is the result of this treaty. For the first time in our history has there been an open period like this in which the correspondence of the State Department has not been choked with complaints and demands and counter demands and various irritating and vexatious questions that were constantly kept alive between the two countries.

Now, an American fisherman can go from Gloucester to the Grand Banks, can catch his fare of fish, load his vessel, and go into any Nova Scotian port or any port in Newfoundland and buy all he needs, whether for his homeward voyage or to go again to the banks, putting his fare on some other vessel, and catching another, or he can go in at any time if he finds he runs short of any provisions, loses an anchor or a sail, and replenish all those supplies.

I do not know what more you want. Ah, I do know. You want the right to go in there and ship men, and we come back to it every time. You want the right to go in there because the men who are on your decks live on those shores, and when they have been on those banks three or four months they want to go home and see their families, and they want to go home for the various exigencies which take men home who have business and affairs centered in any locality.

But is it fair, Senators, to denounce a treaty on the ground merely that it does not give this privilege to the employers of fishermen, but in the interest of the hardy American youth who live along the coasts of Massachusetts and Maine does not afford the facilities to bring them in competition with alien fishermen from the Nova Scotia and Newfoundland coasts?

Mr. President, I have spoken longer than I intended and in a very desultory fashion, but I do feel that this is a question as grave as ever was presented for its decision to the American Senate. I have endeavored in my study of this treaty and of the conditions which surround it and out of which it sprang to do my whole duty to my country. I have kept in sight, so far as I was able, the interests of the American fishermen, and I believe that by this treaty those interests are protected, conserved, and advanced.

I believe that the honor, fame, and reputation of our country is preserved by this treaty, and I feel that if it shall be rejected and the troubles which have heretofore harassed and annoyed the American fishermen shall be renewed, I at least, in the performance of my duty, and those on this side of the Chamber or any side of the Chamber, who vote for the ratification of the treaty, will have met fairly the responsibility that is upon them, and that the responsibility for trouble which may come and may ensue from its rejection must fall upon those who have undertaken to defeat it.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will allow me.

Mr. GEORGE. I want to put a little historical information in the RECORD, and then I shall close. I shall not detain the Senate long.

During the debate this evening between the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and myself, that Senator used some language which might be interpreted to mean that the reason why the negotiation of 1846 between Great Britain and the United States as to 54° 40′ failed was on account of the opposition of Southern Democrats. I have the record on that subject, which I desire to read to the Senate, and that record proves the fact that every single Northern Whig, if I have not mistaken the politics of the parties, voted for that treaty, and also voted against a distinct proposition to amend the treaty by extending the northern line of the United States to 54° 40′. I read from the Executive Journal, volume 7, page 94, June 18, 1846:

> Mr. McDuffie submitted the following resolution for consideration:
> Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty between the United States of America and Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, concluded at Washington the 15th day of June, 1846.
> The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the said resolution.
> On motion of Mr. Hannegan—

Who was a Democrat—

> to amend the said resolution by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting in lieu thereof:

Now I read Mr. Hannegan's resolution, moved as an amendment—

> That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby advised, by the Senate to offer to the Government of Great Britain as a just, fair, and equitable compromise of the conflicting claims of the two Governments connected with the country lying along between the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific Ocean, extending from the parallel of 42° to 54° 40′ north latitude, and including the islands embraced within said parallels of latitude adjacent to the coast, the following as the fundamental provisions for a treaty between the two Governments:
> First. The Government of Great Britain shall acknowledge the right of soil and the sovereignty to exist and be with the United States to the whole territory above described, and shall abandon to the United States all claim which shall in any manner conflict with the permanent jurisdiction of the United States therein.
> Second. The United States shall guaranty to the Hudson Bay Company for twenty years from the date of such treaty the most perfect security in all their possessions, and the right to pursue their business of hunting and trapping, with all the immunities which pertain thereto, and to trade during that period with the natives, and the use during that time of the ports, rivers, and harbors within said territory without charge or hindrance.

Third. Within twelve months from the date of said treaty commissioners shall be selected by and on behalf of the respective governments, whose duty it shall be to assess at just and liberal prices the value of the property of the Hudson's Bay Company within said territory, which amount, when ascertained, shall be paid by the United States to said company, in such manner and at such time as shall be agreed upon between the United States and Great Britain.

That was the amendment to the resolution modifying the treaty as it stood; and the first proposition in the amendment was to carry the northern boundary of the United States to 54° 40′.

In was determined in the negative—yeas 5, nays 42.
Those who voted in the affirmative are—
Messrs. Atchison—
A Southern Democrat—
Cameron—
A Democrat from Pennsylvania—
Hannegan—
A Democrat from Indiana—
Semple—
A Democrat from Illinois; and—Sturgeon—
A Democrat from Pennsylvania.

The amendment got these five votes, all Democrats.

Now let us see who the negative votes were:

Those who voted in the negative are—
Messrs. Archer—
From Virginia—Ashley—
From Arkansas—
Atherton—
From New Hampshire—
Bagby—
From Alabama—
Barrow—
From Louisiana—Benton—
From Missouri—
Berrien—
From Georgia—
Calhoun—
From South Carolina—
Chalmers—
From Mississippi—
Thomas Clayton—
From Delaware—
John M. Clayton—
From Delaware—
Colquitt—
From Georgia—
Corwin—
From Ohio—Crittenden—
From Kentucky—
Davis—
From Massachusetts—
Dayton—
From New Jersey—
Dix—
From New York—
Evans—
From Maine; I do not know his politics.

Mr. FRYE. He was a Whig.

Mr. GEORGE. He was a Whig.

Greene—
From Rhode Island—
Haywood—
From North Carolina—

From Michigan; and Yulee—
From Florida.

That vote was on a distinct proposition to extend the northern boundary of the United States on the Pacific coast to 54° 40′, and the vote in favor of it was five Democrats from the West, including one Southern Democrat. General Cass did not vote; but one Southern Democrat, two from Pennsylvania, one from Indiana, and one from Illinois were the only Senators who would vote for that proposition. We come now to the vote on the treaty, which I shall read to the Senate, the amendment having been rejected by the vote to which I have called the attention of the Senate.

On the question to agree to the resolution, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 41, nays 14.
Those who voted in the affirmative are:
Messrs. Archer, Ashley, Bagby, Barrow, Benton, Berrien, Calhoun, Chalmers, Thomas Clayton, John M. Clayton, Colquitt, Corwin, Crittenden, Davis, Dayton, Dix, Evans, Greene, Haywood, Houston, Huntington, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson of Louisiana, Lewis, McDuffie, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Niles, Pearce, Pennybacker, Phelps, Rusk, Sevier, Simmons, Speight, Turney, Upham, Webster, Woodbridge, Yulee.
Those who voted in the negative are:
Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Breese, Bright, Cameron, Cass, Dickinson, Fairfield, Hannegan, Jenness, Semple, Sturgeon, Westcott.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that on that voter Davis of Massachusetts, Dayton of New Jersey, Corwin of Ohio, Crittenden of Kentucky, Upham of Vermont, and Mr. Webster, all Whigs, voted to ratify the treaty on the line of 49 degrees. In the negative there were 14 votes; and unless I am mistaken—and I may be in one or two of the names I shall read, and if I make a mistake I can be corrected by Senators here—unless I am mistaken there was not a single Whig, not a single opposition man to the administration is found in the negative. Allen, of Ohio, was in the negative; Atchison, of Missouri, was in the negative; Atherton, of New Hampshire, a Democrat, was in the negative. Breese, of Illinois, voted in the negative—a Democrat; Bright, of Indiana, voted in the negative—a Democrat; Cameron, of Pennsylvania voted in the negative—then a Democrat. Cass of Michigan, was a Democrat; Dickinson, of New York, was a Democrat; Fairfield, of Maine—was he a Democrat?

Mr. FRYE. He was a Democrat.

Mr. GEORGE. He was a Democrat. Hannegan, of Indiana, was a Democrat; Jennes, of New Hampshire, I guess, was a Democrat. In those days New Hampshire was pretty solid. The State was Democratic, I think, in 1846. I shall put him down as a Democrat unless I am corrected. Semple, of Illinois, was a Democrat; Sturgeon, of Pennsylvania, was a Democrat; Westcott, of Florida, was a Democrat.

I desired to put that vote on the record to show that any inference drawn from the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts this evening that the treaty was not satisfactory to the Northern people, especially to the Northern Whigs, is wholly without foundation in the record.

Since I am up, Mr. President, I desire to ask one of the Senators from Massachusetts the question whether the Boston Herald is a paper of such character that the proceedings of a meeting published in it can be taken as correct. Will the Senator who sits nearest me answer, or either of the Senators from that State?

Mr. HOAR. I do not think that is a suitable question to be put on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well; I will withdraw the question.

Mr. HOAR. I will state to the Senator that the Boston Herald is a paper of great enterprise, wide circulation, what is called an independent paper, a very zealous supporter of Democratic——

Mr. GEORGE. I only want to know, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, whether the Boston Herald is of character enough as to the publication of news that when it professes to publish the proceedings of a meeting the people of the United States may rely upon the publication as the correct proceedings of the meeting. That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. HOAR. It is a paper of high standing and character, unquestionably.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well. Now——

Mr. HOAR. I wish to say, if the Senator will pardon me, as he has put the question——

Mr. GEORGE. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. I have twice been asked by Senators on the other side of the Chamber questions like this; once in regard to the point now presented, which it gives me great pleasure to answer, and once by the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] in regard to my opinion of the character of an individual. I think all Senators will agree, on reflection, that it is a question which never ought to be put by one to another on the floor of the Senate, because——

Mr. GEORGE. I withdraw the question.

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to make a single observation. Of course a refusal to answer such a question is always a great imputation upon the character of the individual to whom it applies.

Now, as to the Boston Herald, one or two of the persons concerned in its management, and largely concerned in its ownership I suppose, are among the best men we have in Massachusetts. It is a paper of very wide circulation, a very earnest and zealous Democratic paper in substance, though in form independent. There are a great many things in that paper which it seems to me would very much mislead anybody who should trust them. On the other hand, I would not for a moment impute to the gentlemen connected with it with whom I am acquainted any willingness to put into their paper a narrative of an occurrence which was not entirely true. But I think this is the last occasion on which I shall answer such a question, if I were asked what my opinion was of the man whom I most honor and venerate in the world.

Mr. GEORGE. I take it, Mr. President, after what has been said, that we may safely assume that the Boston Herald has character enough not to forge the proceedings of a public meeting, and with that remark I shall read from a copy of the Boston Herald, furnished me by my friend from Florida [Mr. CALL]:

GLOUCESTER KNIGHTS OF LABOR PASS RESOLUTIONS AGAINST FISH TRUSTS.

[Special dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

GLOUCESTER, August 10, 1888.

Deep Sea Assembly, Knights of Labor, whose membership is largely composed of fishermen, adopted the following resolutions this evening:

"Whereas certain fish dealers in this city, not content with the monopoly of the fresh halibut business, have been secretly combining together for the purpose of controlling the salt-fish market, and as a result of their monopolistic machinations a sort of fish trust has been evolved, its chief object being to fix the prices to be paid the fishermen for their catch; or, in other words, the abolition of all competition in the purchase of salt fish and the centralization of the entire business in the hands of a few soulless men; and

"Whereas if said trust is allowed to exist, it will place the men who haul the line at the will and pleasure of a set of dealers of insatiable greed, who, in their lustful gain are unscrupulous, avaricious, and devoid of that fellow-feeling which should prevail in all honorable business transactions; and

"Whereas, not only the fishermen will be exposed to a ruthless grasp and abominable coalition far more dangerous than the treacherous shoals which they encounter in their hazardous calling, but the community in which it thrives will feel its baneful influence, for wherever monopolies or trusts succeed in depressing prices paid to the producer desolation follows in its track, as its legitimate offspring; and

"Whereas, should said trust be successful in its aims and attentions, the business would be rendered so unprofitable that the comparatively few American citizens now found on board of the vessels will be obliged to seek other employment; and

"Whereas certain fish buyers have kept themselves aloof from the compact, and paid a fair market price to the fishermen, much to the discomfiture of the combined conspirators: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That Deep Sea Assembly, K. of L.—

Knights of Labor, I suppose—

No. 5066, hereby denounce the action of those dealers who have banded together to decrease the already meager returns—

"Meager returns;" that is the term—which the fishermen receive as a most unjust and cruel alliance, and one which should receive the condemnation of all fair-minded and fair-dealing men as a blow at honest competition, which is the life of all trade.

Resolved, That this assembly hereby testifies its appreciation of the action of the outside dealers who have so strenuously opposed the trust, and fervently hope they will continue to do so until the deadly upas of monopoly, beneath whose branches all honest industry withers, is removed from our midst.

Resolved, That the fishermen, in disposing of their trips, should exhibit their gratitude to the outside dealers by giving them the preference.

Resolved, That while condemning the trust, we do not overlook the fact that there are, we regret to say, some unprincipled captains who aid and abet the trust in its design for a paltry bonus. All such merit the most severe rebuke, and deserve to be treated with the utmost contempt.

Resolved, That our Senators who so glibly repeat the stereotyped phrase, "The fisheries are the nursery of the American Navy," and claim that American citizens preponderate in manning fishing vessels, should cease such nonsensical assertions, which they must—know to be untrue, and we respectfully advise that they use the time for which they are paid by a tax-ridden people—

I did not know that they had got so far along up there in Massachusetts. I have heard about the Texan people and all down there being tax-ridden, but I supposed the taxes which our glorious tax laws levied were so manifestly a benefit to the great and good people of that favored section of our land that there was nobody up there who would talk about a tax-ridden people; but so it is, they use that language—we respectfully advise that they use the time for which they are paid by a tax-ridden people in enacting laws—

Destroying the treaty, excluding fish from the American market, raising the tariff higher? Oh, no, these poor, humble fishermen have not got so far along in political economy yet. Now, let us see what they advise—that they use the time for which they are paid by a tax-ridden people in enacting laws forbidding a fish trust, or any other trust, to exist.

These unlettered fishermen did not know that we had no constitutional authority to pass any such law as that, and that the only power we have under the Constitution of the United States is to let in competitors against these trusts. That is the only remedy we have, and that remedy these poor men have by which the people can be kept out of the power of these trusts. It shows, though, how they feel about them. It is not a lovely thing among them, however grand it may be to the owners of the hundreds of ships that sail from Gloucester every year on the tempestuous seas, manned, as these men say they are manned, by comparatively few American citizens.

These poor fishermen can not be reached by a law against a trust. The only way is to let other people compete with the trusts so that those engaged in the trusts will be obliged to sell like other people for a fair market price.

I will go on; it is interesting reading. I am reading from a reputable paper, and I believe I am reading the words of reputable, honest, hard-working American citizens, who being brought in contact, face to face, with this trust in the same town feel its crushing weight upon their rights, upon their business, upon their homes, and their families. So I read these words with pleasure, properly authenticated as to having been spoken and coming from honest, hard-working men amidst the grandeur of our civilization, this grandeur about which we sometimes boast, these seventy-five billion of aggregate wealth in this country, as I heard the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], I believe, say some weeks or months ago. These men are in the midst of all this increasing wealth, built up, created by their hard earnings, when they are denied participation in it, when they feel the wolf of hunger at their door, when they see that this policy here which crops out in opposition to this treaty is but a policy by which men who never go upon a deck, who never cast a line, but who have money, the proceeds of the hard labor of these men, and with that money build ships and equip them, and do more than that, go upon the coasts of Nova Scotia and other provinces and hire those men, so well described by the Senator from Kentucky, whom they endeavor to starve at home so that they may get their labor here in competition with American laborers almost for nothing. Let us see what they say. As I said, they want us to enact a law—forbidding a fish trust, or any other trust, to exist; that they enact a law—

A law that we can enact; we can enact this one—making it obligatory to have at least—

They are very modest—to have at least five-eighths of the crews of fishing vessels American citizens.

That is a law we can pass; and yet I have heard, the country has heard during all these weeks of debate about this fisheries treaty, the policy I will not say intended, but if not intended at least well calculated, if the treaty be defeated, to still further increase the gains of the men I have described, the men who own ships, the men who equip ships, and the men with a bounty levied upon the poor laborers of this country who, with the very money which they thus extort from the poor laborers of the country, with the very identical dollars thus coined from the misery, from the want of the laborers of this country, go and buy foreigners and put them at half-price or less than half-price in the places of the poor workmen, whom they say all this is to benefit.

I agree with these men there. I feel like they do. If that is protection, if that is benefaction, God save us from such protection and such benefaction.

Now, I will go on a little further. Whilst these poor fellows mistook the Constitution of their country in the first instance (and I do not blame them), they did strike at last a remedy in our hands, a remedy which I have not heard proposed in the American Senate during these long weeks of serious, of earnest, not to say acrimonious, discussion. You have turned loose the vials of your wrath, and when you have done you have expended your eloquence in trying to break down the Administration which has secured for these poor fellows more than they have ever had before, and which enables them, if carried out legitimately and fairly, to emancipate themselves from the infernal shackles with which they are bound hand and foot, and which prevents them from sailing a small vessel and getting supplies into your ports, which prevents them from following as independent workers this pursuit and makes them the slaves of the men who, sitting in their parlors at home with the money extorted from the hard earnings of these poor fishermen, build large ships and large seines and send them into those tempestuous seas manned by foreigners, and all that in the name of protecting the American workman, the American poor man!

Do you think that will last always? Do you think that the American people, the laboring people, will always bow their necks to this yoke which you place upon them? Do you think that day by day, week by week, with unrequited toil they will build up your great fortunes? Senators get up in this body and brag about the benefits of the protective system that builds up these great fortunes which accrue, and I will explain that now. Yes, sir, they accrue naturally under your protective system. I believe I will tell you what I think about that right now.

You talk about the aggregate wealth of this country. It is great, but who has it, that is the question? That is the question these poor fellows ask when they come here and beg you to pass a law abolishing trusts, and preventing the bread to be taken from their children's mouths by foreigners. Your nursery of American seamen to fight our battles with!

Mr. President, I said I would give you my idea about that. I suppose we have the greatest aggregate wealth of any other country in the world. It has increased very rapidly, and I will tell you that I believe your protective system tends greatly to increase the aggregate wealth. That is an admission I make to-day, But how does it do it? What is capital? It is the savings by self-denial of the productions of labor.

If you will not impose on labor, if you will let labor get its fair reward for its own production, laborers will spend freely; they will have comforts; they will have luxuries. There are very few men who have the money or the credit who will deny themselves the comforts and luxuries of life just to save money. A few do it. So, if you allowed these poor toilers who make your wealth, who create all the wealth of this country, to have their gain, it would mostly be spent, and therefore the aggregation of wealth will not do as your protective system does, take from that laborer 25 or 30 per cent. of his earnings and transfer it to somebody else. You leave the laborer but little opportunity to store wealth. If he is energetic——

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. I do not want to be interrupted.

Mr. HAWLEY. I desire to assist the Senator.

Mr. GEORGE. I decline to be interrupted. If the laborer is an energetic man, if he is a healthy man he may gain something, but how is it with the man who gets his 30 or 35 per cent.? He can not do any more than he did before. He has only one life, a few years, and one body. He can not wear much more than he did before. So, when in the winding up of affairs at the end of the year you come to see how much accumulated wealth there is in this land that was not in the preceding year, you will find most of the laborers, with some few exceptions, with very little accumulated. You will find that the men who work like these Gloucester trust people, by other people's hands, have accumulated wealth, and I suppose they claim that they work themselves, upon the old law maxim, Qui facit per alium, facit per se. They are great laborers through other men's hands and other men's energies. So these men having 30 or 40 per cent. advantage over the laborers of this country put money into their tills with ordinary self-denial, and not much of it at that. With anything short of extravagant waste they find themselves not only with a legitimate accrual of their own capital but with this transferred wealth, and without self-denial they save it.

The result is that the aggregate wealth of the country has increased because it has not been spent. You take it from the poor laborer and he can not spend it. You give it to the rich capitalist and he will not spend it. So we go along in this splendid, this dazzling progress which so attracts the attention of Senators, and we find that this country is being divided into two classes, the toiling millions, and, I was going to say, the few millionaires. They are few compared with the others, but many as compared to the old times.

When I was a young man I heard talk about millionaires in the country, and I could count them on my fingers. There was John Jacob Astor held up to my youthful imagination as a millionaire; Stephen Girard was another, and where was the third one? Those men by their energy, by their sense, by their foresight, by the extraordinary opportunities they had became millionaires. But now a man is hardly respectable in some portions of this country unless he has a million. Everywhere you see them; every day you meet them on the streets. No, you do not meet them on the streets. I can not say that I do, because I walk and they ride, or when I ride they do not ride in the wagons I and the rest of us ride in. But you can hear them and see their splendid equipages, their prancing horses, their liveried servants. You find them everywhere. My friend from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] tells me about making a tour of Scotland.

There is too much money made here by this iniquitous transfer by law of the money of the laborers of the many to the profit of the few. They actually cannot find the means of spending their wealth in this land of ours. They have to cross the sea to find objects of desire on which they can spend the money thus saved. I will finish the resolution I was reading. Brother VANCE asks me to read it all over again. Can the Senator have lost the connection? I suppose so. I will read it all over again without comment.

Resolved, That our Senators who so glibly repeat the stereotyped phrase, "The fisheries are the nursery of the American Navy," and claim that American citizens preponderate in manning the fishing vessels, should cease such nonsensical assertions which they must know to be untrue, and we respectfully advise that they use the time for which they are paid by a tax-ridden people in enacting laws forbidding a fish trust, or any other trust, to exist; that they enact a law making it obligatory to have at least five-eighths of the crews of fishing vessels American citizens, and thus force the aliens who man our vessels to become citizens or quit, and offer inducements to native-born young men to engage in fishing with a vim, as did their fathers, who in the past pursued the business and received a just remuneration for their toil, not having then, as now, to run the gantlet of fish trusts, combinations, monopolies, and mysterious mathematics, so prevalent among the fish magnates.

I am sorry I can not explain to the Senate what "mysterious mathematics" mean, but I suppose it is this: Under the old system of mathematics, subtraction meant diminution, and I suppose the mystery of this is that subtraction means increase; the more you take from the poor fisherman and the poor laborer, which under the old system of mathematics meant the less amount would be obtained, by these mysterious mathematics taught now in the Senate Chamber and taught all over this country by our Republican friends, the more you subtract from a fellow the more you help him. Well, that beats the widow's cruse. As near as I can now recall it, it ran this way, that every time you emptied the cruse it got filled again, and fellows in those days did not understand the "mysterious mathematics" of the Republican party. If they had it would have been this way: Every time you emptied the bottle or the vial you would have two in its place!

There is another resolution here. It is good reading, healthy for the American Senate, very healthy for us. We have come here a long way from the people; we are not elected by the people, I am sorry to say. There is an intermediary, a middleman, or rather several middlemen, between the great American Senate and the people; and when these middlemen meet in their capitals at home and come to consult as to who is to be elected to the American Senate it must be possibly, and it must happen possibly, that sometimes the wishes of the great mass of the people are not always properly recognized. At any rate there is not that immediate and wholesome, I will say, tendency on the part of us who thus get our authority at second hand that would likely have been possible if we got it at first hand. I will read the last of these resolutions and then yield the floor:

Resolved, That when our Senators right these great wrongs and check the aggressions of organized capital against the fishermen, then, and not till then, can they truthfully boast of the fisheries as a nursery for the American Navy.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] has read to the Senate from a report in a reputable paper the proceedings of a meeting, the character of persons composing which neither he nor I know much about; but the picture he has undertaken to draw of the fishermen or of the laboring men or of the capitalists of Massachusetts, from whatever source it comes and whoever composed it, whoever indorsed it, is a gross and palpable slander. It is a slander in general; it is a slander in detail; it is a slander in gross, and a slander in particular. There is not a basis of truth in it. There is not anything, in fact, which could suggest it to any sane or honest mind.

The number of foreigners and of native Americans employed in the New England fisheries has been stated to the Senate more than once in this debate, coming from four official sources—the United States census of 1880; Professor Baird's fishery report of 1886; the Massachusetts census of occupations of 1885, and the Massachusetts census of population of 1885—and they are all found on the record, and it seems to me trifling with the dignity of the Senate to undertake to overthrow these official statistics by reading the fact that a certain loss of life on one occasion showed the loss of 100 foreigners to 20 natives, or by reading the proceedings of such anonymous meetings as this.

Why, Mr. President, the fishing industry of New England is very largely carried on by the system of "lays," as it is called, shares, cooperation. Every fisherman has his own share of the profit; the owner of the vessel so much, the master skipper so much, and each individual fisherman or sailor so much. And it is a system of which, so far as I know, there is no complaint on the part of the fishermen, of the sailors, in regard to the justice and fairness of the share that they get, and these men who began life as fishermen, first as deck hands, or as boys, have time out of mind on our Massachusetts capes constituted the bravest, best educated, most intelligent, most patriotic, most fertile in resources, most religious, most respectable of the people of New England.

The Senator talks about the employers of labor and manufacturers, and while he admits that under the protective system this country has gone on since 1860 till it is the wealthiest nation on earth, and its actual income is a third that of the next wealthiest nation on earth; but he says all that is gathered up by the millionaires, and they take it away from the poor laborers and manufacturers. Why, the last Massachusetts report shows $315,000,000 of deposits in the savings banks of Massachusetts by her working classes, and every other citizen—man, woman, and child—has a deposit. You can not have but $1,600 altogether in any one person's name. The factory hands of Lowell can buy Lowell and pay the cash for it with their savings-banks deposits. All over the city where I dwell, which has grown from 15,000 to 80,000 since I went there to live, are the homes, the houses, the dwelling-places of these laborers, whom the Senator from Mississippi, the chairman of the central State Democratic committee in the year 1876—

Mr. GEORGE. And 1875, too.

Mr. HOAR. Eighteen hundred and seventy-five, too, he says—is giving a lecture to on the way they are treated by the Massachusetts capitalists. Why, Mr. President, those homes are homes which when you pass you know that there is comfort, love, blessing, patriotism, intelligence inside.

I was a member of a committee to look after the poor, appointed by the various churches of the city a year or two after I went there to live in my youth in 1850, and we marked out the different districts of the town in a hard winter, each church or parish taking its territorial district, the town then having about 15,000 inhabitants, and I state on my responsibility that I believe there is less poverty, not in proportion but in the aggregate, in that town of 80,000 inhabitants now than there was in the town of 15,000 inhabitants then.

That is the system which the Senator from Mississippi has poured out the vials of his wrath upon. Talk about foreigners coming in here into the fishing business. That has been all explained half a dozen times already in this debate. The men who come over and man the Massachusetts and the Maine fishing vessels come from the provinces largely, to some extent from the northern nations of Europe, the Scandinavians, and to some extent from the islands of Portugal, Fayal and other of the Azores, and from Portugal itself, and the Mediterranean, but the chief contribution is from Nova Scotia.

They are Scotchmen, as a rule. There are some of English descent, and some descended from our fellow-citizens who were Tories in the Revolution; but as a rule they are Scotchmen. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] perhaps may be able to tell the Senate something of the character of that race, whether it is a subject of taunt to the men who conduct any particular industry in this country that it attracts an intelligent Scotchman to come over here and join in the business, and then bring his family after him and become an American citizen. It is a little race up in the corner of Great Britain, but it is the Yankee of Europe.

It is a race which has been famous for its industry, for its thrift, for its morality, for its courage, for its patriotism. Wherever on the face of the earth you can find men speaking the English tongue, in whatever vocation they are engaged, whether it is fishing, or manufacture, or agriculture, or railroads, or legislation, making laws for a great and free people, there you will find the Scotch name and the men of Scotch descent on the front seats taking the foremost part. If you were to strike out the names of the men who belong to this race, or whose fathers belonged to this race, even from the history of the American Senate for the last thirty years you would have to strike out some of its most brilliant and illustrious names.

As to the Nova Scotians, I have since this debate began received letter after letter from men in Gloucester and in Rockport and in Provincetown giving me the history of the men who have settled down in those town, who have been attracted by our fishing policy to come over just as France and Great Britain tried to attract our fishermen early after the Revolution, according to the report of Mr. Jefferson.

Mr. President, that this class of American citizens, that this policy which has brought these men here to America, should be lectured by a man who until within the last twenty years of his life thought the relation of a capitalist to a laborer was to own him and to whip him and to separate him from his wife and sell his children and keep him where he could not learn to read the Bible or know anything about the law of the land, and a man whose later notions of that thing will be found on the records of this Senate in the Copiah report, in the Carrollton report, and in the Jackson report, I think exceeds the limits of comedy or burlesque. For the Senator from Mississippi to get up here and undertake to taunt the people of Massachusetts with shackles and unrequited toil so strikes me. I have not introduced this discussion nor this comparison nor this subject. I tell that Senator that it passes the bounds of burlesque or comedy when he gets up and undertakes to reproach and revile and slander the people of a great State by such utterances as we have been listening to here.

Mr. BECK. Now, Mr. President, I suppose it is about time for adjourning. Unless there is objection on the other side, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave to add one sentence to what I said, and that is to tell the Senator from Mississippi also that the American people will know something about his style of mathematics as applied to the counting of the votes of American freemen before this summer is over.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. We can settle this in the morning.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. 6344) granting a pension to William J. Toncray, of Tennessee; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 509) authorizing an increase in pensions in cases of deafness.

The message further announced that the House concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. 2592) for the relief Andrew Gleeson; and

A bill (H. R. 3329) to regulate the subdivision of land within the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10060) prescribing the times for sales and for notice of sales of property in the District of Columbia for overdue taxes.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1923) providing for the establishment of a life-saving station at the harbor of Kewaunee, Wis.; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. TARSNEY, Mr. WILSON of Minnesota, and Mr. THOMAS H. B. BROWNE of Virginia managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ADJOURNMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, August 14, 1888, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, August 13, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

SUBDIVISION OF LAND IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 3329) to regulate the subdivision of land within the District of Columbia, with an amendment of the Senate thereto.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, the amendment of the Senate is a very slight one, and I ask unanimous consent that it be concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, line 8, strike out "engineer commissioner" and insert "commissioners."

The amendment was concurred in.

LIFE-SAVING STATION AT KEWAUNEE, WIS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 1923) providing for the establishment of a life-saving station at the harbor of Kewaunee, Wis., with the amendments of the Senate thereto.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I think the Senate request a conference on that bill.

Mr. HUDD. That is the fact.

The SPEAKER. It appears that this bill has heretofore been laid before the House and has been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, but it has been withdrawn in some way and appears again upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. CRISP. Then I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate and agree to the conference requested.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

J. A. GRIFFEY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 6783) to place the name of J. A. Griffey on the pension-roll with amendments of the Senate thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

GENERAL WILLIAM F. SMITH.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 9396) for the relief of General William F. Smith with an amendment of the Senate thereto.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask that the House non-concur in the Senate amendment and agree to the conference asked for.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I think that bill ought to go to a committee.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill lie on the Speaker's table for the present.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ANDREW GLEESON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 2592) for the relief of Andrew Gleeson, with amendments of the Senate thereto.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, this bill originally appropriated $289.17, and the Senate has reduced the amount to $264.07. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were severally read twice, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (S. 100) for the relief of Samuel Tate—to the Committee on War Claims.

The bill (S. 2740) for the relief of the German Evangelical Church of Martinsburgh, W. Va.—to the Committee on War Claims.

The bill (S. 1818) to grant to the town of Moscow, in Idaho, certain lands for cemetery purposes—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill (S. 3168) to regulate admissions to the Institution of the Association for Works of Mercy in certain cases, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The bill (S. 3328) for the relief of James Grace—to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (S. 3433) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to accept the surrender of and to cancel land patents to Indians in certain cases—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (S. 3135) granting an increase of pension to Eliza J. Alexander—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

JAMES MILLINGER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 602) for the relief of James Millinger.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, in behalf of my colleague, Mr. HIRES, who is not present this morning, I ask that that bill lie temporarily on the Speaker's table.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BROWN, of Ohio, indefinitely.

To Mr. CARLTON, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. MCCORMICK, for five days from to-day, on account of important business.

To Mr. HALL, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. LONG, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. BOUND, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. PLUMB, for eighteen days, on account of urgent business.

To Mr. BOWDEN, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. GROSVENOR, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. PUGSLEY, indefinitely.

BUSINESS FROM COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] asks leave to submit a request for unanimous consent that on Monday morning next, immediately after reading the Journal, two hours be set apart for the consideration of measures reported from that committee granting registration to vessels that have been wrecked, purchased by citizens of the United States, and rebuilt in American ship-yards. Is there objection?

Mr. LYMAN. On condition that the next day, or a certain portion of the next day, shall be assigned for the consideration of general legislation from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I shall not object to this request; otherwise I shall.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas is not in his seat, and the Chair simply lays the request before the House as proposed by him. Objection is made.

CHEROKEE FREEDMEN.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1494) to secure to the Cherokee freedmen and others their proportion of certain proceeds of lands under the act of March 3, 1883, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. KILGORE. I am inclined to object to the consideration of that bill; but withhold the objection for the purpose of asking a question for information. I understand this is to settle a disagreement between the freedmen of the nation and the Indians, which disagreement arises upon the construction of the treaty of 1866. I understand there is a bill now pending before Congress to have the construction of that treaty submitted in the first instance to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. Is that correct?

Mr. PHELAN. I will state, in response to the question of the gentleman from Texas, that a bill was introduced and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, but up to this time there has been no report made upon it. In addition I will state that I do not think there is any question as to the construction of the treaty of 1866. It has been already passed upon by the former Secretary of the Interior, now an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and also by the former Commissioner of Indian Affairs, General Atkins. They have no doubt whatever as to the proper construction of the terms of the treaty.

Mr. KILGORE. I wish to make this further observation: I understand that the representatives of this nation have been perfectly willing to pay to the freedmen, out of moneys on hand, the amount of their claim, if upon adjudication it is found that they are entitled to it under the terms of the treaty and without any action on the part of Congress at all. But they want the question submitted to the courts in order to determine the rights of the freedmen.

Mr. PHELAN. That is simply a subterfuge on the part of the Indians to resist the payment.

Mr. HOLMAN. This seems to be such an entirely fair proposition that I trust my friend from Texas will not object, especially in view of the fact that it has the indorsement of the former Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. WEAVER. And it parts with no public lands?

Mr. PHELAN. No, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is so fair a bill that it seems to me it ought to be passed without objection.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand this is to be paid out of the Indian funds.

Mr. PHELAN. It is to be paid ultimately out of the funds of the Indians, and from money due from the sale of lands under appraisement west of the Arkansas River. There is an immediate appropriation, however, from the public funds, but ultimately there will be no appropriation, as that sum will be repaid.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that the Senate bill is not here.

Mr. PHELAN. I understood from the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] that the Senate bill had not been reported.

The SPEAKER. The bill that has been read is simply a copy of the Senate bill, which must be here before action can be taken upon it.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask unanimous consent to substitute House bill No. 5066 for the Senate bill, it being identical in all respects.

The SPEAKER. Still that would be acting upon the Senate bill as an amendment. If the gentleman desires to take up the House bill——

Mr. PHELAN. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Calendar from the further consideration of the House bill of the same title and pass it.

The SPEAKER. That bill has not been read.

Mr. KILGORE. Has it been reported from the committee?

Mr. PHELAN. It has been favorably reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs and is on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The House bill will be read.

Mr. KILGORE. Subject to the right of objection?

The SPEAKER. Of course subject to the right of objection. The House bill is precisely the same as the Senate bill, the Chair is informed, and unless its reading is demanded——

Mr. CANNON. Let the bill be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill H. R. 5066.

Mr. OWEN. To save the time of the House, I will object to the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my colleague will not object. This is a very important measure, and an act of mere justice to these colored people. I am sure if my friend will look into the question he will find that it would be a mistake to object to the bill.

Mr. PHELAN. I hope my friend from Indiana will at least allow a statement, when I think he will withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee that he be permitted to make a statement in regard to the bill?

Mr. OWEN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CANNON. What is the use of making any statement if the gentleman from Indiana objects to the consideration of the bill with or without a statement?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects to the consideration of the bill, and does not intimate that he will withdraw it.

Mr. RYAN. On the contrary, he says he will not withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. GEAR. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the consideration the bill (S. 2521)——

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. HOOKER. I was not in the House the other day when the debate was first had on the clause of the deficiency bill relating to the French spoliation claims, and I do not know whether general permission was granted to extend remarks on that subject in the RECORD, and I desire to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that general leave has been granted for the extension of remarks on that subject in the RECORD.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the regular order is the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and resolutions.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I ask unanimous consent for leave to print remarks on the clause of the deficiency bill relating to the French spoliation claims.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent for leave to print remarks on the French spoliation claims.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I understand that general leave has already been granted.

The SPEAKER. That was general leave to extend remarks. There being no objection, general leave will be granted to print remarks on the French spoliation claims in the RECORD. The regular order is the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and resolutions.

AMENDMENT OF INTERSTATE-COMMERCE ACT.

Mr. LAWLER introduced a bill (H. R. 11147) to amend the interstate-commerce act; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

BOUNTIES TO UNION SOLDIERS.

Mr. HOLMAN presented the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the Committee on War Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2106) to equalize the bounties of soldiers who served in the late war for the Union; and that Tuesday, the 21st day of August, be set apart for the consideration of said bill, and that consideration thereof shall be continued until the same shall be disposed of.

IMPORTATION OF CONTRACT LABORERS, ETC.

Mr. FORD presented the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That a further sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be available and payable out of the contingent fund of the House to pay the expenses of the Select Committee to Inquire into the Importation of Contract Laborers, Convicts, and Paupers, to be paid on order of the chairman and one member of said committee in sums not exceeding $1,000 at one time.

BUYING PRINTING FELT IN ENGLAND.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Whereas the New York Press of August 8th instant mentions the following allegations:

"BUYING PRINTING FELT OF ENGLAND.

"Not content with buying their blankets abroad, the Press is reliably informed that the Democratic Administration is now buying its felt for printing of England. Here is what Dr. J. B. Thompson, a manufacturer of chemicals and dye stuff, says on the subject: 'This Democratic Administration imports a poor quality of felt for printing use from England and pays more than it would to home dealers. The facts are these: The felt used to be purchased of Tingue, Howe & Co., of Port Chester, N. Y. The place of purchase has undergone a change within a year or so and the Government Printer buys of Englishmen. He pays $1.60 a yard more than he would here, for a much inferior article. Of course the Government has to pay no duty on its own purchases, and perhaps it is for this reason that it turns aside from helping the manufactures of its own country:'"

Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be, and hereby is, directed to investigate the facts in the case, and make report thereof to this House.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. DE LANO introduced a bill (H. R. 11148) to amend the act of August 4, 1886, entitled "An act to amend the pension laws by increasing the pensions of soldiers and sailors who have lost an arm or leg in the service;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PARDONS IN UTAH AND IDAHO.

Mr. DUBOIS introduced the following; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be requested to furnish to the House of Representatives a list of pardons granted by the President of the United States to persons convicted of the "crime of unlawful cohabitation" in Utah Territory and Idaho Territory since March 4, 1886, giving the name, date of sentence, length of sentence, and date of pardon in each case.

POSTAL TABLETS.

Mr. COMPTON introduced a bill (H. R. 11149) instructing the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to inquire into the expediency of allowing postal tablets or private postal cards, weight not exceeding half an ounce, to pass through the mails for 1 cent; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

INFECTIOUS DISEASES.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 214) to appropriate $200,000 to suppress infectious diseases in the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

This concluded the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and resolutions.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule of the House, this day is set apart for the consideration of bills reported by the Committee for the District of Columbia, if that committee desire to call them up.

ROCK CREEK PARK.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I shall call up the bill (H. R. 3328) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to condemn land on Rock Creek for the purpose of a park, to be called Rock Creek Park.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] if he desires to occupy the whole day with District business?

Mr. HEMPHILL. So far as I can form an opinion I think we will not occupy more than an hour.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to survey and plat for condemnation a certain tract of land, not exceeding 1,000 feet in width, lying and being adjacent to and on both sides of Rock Creek, in the District of Columbia, beginning at the intersection of Massachusetts avenue extended and Rock Creek, and extending all along the line of said Rock Creek to the boundary-line of the District of Columbia, and to survey and lay out the said land in the most practicable manner for a park, which shall become the property of the United States of America.

SEC. 2. That the commissioners shall cause to be made a careful map showing the quantity and value of each parcel of private property to be taken for such purpose, with the names of the owners thereof, and the said map shall be filed and recorded in the public records of the District of Columbia; and from and after that date the several tracts and parcels of land embraced in such park shall be held as condemned for public uses, subject to the payment of just compensation therefor, to be ascertained as follows:

SEC. 3. That said commissioners shall cause an appraisement of the value of the land so taken to be ascertained by an appraisement to be made by three judicious, disinterested freeholders of said District.

SEC. 4. That if said commissioners shall be unable to procure by donation or to purchase at a reasonable price any portion of the land so condemned, by agreement with the respective owners, within thirty days after such condemnation, they shall, at the expiration of such period of thirty days, make application to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, at a general or special term, by petition containing a particular description of the property required, with the name of the owner or owners thereof, and his, her, or their residence, as far as the same can be ascertained, which court is hereby authorized and required, upon such application, without delay, to ascertain and assess the value of said land so taken, in the manner provided with reference to the taking of land for highways in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 5. That the said commissioners shall report to Congress their proceedings in such condemnation, and no money shall be paid in consequence thereof until an appropriation shall be made by Congress therefor.

SEC. 6. That in the event the Government shall fail to provide for the payment for the land so condemned within two years from the condemnation thereof, then all proceedings under this bill shall be void and of no effect.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering this bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, is not this bill subject to discussion?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. JACKSON. But should it not be considered in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HEMPHILL. It makes no appropriation of any kind.

Mr. JACKSON. I thought it made an appropriation.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Not at all.

The SPEAKER. So far as the Chair has been able to examine the bill, it does not even provide for the purchase of the land; it provides simply for a survey which is directed to be made by the commissioners without any additional expense to the Government. Therefore it belongs properly on the House Calendar.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, not having had an opportunity to examine the bill, I am somewhat at a loss to understand its purpose, unless it is contemplated that the Government shall eventually make a purchase and an appropriation. If there be any expectation that there is to be a donation of this ground for a park, I would like very much to hear a statement from the chairman of the committee on that subject. For myself, I may say that I am not in favor of passing any bill contemplating the purchase of a large body of land for a park at the present time. I do not, however, feel myself competent to discuss the bill with my present limited knowledge, and I ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL], who has charge of the bill, to make a brief statement in regard to it, and I yield to him for that purpose, reserving to myself the right to be heard further.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, this measure is a very simple one. As members generally know, the city is growing largely toward the northwest as well as toward the northeast, and it is the opinion of a great many persons that the locality indicated in the bill is an appropriate one for a park. A number of persons are willing to donate land along Rock Creek for that purpose, and this bill simply authorizes the commissioners to ascertain without any outlay the facts of the case, and ascertain in the first place whether any part of this land will be given for the purposes of a park, and if so, how much, and in the next place what additional amount of land, if any, will be necessary. The bill authorizes no purchase to be made; no title is to be acquired; nothing is to be done except to ascertain these facts and to report to Congress, and let Congress act according to its best judgment. That is the sum and substance of the bill. It is distinctly provided that in case the Government shall fail to pay for the land condemned within two years from the condemnation then all proceedings under this act shall be null and void.

If the city continues to expand out toward the northeast and the northwest, of course the people out there ought to have some breathing place such as the people in the heart of the city already have, and if this land is ever to be acquired for the purpose of a park, it ought to be acquired now while it is cheap. When the commissioners make their report, if Congress think that the expenditure required will be greater than we shall be justified in making, it will be for Congress to act upon its own judgment; or if the commissioners should report that the owners of land are willing to give sufficient of it for a park, it will then be for Congress to accept it or not.

Mr. JACKSON. Is there any need of legislation to authorize the acceptance of a gift of that kind?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Of course there must be somebody to assume jurisdiction of it. The commissioners have not the right to take property and hold it for the benefit of the public without some authority of law.

Mr. CANNON. Is it not perfectly proper for the parties who own the land, when they come to lay out their streets and avenues, to dedicate a certain portion of the land for the purposes of a park? Is not that proper and usual in the neighborhood of cities as a matter of interest, a matter of speculation, with the view of making their other property more valuable, and can not that be done without any legislation?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, sir, that is sometimes done, but I do not know that it is usual. That is purely a matter of speculation, depending upon the inclination or the judgment of the parties concerned. The committee have been informed that a number of gentlemen owning land out there are willing to donate a certain amount of it for the purposes of a park, and this bill authorizes the commissioners to ascertain, in the first place, whether that is the fact, and, in the next place, if there is any additional land which would be necessary for the park and which must be purchased, to ascertain what it will cost to buy it or to condemn it, and to report the whole matter to Congress.

Mr. JACKSON. What particular location does the bill contemplate?

Mr. HEMPHILL. It begins at the intersection of Massachusetts avenue and Rock Creek and goes up the valley of the creek 2 or 3, or, perhaps, 3 or 4 miles.

Mr. JACKSON. Is not that the same locality which is already laid out by private parties for sale of lots, and is there not a park laid out there already?

Mr. HEMPHILL. No, sir; there is no park there of any kind.

Mr. JACKSON. Where is what is known as Woodley Park?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not know where Woodley Park is, but I do not think there is any park in the locality contemplated by this bill. There is no park there which belongs to the public so far as I know. It is simply a tract of land belonging to private individuals.

Mr. JACKSON. Does not this land belong to private individuals, and is it not the purpose to take it up for the purpose of a park?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Because it is called Woodley Park does not make it belong to the public. It is private property, and is now owned by private individuals.

Mr. JACKSON. So I supposed; and I am rather disposed to believe this is for the purpose of bringing this property into market.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The gentleman is entitled to his opinion if he knows any facts to base it on. Of course every man is entitled to his opinion. It will undoubtedly be a great improvement to the city when completed.

I trust gentlemen will not allow mere suspicion to influence their judgment. This bill was introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL]. It is for the purpose of ascertaining the facts. When the facts are ascertained if Congress does not see fit to embark in it further it is a matter entirely within their discretion.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCHANAN. If gentlemen in this section are so anxious to donate land to the Government, what is there to prevent them from so doing and asking the Government to accept such portion as they may see fit to give for the purpose of this park?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not know that anybody would have to donate lands. I say the information we have is that there are some gentlemen owning a portion of these lands who are willing to join in making donations if a park is established there. If I owned land there I would not give mine unless others gave theirs. If there are none willing to give any portion of their lands for the purpose of making this park it would be so reported to Congress, and that is all there is of it.

I will state to the gentleman from New Jersey that in the portion of the city where this park is proposed to be established they have now no park. We know they have in this portion of the city a park extending over the Smithsonian grounds, but in the portion of the city some miles away, where it is proposed to establish this Woodley Park, they do not have any park at all at this time. This is simply to ascertain what it will cost to establish a park there. That is the sum and substance of the whole measure. If Congress does not make the appropriation, that is the end of it. If Congress sees fit, after investigating all the facts, they can do with it what they please.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a few remarks on this question. For the information of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from New Jersey, and others who may not have given any consideration to the project, which has been before Congress for at least two terms, looking to the establishment of a park in Rock Creek valley, I desire to say that in the last Congress a bill of the same character was introduced by the same gentleman from Illinois [Mr ROWELL], and it was referred to the District of Columbia Committee and reported back to the House favorably, but failed to pass. The same matter has been pending before both branches of the present Congress and has been favorably considered by both bodies.

The proposition is this. There has been an effort made for several years looking to the establishment of a park in Rock Creek valley, because there can be found the best possible facilities for making such a park. In the first place, the character of the land, divided into hills and valleys, is of the most favorable character for the establishment of such a park as is here contemplated. It is topographically well adapted to the purpose of such park as is proposed. The lands can now be had cheaply and a great many of the owners of the property—I do not mean all of them—but a great many along the line, we are informed, would donate generously for the purpose of establishing this much-needed park along Rock Creek valley.

Now, it will be remembered, Mr. Speaker, by most of the members present at least, that the Senate at its present session has provided by an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill for the purchase of a certain quantity of land in the Rock Creek valley for the establishment of a zoological garden and park there. The proposition of the Senate looks to the acquisition of a small tract of land sufficient for zoological garden purposes, perhaps a hundred acres in extent, and it is a fact that I think is apparent to every mind when the subject is considered, that if the Senate plan is carried out and the Government purchases, say, 100 acres there for the purpose indicated, that thereafter, if it is desirable to establish a public park in that valley the additional land necessary for that purpose will be greatly enhanced in value and the price asked will be much higher than the land can now be purchased for.

This is a proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL]; and the District Committee of the House has unanimously reported it. It is to authorize the commissioners of the District to cause a survey to be made with a view of determining the practicability of the park; to ascertain how much land will be donated for that purpose; what is the value of such property as may necessarily be purchased; and with that end in view, to ascertain generally all the facts in reference to the matter and submit their report to the succeeding Congress, in order that Congress having all the facts before it may determine once and for all whether it will now acquire, or in the near future do so, property which can be cheaply secured for the establishment of a park commensurate with the wants of a city of this size and the great capital of the nation.

We thoroughly believe that it will be a fatal mistake if the plan suggested by the Senate is carried out (although it is undoubtedly a wise plan in itself to establish a zoological garden here which will represent the American continent, which will contain all forms of animal life that are found on the American continent), but we believe that unless at the same time that this is done steps are taken to secure the possession of the additional land necessary, in case that Congress shall determine on that plan to establish this park, it will not be possible thereafter to secure it except at a greatly enhanced price.

We believe, and I think the House, the great majority of it at least believe, as well as the people of this District, that it will be a fatal mistake, if we ever expect to secure enough ground for a park such as this bill contemplates, to put off the execution of that purpose until after the Government shall have selected and purchased property in that park for any purpose whatever; because the moment that is done the adjacent property will be so much enhanced in value that it will undoubtedly be beyond the disposition of Congress to make the necessary appropriation to secure it. We believe it will be ascertained, if this bill passes, that a large amount of land will be donated to this purpose, and that the remainder necessary to constitute the 600 acres that is suggested as the size of the park, can be acquired very cheaply; and if we propose to enter upon this plan at all let us provide to carry it out in a manner that will be effective and protect the Government against imposition by the extortions of those whose property may be enhanced in value by the location of the national zoological garden in their midst.

I will simply reiterate what has already been said by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL], that this does not contemplate at this time the expenditure of any money. That is a question for Congress to consider hereafter. They will have all the facts before them, and can then determine whether there is enough in the proposition to justify the establishment of a park there for the benefit of this district, and the nation at large; and this bill only contemplates preliminary steps to ascertain the facts and the feasibility of the plan, so that hereafter the necessary appropriations may be made, if in its judgment Congress shall deem it wise to enter upon that expenditure.

Mr. McCULLOGH. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HEARD. Certainly.

Mr. McCULLOGH. Do I understand that the committee report here that you can go ahead and condemn some of these lands and then abandon the project without the payment of any money?

Mr. HEARD. I will state that the proposition is, and the gentleman is familiar with condemnation proceedings against property for such purposes and will therefore understand it, that the condemnation by the power exercising the right of eminent domain gives to the sovereign power authority or option to take the property, but does not compel it.

Mr. McCULLOGH. But let me say——

Mr. HEARD. And therefore, if the gentleman will allow me to finish, we have in this bill provided that if Congress does not see fit to exercise the option secured within a reasonable time that thereafter the condemnation proceedings shall fall and all preliminary steps taken shall be discontinued, and not operate as a cloud upon the title.

Mr. McCULLOGH. Isn't that rather a high-handed proceeding?

Mr. HEARD. No, sir; not by any means. It is not at all unusual.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri will yield for a moment, to receive a message from the Senate.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2116) to provide aid to State homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States.

Also, that the Senate had passed with amendments House bills of the following titles; in which amendments concurrence was requested, asked a conference with the House thereon, and had appointed conferees as follows, namely:

On the bill (H. R. 1321) for the erection of a marine hospital at Evansville, Ind.—Mr. SPOONER, Mr. QUAY, and Mr. PASCO; and

On the bill (H. R. 6922) for the relief of George W. Graham—Mr. STEWART, Mr. DAVIS, and Mr. BATE.

Also, that the Senate had passed bills of the House of the following titles, namely:

A bill (H. R. 5539) for the relief of John J. Coughlin;

A bill (H. R. 5494) for the relief of John T. Robeson; and

A bill (H. R. 2524) for the relief of Clement A. Lounsberry.

Also, that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which concurrence was requested, namely:

A bill (S. 1688) to regulate commerce carried on by telegraph;

A bill (S. 1950) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Indians of the Fort Berthold agency, in Dakota;

A bill (S. 2068) for the relief of Jacob Kern;

A bill (S. 2163) for the relief of Alfred J. Worcester;

A bill (S. 2560) to improve and encourage the cultivation and manufacture of flax and hemp;

A bill (S. 2998) for the relief of Lieut. Col. Charles D. Sawtelle, deputy quartermaster, United States Army;

A bill (S. 3015) for the relief of C. M. Shaffer;

A bill (S. 3139) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of William H. Fenton; and

A bill (S. 3191) to amend section 4 of the act of March 3, 1875, as amended in section 2 of the act of March 3, 1877, in relation to the issue of supplies to Indians.

WILLIAM J. TONCRAY.

The SPEAKER. During the Friday evening session the bill (H. R. 6344) granting a pension to William J. Toncray, of Tennessee, was passed. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BUTLER] thought that the amendment offered by him had been agreed to, but it does not so appear in the RECORD, and the gentleman now asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered, and that the amendment be incorporated in the bill.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Strike out, in lines 6 and 7, "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," and insert the following:

"At the rate of $8 per month from and after the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to this request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The vote is reconsidered, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee is agreed to, and the bill passed.

ROCK CREEK PARK.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say a word in reference to this bill. I saw it for the first time this morning, and it evidently contemplates the condemnation, as gentlemen say in explanation, of 600 acres of land, commencing at Massachusetts avenue and running up Rock Creek, the land being about 1,000 feet in width, I suppose following the meandering of the creek. It provides in the first section that this land shall become the property of the United States, and that it shall be condemned for use as a park. The gentleman from South Carolina states that many cities have parks, and in reality this is nothing more nor less than a proposition to give to the city of Washington a park, not at the expense of the city of Washington, but at the expense of the people of the United States, the people of the District of Columbia not being called upon to pay one penny or any portion of the expense. Now, I believe in being liberal to the city of Washington, and I believe the Government is liberal.

Mr. HEARD. Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement at this moment?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. HEARD. The gentleman can not have failed to observe that this bill makes no appropriation whatever for the expenditure of a dollar of the money of the Government or of the District of Columbia. It simply provides for securing to this Congress or to another Congress the condemnation of this land. The gentleman knows there is nothing to prevent the imposition of such conditions as may be thought fit in the purchase. That is frequently done in the appropriation of money relating to the District of Columbia. The free bridge across the river at Georgetown and across the Eastern Branch are examples of what I speak of, and came partly from the funds of the District and partly from those of the Government. That is a matter to be considered when the question shall come up on the purchase of the property. For one I do not know whether or not I will vote for the purchase of such property; that will depend upon the report made as a result of the investigation which this measure is to authorize.

Mr. CANNON. I take the bill for what it says. I take it in connection with the invariable practice of the Government in dealing with the District of Columbia touching parks and a great many other things. The bill provides for the condemnation of about 600 acres of land and that it shall become the property of the United States. It is true that section 6 has been added, and after providing for the condemnation and its use, that in the event the Government shall fail to appropriate money to pay for the land so condemned within two years, the condemnation and all the proceedings under this bill shall be null and void. I do not think that means much.

I think that we may just as well be candid and say that if this bill passes it settles the question of a park running from Massachusetts avenue, as comprehended in the bill, to the line of the District of Columbia, and that it is to be at the expense of the general Treasury, to the exclusion of a dollar from the District of Columbia. Why, you take these parks in the city proper everywhere. It has always been claimed, and truly, as I understand it, that the titles to the parks in the District of Columbia is in the Government of the United States, and that it is charged with the improvement and maintenance of them; and further than that, it polices them. The city is not at the expense of one dollar for these purposes.

Take these parks running from the Capitol down to the river, and the proposed extension of those parks by the improvements we are now making on the river, and take the parks at the intersections of streets, and I state again that the Government is at the sole expense of their improvement and maintenance, and even policing. We have policemen there by day and by night to care for these parks and to care for the people of the District of Columbia in the management of those parks. More than that, there is Arlington near by. We own it and it is proper that we should own it. It is a very pleasant drive, within a short distance, and we maintain that at the expense of the Government. So with the Soldiers' Home, which is substantially a magnificent park for the city without one dollar of expense to its treasury. Now, I think it is a very serious question, and one that we ought to consider, whether or not the people of the United States should purchase, and take care of this park.

Now, there is an application here in reference to the zoological garden in an amendment to the sundry civil bill for the purchase of 100 acres of land away up the creek above Woodley lane. There is an appropriation of $250,000 for that, and it is stated from the best opinion that I can get that the land will cost from $120,000 to $150,000, and perhaps more. So that if you talk about taking 600 acres and provide for its condemnation you can make up your minds that from $650,000 to $1,000,000 will be the cost, and that is but the commencement. It is just the smallest portion of the expense. You take the land—beautiful and picturesque as it may be, it can only be used as a park after it is improved, as gentlemen know. That is to be done at a very great expense, and the whole of this will have to be done at the expense of the Federal Government.

Now, I doubt the propriety of taking this step without very careful investigation. The gentleman says we need not appropriate the money. I have been here long enough and so has the gentleman to understand that when you once authorize the commissioners to condemn this land, whether it costs much or little, situated as we are here, a thousand miles on an average from our constituencies and in contact all the while with the people who are interested in having this free gift to them, the appropriation will be made. So we had just as well understand that at the beginning, and discuss this bill from the standpoint of entering upon this work of establishing and forever maintaining this park. In the neighborhood of most cities, especially in the West, when parks of this kind or any other are to be established for the benefit of the people of the city they are usually dedicated for that purpose by the owners of the land and of the adjacent lands, who find a large profit in so doing. That is the almost invariable rule.

In my opinion, it will require, first and last, to condemn this land and to improve and beautify it as a park, to say nothing about the policing and maintaining of it afterwards, an expenditure of from two and a half to three millions of dollars. Having said that much, and called the attention of gentlemen to this view of the matter, it is for the House to say whether or not we should pass a bill of this character without further consideration.

Mr. McCULLOGH. The bill provides that if the land is not paid for in two years after condemnation all proceedings under this bill shall cease. How would the landholders in that case get the land back from the commissioners if the title had passed?

Mr. CANNON. I suppose the condemnation spoken of can not be completed until payment is made.

Mr. HEMPHILL. If there is a particle of apprehension upon that point in the mind of any gentleman who is not acquainted with the subject of condemnation of lands for public purposes—and no one who is familiar with that subject could have any doubt about it—we can meet the point by inserting the words "when paid for."

Mr. McCULLOGH. How do the parties get the land back from the commissioners?

Mr. HEMPHILL. The commissioners are not to get it.

Mr. McCULLOGH. Why?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Has the gentleman read the bill?

Mr. McCULLOGH. I have heard it read.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose that in fact the title does not pass until the money has been paid; but the bill provides all the machinery, it provides for a survey, it does everything that is necessary to be done in order to obtain the title to this land, and practically you had just as well strike out section 6 and enter upon the work at once; because if it is to be entered upon in this way that means that we are to have the park whatever it may cost.

Mr. DAVIS. I have not the slightest objection to the establishment of a park in this region. It is a beautiful and picturesque region which probably had better be dedicated to such a purpose.

But it seems to me that it ought to be distinctly understood by this House now that this region is of very little value for any private purpose, and that therefore the Government ought to pay but a very small sum of money for it. The topographical features of the country there are familiar to everybody who has ridden through it. At many points the land is almost precipitous, and throughout it is very uneven, and for that reason is not likely to be used for building purposes. Therefore I think it is proper that the commissioners who are to take action in the matter should understand at the outset the view of Congress as to the value of the property.

Mr. JACKSON. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, upon reading this bill I am satisfied that it goes much farther than I gathered from the gentleman from South Carolina that it did go. It goes to the point of appropriation. There it stops; but it does go to that point. It takes every preliminary step for the establishment of the park, and every succeeding step except the actual appropriation of money. Now, sir, I am in favor of the most liberal policy on the part of the General Government toward this city. It is the capital of the greatest nation on earth, the richest, and soon to become the largest nation in the world. Whatever will beautify the capital of this nation ought in reason to be done. And the Government has been liberal in its policy toward this city. It pays one-half of the expenses of running the city, not only the expense of paving and maintaining the streets, but also one-half the expense of supporting the indigent and the insane, and the public schools. All that is paid for out of the general Treasury of the nation. In addition to that the Government has provided one of the finest systems of parking that can be found anywhere in the world.

When you look at that magnificent stretch of parking extending from the Capitol to the Monument and beyond, you see that the city has not been left without suitable breathing places. Wherever we go in any direction through the city these parks can be found, and they are kept in order, as I believe they should be, at the public expense. The result is that this city is not only the most beautiful in the United States, but it is rapidly becoming the most beautiful city in the world, and anything reasonable looking to keeping up this policy I am in favor of.

But it seems to me that there are some things which ought to be done in this city before any more money is expended for the establishment of national parks.

Go into the northeastern part, or the southeastern part, or the southwestern part of the city and you will find within one-quarter of a mile from the Dome of the Capitol, muddy streets, unpaved even with cobblestones. Go out by the carp pond and you will find the sewage of the whole central part of the city forms a canal there, where the summer sun breeds pestilence, disease, and death. I would attend to some of these things first, and not devote everything to the continuance or extension merely of what is beautiful.

Now, sir, while I am in favor of liberal expenditures by the General Government for beautifying this city, I would expend some of the appropriations to making it a healthful place of residence as well. This House did not see fit to appropriate money to continue the improvement of the Potomac flats out of the national Treasury. It seems it was too poor to appropriate anything for that purpose, and it was only when the Senate put the amendment on that it became incorporated in the bill, a work which is urgently needed for a sanitary, if for no other reason.

I am in favor of appropriations to beautify this city and make it what it ought to be—the most beautiful capital of the grandest, the richest, and the proudest nation on the face of the globe. But we must do all these things with discretion. We must not pile up everything in the northwestern portion of the city, but have some regard to the wants of other portions of the city.

Mr. ATKINSON. I wish to say in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] that this city, unlike other great cities of the country, is not provided with any great park, such as the Fairmount Park, in the city of Philadelphia, or the Lincoln or South Park, in the city of Chicago, or the Central Park, in the city of New York.

Unless we now secure lands upon which we may establish a park such as is contemplated by the pending bill, I believe this city never will be provided as it should be with proper park facilities in the northwest, as this section is now being laid out into streets and building lots. It will not be provided with park facilities at all unless this project is approved by Congress. Unless the attempt is made to lay out the park now and these lands are secured and dedicated to public use, it will be impossible to secure them in the future except at a very largely increased cost.

It is true the Government of the United States will be expected to pay one-half of the cost of the improvement. It is equally true that this will be no more than the proper share which should be paid by the Government, because it is believed to be just that the Government should pay one-half of all the public expenditures in the District.

Mr. CANNON. The bill seems to contemplate that the Government shall pay it all.

Mr. ATKINSON. No; the bill does not carry any appropriation. When the time comes to make the appropriation Congress will regulate the matter. It can provide at that time how much it shall cost and how much of the cost shall come out of the revenues of the District. It is a matter for future legislation altogether. It will be for Congress to say whether the whole cost of the park shall be borne by the Treasury or whether one-half of the expense shall be paid by the District.

Mr. HEARD. It is perfectly competent for Congress to say in the future what part of the cost shall be paid by the Government, and what shall be paid by the District. This bill merely provides for necessary investigation of the facts, and for the purpose of securing the control of these lands by the Government if it shall be found necessary to establish this park. It is not now the time to provide for appropriation.

Mr. ATKINSON. As in other appropriations one-half the expense may be borne by the District and the other half by the General Government, but as has been said already it is not now the time for that question to be determined. This bill simply provides for the necessary preliminary examination. There is now an engineer corps connected with the municipal government of the District, and it is expected the members of that force will make the survey contemplated by the pending measure and ascertain and report the precise cost of the lands necessary to establish this park.

If we are ever to have a park in the northwestern part of the city now is the time to secure the land for that purpose. It is increasing in value in that portion of the city, and there is every indication it will continue to increase in value. If not secured now it may be that the price will be so great that Congress will be unwilling to appropriate the funds necessary for its purchase. Therefore whatever is to be done should be done at once. And if it be true, as suggested by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN], that paving, guttering, or ditching should precede the improvement of the park, the first thing we should do would be to secure the lands and then proceed with the ordinary municipal improvements.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, this discussion, and a very hasty examination of a copy of the bill which I have obtained since the discussion began, satisfies me, at least, that I was correct in the supposition I at first entertained that this bill means far more than a harmless inquiry as to whether some parties in the northwestern part of the District are desirous of donating lands to the Government for a public park or not. It goes very much further than the mere inquiry as to the advisability or practicability of laying out the park suggested. It goes very much further, and my objection is not based so much on the general ground of the Government's spending money, or obtaining land for a park, as to the fact that we are entering upon a system of legislation which will lead eventually to the expenditure of a large sum of money without knowing what we are doing.

Here is a bill, Mr. Speaker, I undertake to say, which binds the Government of the United States, as far as you can bind it, except when an appropriation is actually made, to the expenditure of a very large sum of money for the purchase of a large body of real estate, and where it is located I have been unable to get information, because when I asked the gentleman in charge of the bill, the chairman of the committee, as to the location of the five or six hundred acres of valuable land he was unable to inform me.

Mr. HEARD. The gentleman certainly does not want to do injustice to my colleague on the committee. The gentleman did not propose to state the exact location of the land, but told the gentleman that it was in the Rock Creek valley, and not exceeding 1,000 feet in width.

Mr. JACKSON. I understand that, but that Rock Creek valley extends a very considerable distance, if I am not mistaken; several miles through the District.

Mr. ATKINSON. It runs to the District line.

Mr. HEARD. The gentleman could not have failed to have heard my statement.

Mr. JACKSON. Well, I did not say I did not hear the gentleman's statement. I said I asked the gentleman from South Carolina in charge of the bill, and he was not able to define the location of this proposed park. Its limits are quite indefinite, it appears. But this bill on its face, I repeat, goes much further than an examination of the ground. It provides that as soon as a survey shall have been made, and that can not be done without competent men and the expenditure of time and money, that it shall become the property of the United States. But it does more than that, and I do not recall in my brief experience any time when we have ever authorized or allowed the valuation or price to be fixed of large bodies of land by one, two, or three persons without appeal or question, as this proposes. The commissioners of the District are authorized by private negotiations, without limit or restraint, to fix upon the value of the lands and their location.

I know that gentlemen will say that after all of this is done we are not bound by their action; that we need not take the lands. But, sir, I do not want to see the Government of the United States placed in the position where such an action shall be entered upon by the consent of Congress, a survey made, locations established, the limits of the park defined, men appointed to appraise the value of the land, commissioners fixing its price, and then make their report to Congress, and Congress get out of the whole matter by pleading, "Well, we are not bound to take this property," at the expiration of two years. It is not a proper method of legislation. Allow me to suggest that first an inquiry should be made as to whether or not we want the park at all. Then, if it is determined that we want it, let the grounds be selected and located and a report made to Congress saying, here is ground suitable for the park, and the price is so much. It is entirely fit and proper that a growing city like this great metropolis of the nation should have a great public park, and now here is property suitable for it, and it will require one or two million dollars to establish it.

Mr. HEARD. Let me interrupt the gentleman for one moment to say that that is precisely the course that is pursued here, but before that can be done somebody must be authorized to make an examination. I ask the gentleman who has authority under his supposed case to do all that. Nobody, I answer for him. Nobody. This is simply doing exactly what he suggests, but giving authority to some person to do it.

Mr. JACKSON. Then make your bill to give some one authority, without giving the same parties authority to bind the Government of the United States as far as it can be bound except by an actual appropriation of money for the purpose. Do not bind the Government to take this land, or be compelled at the next session of Congress to come in and wash its hands of the whole business. Do not compel the Government to pay a grossly exaggerated price, or else to say, "We do not own the land; we do not want to be concluded by the action of our own commission," and have to go over the whole thing again.

I think the bill is hastily drawn; I think it is loosely drawn in that respect, but is well drawn for passage through the House without very much discussion, and upon the assumption that it does not mean anything, but is a mere matter of inquiry for the next Congress or the next session of this Congress to act upon. I am opposed to such a system of legislation. I do not like it. I do not like this bill. I only expect to be able to call the attention of the House to it, and if the members present desire to go on, of course I have nothing to say, because it is not perhaps my province to set myself up in determined opposition to the wishes of the House.

I yield now ten minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE].

Mr. STOCKDALE. I desire to say a word in reference to this matter. For my own guidance, at least, I desire to understand, whenever I vote for or against a measure appropriating the public money, something of the purpose for which it is intended. I find that this bill proposes to use the power of the United States Government to condemn private property. That can be done legally only for public uses. Neither the bill nor the report discloses what particular public use the property in question is to be devoted to. It is only from the general reputation of the object of the bill that we can ascertain what this park is intended for. I am told, and I believe it is conceded generally, that it is to be devoted practically to a zoological garden. If I am incorrect in that I would like to be corrected.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The gentleman is entirely incorrect. This has nothing whatever to do with the zoological park. That is a different proposition embodied in an appropriation bill by the Senate.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I find that both of these bills locate this park in the same vicinity; both on Rock Creek. The gentleman says they are different bills.

Mr. HEMPHILL. One of them proposes to buy a hundred acres, and Rock Creek has been designated as a good place to establish a zoological garden. The other proposes to inquire into the expediency of establishing a great public park there.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Are there to be two distinct parks?

Mr. HEMPHILL. With the proposition embodied in the Senate amendment to the House appropriation bill we have nothing whatever to do.

That is for a zoological garden. So far as the Committee on the District of Columbia is concerned it has nothing to do with that. The House bill is an entirely independent and separate proposition.

Mr. STOCKDALE. But do you intend to have these two parks, or are they to be consolidated into one?

Mr. HEMPHILL. That is a matter entirely for the House. We can not determine that. They are separate propositions.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Yes; but there are two things joined, as I understand it, and it means the same thing, the United States Government simply going into the menagerie business.

Mr. HEMPHILL. We have no possible objection to the gentleman arguing the bill upon that theory, if it is his opinion. But it has nothing to do with the question.

Mr. ATKINSON. I wish so say to the gentleman that it is not very long since the United States was in the show business at New Orleans, and I believe sunk a million dollars.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Down where?

Mr. ATKINSON. At New Orleans; and I suppose if the United States can afford to go into the show business at that expense, there would be no impropriety in going into it here for the purpose sought in this bill.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Therefore do I understand that I am to be convinced that I should vote in favor of this bill by the argument of the gentleman that because the United States donated a certain amount of money to display before the world her grand industrial progress therefore we should establish a menagerie?

Mr. ATKINSON. We can establish a collection of animals and birds of the United States for the purpose of preserving them and educating the people of the United States, just for the same reason that we have procured and are now keeping a couple of buffaloes in this city in order to preserve them from extinction.

Mr. STOCKDALE. We are keeping a couple of buffaloes in the District of Columbia to educate the people of the United States. Therefore we must start a zoological park by getting 100 acres on Rock Creek and placing animals and birds there for the education of the people of the United States. Who will see them? What gentleman on this floor is going to bring people from his district to the District of Columbia or to Washington City and hire a carriage for $5 to go out and see a menagerie established under the auspices of the United States? He can go and see the two buffaloes on his way up there; that will be some consolation. This bill proposes to condemn private property for what purpose? Can any gentleman show me any authority which authorizes such a condemnation?

I say that private property can be condemned for public uses and for public uses alone, and I say there is no constitutional provision nor any other authority in America by which private property can be condemned by the Government for the use of any portion of its citizens nor for a city. You can appropriate the public lands for that purpose or any other purpose, for they are the property of the Government and it can do what it pleases with them, but you can not condemn private property for the pleasure of citizens of this country; only despotic, not constitutional, governments do that. It must be for a public use. When you take a man's property away from him it has to be for some public benefit.

Is there any necessity for this public park? Is there any sanitary necessity? Is there any necessity of any sort except for the simple pleasure of the people and that of a very few of the people in comparison to the whole people of these United States to have a public park on Rock Creek? This city is already in debt $30,000,000. For what? A large amount of it for making asphalt streets 3 or 4 miles from the Capitol for the pleasure, I suppose, of some gentleman who wants to come here from California or Texas to see the two buffaloes, or to go to this menagerie.

Mr. BUCHANAN. There are not only two buffaloes, but also a coyote.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Has my friend been there?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I speak from personal inspection, as I generally take in the sights.

Mr. STOCKDALE. But I will go on. It was said by the gentleman from New Jersey who has just interrupted me that we should make liberal expenditure for this city, because this is the wealthiest and soon to be the largest government in the world, and this is our capital city. Are we simply because we are rich to make pleasure parks for the rich? I have no objection to rich men. I have no prejudices against the wealthy classes of this country; I rather like them, for they are good clients for lawyers, but I do protest against spending public moneys simply for pleasure grounds for gentlemen who are able to provide them for themselves.

I do not want to be understood as objecting to parks being built and the whole District of Columbia being beautified, for that matter. Such improvements exhibit the highest refinement and good taste. I would take great pride in seeing them cover the hills and have them ablaze with electric lights, but not at the expense of the Government. Let people who will enjoy its glory pay the bills, and I will be excused if I decline to put my hand in the public Treasury and take the money that has been taken from the people ostensibly for the support of the Government and devote it to making pleasure parks for Washington City or any other city. I was not sent here for any such purpose. I was sent here to try and benefit my constituents and act justly towards the whole people at the same time. I see no benefit to them or the country in this proposed legislation.

I might go home to my people who are producing this wealth, and from whose earnings this money is taken by taxation, and say to them, we have burdened your labor with taxation, it is true, but then we are a great nation, and we are providing a magnificent park on Rock Creek, in the District of Columbia, where you can enjoy yourself, and if you are inclined in that way you can go a little further down the creek and see the United States menagerie. They will ask, how much will it cost to get to that park? I would have to tell them it would cost each one $34 to come, $34 to return, and $50 while here; but they would have a free ticket to the show. Seriously, Mr. Speaker, this is to be an extravagant expenditure of money without consideration to one-twentieth of the people of the United States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JACKSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE] in which to conclude his remarks.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Not one-twentieth of the people of the United States, no, not a hundredth, nor one thousandth part of the people of the United States will ever see this park, neither the zoological nor the floral division of it. What right have we to tax a thousand people to educate one?

Besides, this bill is entirely indefinite as to what shall be done; nor does the report of the committee disclose. From this bill the commissioners may survey this creek from the mouth any distance they choose.

Mr. ATKINSON. Only to the District line.

Mr. STOCKDALE. There is not a word in the bill that says how far they shall go or when they shall stop; how long the park shall be, or why it is needed. It is entirely outside of the city. It takes private property for private pleasure grounds for the District of Columbia and the few who are able to visit here, and, as I said before, the city is already laboring under a debt of $30,000,000, one-half of which the Government must pay, and this debt has been largely incurred for improvements that the United States Government has not the slightest need for.

Mr. NUTTING. The gentleman has intimated that these parks are for the benefit of the rich. Does he not know, when he comes to think of it, that the parks in this city, or in any other city, are really the poor man's garden, the poor man's walk, the poor man's pleasure ground? Does he not know that they are places which the poor can really enjoy more than the rich?

Mr. STOCKDALE. The gentleman has not been listening to me, or he could not have thought that I said what he suggests about the public parks of this city.

Mr. NUTTING. I listened very carefully, and that was the intimation of the gentleman.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I did not intend to convey that impression about the public parks of this city. I was speaking of this proposed park, which is not in the city at all, but which is out on Rock Creek, clear outside of the city—if anybody knows where it is. This commission, I apprehend, is to be sent out to look for it.

Mr. NUTTING. But does not the gentleman know that when the cars are running the poor man can reach that park for 5 cents?

Mr. STOCKDALE. Certainly; and so can he reach Kamschatka if he travels long enough.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Not for 5 cents, though.

Mr. STOCKDALE. This proposed park is not near enough to be of any benefit to the laboring people of the city, and if it were, what right has the United States to be creating parks all around outside this city for the pleasure of either the rich or the poor here?

Mr. NUTTING. That is precisely like what the gentleman said awhile ago when he tried to ridicule the idea of having "two buffaloes" provided for the entertainment and education of the people. The rich man can go where the buffalo grows and runs wild, but poor people can not have an opportunity to see such things unless they are provided for them in this way.

Mr. STOCKDALE. It would be a very unfortunate thing for a poor man if he did not see those two buffaloes.

Mr. NUTTING. It is a very unfortunate thing for the gentleman to use an argument of that kind.

Mr. STOCKDALE. That is entirely a question of taste. I represent my constituents and the gentleman from New York does not; and while the gentleman may be able to bring his people over here to see the buffaloes and the zoological garden, there are some of us who live too far away to be able to take part in the show business here. I do say that the whole matter of that zoological garden and those two buffaloes is a proper subject of ridicule.

It is a travesty upon legislation and upon the legitimate expenditures of the United States Government, and it ought to be ridiculed. It ought to be ridiculed out of this House and out of this city. The idea that the people all over the United States are to be taxed to construct here a zoological garden! Such establishments ought to be matters of private enterprise. You talk about educating the people, and you put these animals in a place where probably ten thousand people will see them in the course of ten years, while the remaining of our sixty millions of people will never see them at all.

That sort of provision for educating the people is too expensive and too inefficient. If you are going into that sort of business at all, why not establish an itinerant menagerie and send it around the country, so that all the people may have a chance to see it in turn? I say, furthermore, Mr. Speaker, that a great deal of the debt that hangs over this city has been contracted for useless improvements. I was riding out the other day in the suburbs of the city and I saw an asphalt pavement, new and very nice and clean looking, but not connected with any other pavement, and I wondered and asked a citizen how it came there. He said, "Don't you know that one of the officials lives out there?" I said, "Now I understand it."

I know nothing about the property that will be contiguous to this park, but judging from what has occurred heretofore around this city it will be safe to expect to find all that land in the hands of speculators. When we see the city commissioners working with might and main to cut a street through an immense hill northwest of this city and hurrying to put down asphaltum pavements it is sometimes interesting to inquire who owns the hill and that beyond. The Government pays half the expense of that excavation and of laying the asphalt pavement miles away from this Capitol. I am a new member and have not yet been able to see what my constituents want with that new cut and beautifully paved streets. The poor people of this city can go there for 5 cents, but they can enter the lordly mansions and gorgeous villas that crown those beautiful hills only at the back door.

I would like to be informed how many laboring people own property where the construction of this park will enhance its value. The probability is if any such are there they are the ones whose property will be condemned at whatever price the appraisers choose to put on it. The mighty hand of this great Government will be stretched forth to wipe out the title of these people to their humble homes for some great public improvement—oh, no; for pleasure grounds for Washington City and Congressmen. And if it is not for a far more objectionable purpose it will be well, to wit, for the purpose of enhancing the value of the contiguous property in the hands of speculators and wealthy owners. If so, it will never be done by my voice.

If the poor people can raise the money to go there for 5 cents a head, as suggested by the gentleman from New York, they will have the exquisite pleasure of feasting their eyes on the imposing residences that will surround this poor man's park with towers, and gracefully turned bay windows, and carved columns, and glittering marble balustrades, but never a glimpse of the gilded walls and frescoed canopies and golden tapestry within.

If we make such an improvement 5 miles from the Capitol, why not 10? We can buy the ground. Why not in Chicago? You say that is not the capital of the country. True; but Congress has no right to use Chicago's money or any of the people's money to give pleasure to the citizens of Washington. We build custom-houses and post-offices in other cities for public use. If parks are necessary for public health, let us build them in every city. The Government ought to be equally solicitous about its citizens everywhere. Let us make a zoological garden in every city, and educate all the people alike.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, this bill does not have the proper ring. It does not sound like republicanism. It echoes like royalty. It ought not to pass.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, it is very unfortunate for the merits of this measure that it should have been associated in any way with the question of a zoological park. The facts connected with this matter are simply these: This bill has been before Congress already, and a similar measure was introduced in the last Congress, and, I think, in the Congress previous to that, looking to the establishment of a park along Rock Creek for the benefit of the people of this city and this District. It has not been practicable for the committee to ascertain all the facts so as to put the House in possession of such data as would warrant the committee in asking them to vote for the measure, because it is impossible for us with our present degree of information, to tell how much the enterprise is likely to cost.

This bill was prepared by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL], whose ability and standing in the House are warrant against any just criticism being passed upon it that it was intended to be passed without proper consideration, and it was amended by the committee. The object was to secure this property in such way the hand of the Government would be sufficiently laid upon it to warrant us in acting for the future if the cost were not such as to deter us from having anything further to do with it. Of course we do not wish to go out and survey the land and give notice to everybody that the Government is likely to establish a park there, and thus to give rise to speculation in lands unless the Government can get such hold of the property as would be satisfactory and at a price which is not beyond what it is now worth. For that purpose we wish to ascertain its actual value and to secure it within our control at that figure instead of having the price increased by the action of the Government.

The bill provides for the ascertainment of the value of the land and securing control of the land necessary at the present value for the purpose of this park. If we are able to ascertain the facts in reference to the land, and if it can be secured at a fair price, we think it should be secured. We provide that it shall be secured if it does not cost too much. Our object is to ascertain what its present value is and to get it at the present price.

There can be no question about the bill being a bill simply for the purpose of ascertaining these facts and without any purpose to commit the House or to commit Congress to do anything in the future without its consent and approval, and without any purpose to commit Congress to make an appropriation either from the general Treasury or the treasury of the District of Columbia. Do not believe there is any such purpose in the bill, and I would have no objection to the adoption of an amendment to section 6 declaring the sole purpose of Congress to be by this legislation to ascertain the cost of such a park.

There certainly can be no legitimate objection to the passage of a bill when it merely provides for the ascertainment of the fact to be reported to the two Houses of Congress, and when the whole question is to be brought back to Congress to say whether the park shall be established or not, and whether or not an appropriation shall be made for that purpose. Congress does not appropriate a single dollar. It is for the judgment of the House to say whether or not an appropriation shall be made after all the facts have been ascertained.

Mr. JACKSON. Congress does not appropriate, as we know, for the purpose of executing the judgments of its own courts. It dishonestly refuses to carry them out by making an appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. HEMPHILL. That may be the gentleman's opinion; but in this bill it is merely provided there shall be an investigation to furnish the House with the facts in reference to this matter. By the adoption of the amendment which I have suggested we will not be committed at all to the establishment of this park in the future.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman will excuse me; the bill fully provides for acquiring the property and committing the Government to this scheme—not for an investigation, as he says. If that be the case, why should this language be used in the bill directing the commissioner "to survey and lay out the said land in the most practical manner for a park which shall become the property of the United States of America?"

Mr. HEMPHILL. If that were to go into the bill, I say it would make it property of the United States when we paid for it.

Mr. PAYSON. But it is already in the bill. The bill provides for acquiring the property either by purchase, donation, or condemnation in express terms. Under proceedings of condemnation when proper authority is provided, then by the law, as well settled, the land would become the property of the United States as the bill now asserts, in terms, and the Government would be bound to pay for it. That to me is perfectly clear, and is what I wish to avoid now. An action would lie in the Court of Claims against the Government for the price of this land under the language contained in that section which I have just read. There is nothing in this bill which can be added to to make it a more perfect piece of legislation for securing the title and possession of this property by the Government of the United States for the purpose of a public park. It fully commits the Government in favor of the proposition. Congress is not only expected to make the appropriation necessary to pay for the property, but it would be bound to do it.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I have no objection to striking out those words in the bill to which the gentleman has referred.

Mr. PAYSON. It ought to be done if the purpose of the bill is merely as the gentleman states, to provide for an investigation into the facts. But that is not the scope of the bill; it is far broader.

Mr. HEMPHILL. We are willing that those words shall go out of the bill. I propose to insert certain words providing that the lands shall become the property of the United States when they have been paid for.

Mr. PAYSON. That is a different proposition entirely. To meet it, there must be substantial amendments made to the bill, and I will offer such as occur to me to that end.

But on the merits of the proposed plan for a public park at the place named I do not commit myself, for I have no knowledge of the situation on which to act, nor, and I say it respectfully, do I get any from this debate. I am opposed to any committal of the Government until I am advised.

In a general way, I know the locality is one where there are now no considerable number of residences. The lands are largely open and unimproved, held by owners who are speculative purchasers for a rise in values, as improvements and residences shall tend that way.

There is nothing in the "breathing place" argument advanced here in the case, as it is all open country there now. Nor is the situation of Washington—with its broad, shaded streets, its reservation triangles at avenue and street intersections, its open spaces, and entire absence of the crowded tenement-house style of habitancy common in larger places—such as to cause these suggestions as to this proposed park being a "breathing place for the poor" specially forcible to me. If I gave an opinion I should say it was clearly, very clearly, a plan to commit this Congress to a proposal to expend perhaps a million dollars, more or less (I have been told informally while standing here that the expense would exceed that), to secure this creek bed and banks, inclose, protect, and beautify them at the expense of the Government, the primary result being to largely enhance the value of the speculative holdings of the owners of real estate thereabout, bought and held by enterprising gentlemen in the hope, if not in the view of this action, as one important factor.

Still the plan may be a good one for the city and District, and one that the Government ought to assist. I do not say because I do not know, nor does the House. Knowledge of the situation, the amount of land, its surroundings, and the probable expense should be given the House by the committee; we are in the dark as to it all now.

Again, this public improvement, the primary and natural, if not the only immediate result of which will be to largely increase the value of contiguous property, should, in my judgment, be partly paid for by the property directly benefited. It is not right, it is wrong, that the taxpayers of the District generally and the Government should be burdened with the vast sum this will involve, to enrich the speculative holdings and purchasers near it, without cost to them beyond ordinary taxes. It can not be done by my vote.

But on a proper bill, guarded as to expense and area, restricted as to power in the hands of the agents of the Government, and provisions for assessments for special benefits conferred, the scheme might not be an improper one.

My object in moving the amendments I shall offer, Mr. Speaker, is to strip this bill of all provisions which shall, in advance of any information, as to either appropriateness or expense, commit the Government to this project. The last sections propose the formal condemnation of all this land.

Section 3 should go out.

Section 4 provides that the court shall proceed and assess the value of the land, as is done in the taking of land for highways in the District of Columbia.

This proceeding, Mr. Speaker, provides for an assessment of the damages—the value of the land—and when the report is made, its presentation to the court for its approval, confirmation, and judgment.

Now, sir, I understand the law to be well settled that after a report of damages in a condemnation proceeding has been acted on and confirmed the petitioner in the proceedings can not abandon them because dissatisfied with the award. When the report is confirmed I assert the law to be in the case contemplated by these sections; the Government would be bound to pay the amount so assessed. Because we are not advised in the least degree, either by guess or estimate, as to the cost of this project, I insist that these sections authorizing condemnation should be stricken out, and the bill be left providing solely that information be secured and submitted to Congress for intelligent action.

As I have said, I am not opposing the principle of the establishing of necessary parks for the comfort of the people as well as the beautifying of the city, but I want to be advised as to probable cost of a project like this, which is confessedly not needed now, but is begun for the remote future, so far as actual use by the general public is concerned.

The talk here of donations to this park is to me idle, because nothing definite is tendered. Where are the tracts offered? Who is going to donate? Where are the conveyances deposited to be delivered later? This bill provides for purchase or condemnation of all the land to be taken, and I do not believe that any owner is going to give what he knows will be taken and fully paid for.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendments I shall offer, to change the entire character of this bill, will be adopted.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. What is the object of limiting the width? Why is it proposed to secure only such a small quantity of land? It seems to me that it would make an insignificant park for the great national capital.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, sir, that was the judgment of the subcommittee. It is all that has been suggested by those persons who are supposed to know the wants of the city in that direction. Of course this land, as stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS], which we propose to select is not very valuable land now. According to our judgment the great bulk of it is worth almost nothing for building purposes; and it is the opinion of the committee that it can be purchased at a very low figure.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. But would it not be very much smaller than parks are usually laid out? For instance, Prospect Park, Brooklyn; Central Park, New York, and other parks in large cities generally throughout the country?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I think it will be smaller, of course, than either of those; but the very object of this bill is to ascertain the feasibility of locating a park there and give some definite idea of the area.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Is the bill open for amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I have an amendment I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. BREWER. I desire to suggest to the gentleman in charge of this bill that it is evident from what has been said here, and from listening to the conversation which has occurred around, that this bill can not pass without a quorum; and a quorum not being present, it seems to me it would be wise on the part of the committee not to proceed further with it at this time.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I trust no gentleman will call a quorum on such a measure as this. The bill can be easily amended to remove any of the objections that have been urged against it. I do not think that anybody objects to the bill in the light the committee understands it.

Mr. JACKSON. No; we object to it in the light that we understand it.

Mr. ATKINSON. You object to it in the light that you misunderstand it, you mean.

Mr. JACKSON. We object to it because you designate by metes and bounds what land you want and enable the owners of the land to fix their own values upon it.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The gentleman can hardly understand that to be the object of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words in lines 12 and 13:

Shall become the property of the United States of America.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I offer an amendment to section 3. After the word "District," in line 4 of section 3, to insert.

The Clerk read as follows:

That said commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have the power to, and are hereby authorized and directed to, appraise the benefits to the lands adjacent to and adjoining upon either side of said proposed park for the distance of 1,000 feet on either side of said proposed park, and assess said benefits upon said lands. Said assessment shall be a lien upon the same and when collected by said commissioners shall be used by them in paying for said park and in beautifying the same.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I think, Mr. Speaker, that everybody is agreed that the bill for a park or system of parks proposed by the Committee on the District of Columbia is something that ought to be enacted into a law. The objection that seems to be raised is that land speculators and others will make money from the proposed improvements by placing fictitious prices on the lands contemplated to be taken by the bill and that adjacent thereto, and that it will be a great expense to the General Government. If the amendment I propose is adopted it will avoid both the objections which have been raised. The first is, that it will put a stop to speculation in lands lying along the proposed park, as the commissioners have the power to assess all benefits which may be derived from the park upon the adjacent lands to the extent of 1,C00 feet on either side. That principle, I will state, is not by any means a new one, but is in every-day practice in all of the great cities of the country.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I have no objection to that so far as I am concerned.

Mr. HOOKER. Does the gentleman propose by this amendment to tax the land 1,000 feet on each side of the park for any expenses which shall be made for the construction of that park and that no expenditure shall be made for its construction by the General Government or the citizens?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. It provides how the tax shall be obtained; but it does take away from these speculators the opportunity for making money out of it, and also lessens the expense to the General Government.

Mr. HOOKER. Who does the gentleman refer to as speculators?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Anybody who owns land along there.

Mr. HOOKER. If you desire to cut out the speculators, I think you ought to take more than 1,000 feet.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I propose this in answer to the statement that this improvement is in the interest of parties who are buying real estate out in that locality which, if the proposed survey is made, will immediately rise in value. The chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia has very properly and very justly said that he has no objection to this amendment I have proposed, and I hope that it will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I propose the following amendment at the end of section 6——

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the offering of an amendment to section 6 preclude us from going back to section 1 for the purpose of offering amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. It will not.

The Clerk reported the amendment offered by Mr. HEMPHILL, as follows:

Add to section 6 the following:

"It being the sole object of this legislation to ascertain the expense of such park, leaving it to the future action of Congress to determine whether the same shall be established."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as section 7 the following:

"That all expenses incurred or moneys paid under this act, or that may hereafter be incurred or paid on account of any park established hereunder requiring appropriations by Congress, shall be paid one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half out of the Treasury of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAYSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Strike out the words "for condemnation," in lines 5 and 6, section 1, and insert "for the information of Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAYSON. I also offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Strike out the words "lay out" and insert "make a plat of," in line 11.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAYSON. I also offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

In line 3, section 2, after the word "property," insert the word "proposed;" so that it will read "private property proposed to be taken for such purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAYSON. I also offer the following amendment: Strike out all of section 2 after the word "Columbia" and insert "and report the same to Congress for its information."

Mr. HEMPHILL. I wish to say to the gentleman that it is important we should take some means to ascertain the value of this land which would secure the right to it at the price at which it is now valued. In other words, ought we to take such proceeding as will enhance the value of the property without taking such steps as to give us such a hold upon it as would enable us to take it at the price it is now worth.

Mr. PAYSON. That would depend, first, whether we commit ourselves to the project. In a proceeding of this kind necessarily Congress ought not to commit itself to a project to establish this park and take this ground at its present price unless it wants it at that price after it takes action. Of course, as a matter of proper legislation, we ought before we act at all to be possessed of all the facts; and before we undertake to do this work I shall insist that we ascertain how many acres of land we probably ought to take, if we intend to take any, and how much it will probably cost. Then we will be prepared to determine if we want the thing at all. Before taking action in a matter of this kind I desire to know how far it goes. I know as a matter of law that we could put ourselves in a position for taking this land if we wanted it at the price we wanted to give after full information.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I think in a proceeding for condemnation you have a right to ascertain the value and then it is in the power of the sovereign to say whether we will take it or not.

Mr. PAYSON. But in any event that ought only be done after we determine that we are in favor of the project, and then authorize the proceedings for condemnation of the property if it can not be purchased at a reasonable price.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Supposing you go on and condemn it and say we will not take it?

Mr. PAYSON. I know that after you have completed your condemnation proceedings you would be compelled to take it. You can not, as I have said, abandon your proceeding, after the report has been approved by the court, because the price is too high. Could a railroad company say, after it has exercised authorized proceedings for the condemnation of a piece of land for right of way, and the jury has returned a verdict and judgment been rendered thereon, that it is a little more than they desired to give, and that therefore they would not take it? No, sir; you can not blow hot and cold at the same breath in this kind of case.

After you have exercised the highest prerogative under the law—the taking of private property for public use by the exercise of the right of eminent domain under proper proceedings—and in the proceedings the report is approved by the court, I insist that the law is, as I have said, that you can not abandon the proceeding because the price fixed is in your judgment too high. You have fixed the tribunal, authorized the proceeding and method, and would be, as you should be, bound by it.

The difficulty is, Mr. Speaker, the proposal in the bill is premature; it ought not to come till we are fully advised as to the situation and needs, and that the bill may be made to conform to these views. I move to strike out sections 3, 4, 5, and 6.

Mr. HEMPHILL. You might as well strike out the whole bill.

Mr. PAYSON. I am inclined to agree to that as the matter stands.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. PAYSON, and there were—ayes 35, noes 26.

Mr. HEMPHILL. No quorum has voted, Mr. Speaker. I want to say a word. This amendment simply knocks the bottom out of the whole bill, and it is not worth while to occupy further time with it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Even with this amendment, does not the bill give you all that you claimed in the first instance?

Mr. PAYSON. Certainly; ample power to examine and report to us.

Mr. HEMPHILL. No, sir. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PAYSON. I have no objection to the committee again having the bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

WESTERN MARYLAND RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I call up the bill (H. R. 9418) to incorporate the Washington and Western Maryland Railroad Company.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar for the purpose of considering bills reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. ROGERS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9418) to incorporate the Washington and Western Maryland Railroad Company.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be now read by sections.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Thomas Dowling, H. P. Gilbert, Austin Herr, G. S. Dunlop, J. W. Walsh, T. L. Cropley, F. A. Miller, of the District of Columbia; L. P. Wright, of the State of Illinois; Frank Hume, of the State of Virginia; R. J. Bright, of the State of Indiana; Spencer Watkins, A. B. Cropley, James Henderson, and S. Gambrill, of the State of Maryland, and all such persons as shall or may be associated with them and their successors, are hereby created a body politic and corporate in fact and in law by the name of the Washington and Western Maryland Railroad Company, and by that name shall have perpetual succession, and shall be able to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, defend and be defended in all courts of law and equity, and may make and have a common seal, and the same alter at their pleasure; and said corporation is hereby authorized to lay out, locate, construct, furnish, maintain, operate, and enjoy a continuous railroad and telegraph line, with all the necessary appurtenances, namely, beginning at the west bank of Rock Creek, Georgetown, thence westerly along K or Water street to the Aqueduct Bridge, thence westerly between the bank of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal and the Potomac River to the District line at or near the Chain Bridge, as may hereafter be surveyed and agreed on by and between the parties named, or their successors, and the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The Committee on the District of Columbia recommended the following amendments:

In lines 20 and 21 strike out the words "at the west bank of Rock Creek, Georgetown, thence westerly along K or Water street to," and insert in lieu thereof "at a point west of." After line 26 insert the following:

Provided, That the tracks of said company shall be deemed and taken to be a public highway, and may be freely used for the passage of cars and motive power of any individual or corporation upon making just compensation for such use, and in case any dispute shall arise concerning such compensation or manner of use, any party in interest may apply to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which court is hereby empowered to fix the amount to be paid for such use, and the mode in which such use may be enjoyed.

The amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the capital stock of said corporation shall consist of two thousand shares, at a par value of $50 per share each, which shall in all respects be deemed personal property, and shall be transferrable in such manner as the by-laws of said corporation shall provide. The persons (or their assigns) hereinbefore named, or a majority thereof, shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. The first meeting of said incorporators shall be held within twenty days from the passage of this act, in the city of Washington. A notice of said meeting, to be signed by seven of the incorporators named herein, shall be published for not less than fifteen days in one or more newspapers published in the city of Washington, and no other notice of said meeting shall be required. At the first meeting of said incorporators they shall select seven of their number as a board of commissioners of the Washington and Western Maryland Railroad Company. Said board of commissioners, as soon as practibable after being selected, shall organize by the choice from its members of a president, vice-president, secretary, and treasurer. The said board of commissioners shall cause to be opened books in the city of Washington, and to receive subscriptions to the capital stock of said corporation: Provided, That the said board of commissioners shall first give ten days' notice of the opening of books for the subscription to the capital stock of said company; and a cash payment of 10 per cent. of all subscriptions shall be made at the time of subscribing, and it shall be receipted for by the treasurer of said board of commissioners, who shall be a bonded officer in an amount to be fixed by said board of commissioners; and as soon as an amount equal to two-thirds of the capital stock of said company shall have been subscribed, and 10 per cent. paid in on the same to the treasurer of said board of commissioners, then the said board of commissioners shall appoint a time and place for the first meeting of the subscribers to the stock of said company, and shall give notice thereof in one newspaper published in the city of Washington at least five days previous to the day of said meeting; and such subscribers as shall attend the meeting so called, either in person or by lawful proxy, then and there shall elect by ballot seven directors for said corporation; and at such election each share of said capital stock shall entitle the owner thereof to one vote. The president and the secretary of the board of commissioners, and in the case of their absence or inability, any two of the officers of said board, shall act as inspectors of said election, and shall certify under their hands the names of the directors elected at said meeting; and the said commissioners, treasurer, and secretary shall then deliver over to said directors all the properties, subscription-books, and other books in their possession, and thereupon the duties of said commissioners shall cease and thereafter the stockholders shall constitute said body politic and corporate, and said corporation shall be deemed to be completely organized and constituted, with all the faculties, rights, and privileges hereby granted.

The committee recommended the following amendments:

In line 12 strike out "one" and insert "two." In line 36 strike out "one newspaper" and insert "two or more newspapers." In line 54 strike out the word "faculties."

The amendments were agreed to.

The committee recommended striking out section 3; which was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That there shall be seven directors of said corporation, who shall be a board to transact and manage all the affairs of the corporation and exercise all its powers, subject to the control of the stockholders in general meeting. A majority of the board shall be a quorum. They shall be elected annually by the stockholders in general meeting, and shall hold their offices for one year and until their successors shall be elected. They shall be stockholders of the corporation. They shall be elected under such regulations and supervision as the board of directors or stockholders shall prescribe after the first election.

The committee recommended an amendment, adding after the word "elected," in line 8, the words "and qualified." Also, in line 9, inserting the word "such" after the word "under."

The amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read section 5, as follows:

SEC. 5. That the board of directors shall elect one of their own number as president of the corporation, and his term of office shall be the same as their own, and he shall exercise such powers as the board or the stockholders shall prescribe.

The Clerk read section 6, as follows:

SEC. 6. That a general meeting of the stockholders shall be held annually, at such time and place as the by-laws shall prescribe; and a general meeting may also be called at any time and place by the board of directors, at least ten days' notice thereof being given by advertisement in two or more newspapers published in the city of Washington. In all elections and in the decision of all questions each stockholder shall be entitled to one vote for every share of stock held by him or her. A number of stockholders holding a majority of the shares subscribed, and being present in person or represented by proxy, shall be a quorum of a meeting of the stockholders. Stockholders may vote in person or by proxy, and the form of proxies may be prescribed by the by-laws. Less than a quorum of stockholders may adjourn a meeting from time to time.

The committee recommended an amendment striking out the word "one," in line 5, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "two."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the board of directors shall have the power to make assessments from time to time on the capital stock until the same shall be paid up, and upon default in the payment of any sum assessed and due upon said stock the stock may be forfeited and sold for the payment thereof, with interest and expenses, under such regulations as the by-laws shall prescribe; or the corporation may by suit recover the same from the holder of the stock at the time of the assessment thereof.

The committee recommend an amendment, adding to the end of the section the following:

And no certificate of stock shall be issued until the par value thereof has been fully paid up.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read section 8, as follows:

SEC. 8. That the said corporation shall have authority to construct, maintain, and work the railroad mentioned in the first section of this act, and such branches or lateral railroads from its main line as Congress may hereafter grant authority.

The committee recommended an amendment striking out the words "and such branches or lateral railroads from its main line as Congress may hereafter grant authority."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read section 9, as follows:

SEC. 9. That for transportation on its railroad, or any part thereof, the said corporation shall have a right to charge and collect as toll and transportation charges at rates not exceeding 6 cents per ton of property or 5 cents per passenger for each mile of transportation; but for any distance 25 cents may be charged for a passenger or for any quantity of freight.

The committee recommended amendments as follows:

In line 4, strike out the word "property" and insert the word "freight;" strike out the word "five" and insert the word "three." In line 6, strike out "twenty-five," and insert "ten."

The amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read section 10, as follows:

SEC. 10. That the said railroad may be constructed with double tracks or single tracks, as the said corporation shall deem proper; and said corporation may construct and maintain all bridges, wharves, and other structures and works which it shall deem necessary for the purpose of its incorporation; but the land which it shall have a right to acquire for the construction of such road and works shall not exceed an amount to be hereafter agreed on between said corporation and the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The committee recommended an amendment inserting, after the word "maintain," in line 4, the words "along its line or at the termini of its road." Also, in line 5, an amendment striking out the word "bridges" and the word "it." Also, in line 6, an amendment striking out the word "deem" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "be."

The amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read section 11, as follows:

SEC. 11. That said Washington and Western Maryland Railroad Company be, and they are hereby, authorized to issue its bonds to aid in the construction and equipment of its railroad to the extent of $20,000 per mile for each and every mile or fraction thereof, and to secure them by mortgage on its property, rights of way, and all property whatsoever, real, personal, and mixed, including its franchise as a corporation; and as proof and notice of its legal execution and effectual delivery said mortgage shall be filed and recorded in the office of the register of deeds for the District of Columbia.

The committee recommended amendments, as follows:

In line 2 strike out the words "they are" and insert "it is;" in line 5, after the word "mile," strike out the words "or fraction thereof;" add at the end of line 11 the following:

"Provided, That no bonds shall be issued until at least 50 per cent. of the capital stock of said company is paid up in full."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Will not the gentleman from South Carolina accept my amendment to the bill?

Mr. HEMPHILL. The gentleman from Maryland has it in charge.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I then put the question to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COMPTON] whether he will not agree to accept my amendment to the bill?

Mr. COMPTON. I can not consent to accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments of the committee, and the vote will be taken upon them in gross.

The amendments of the committee were agreed to.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I thought the gentleman having charge of the bill would accept the amendment which I desire to make to this bill. It is a proper one, and should be adopted by the House. The bill provides that no bond shall be issued until at least 50 per cent. of the capital stock of said company is subscribed and paid in full. I believe all of the stock should be subscribed and paid in full before any bonds are permitted to be issued. If the bill be allowed to pass with this provision in it the board of directors may never call for more than 50 per cent. of the stock and issue the bonds. This proviso gives the board of directors the power to call for only 50 per cent. of the capital stock of the company to be paid in full, and in fact it provides for the completion of the road from bonds instead of the capital stock. The principle is one which should be carefully guarded, and all of the capital stock should be subscribed and paid for before any bonds are allowed to be issued.

All the scandal which has ever arisen in the organization of corporations of this kind in the construction of great lines of railroad has been caused by giving the power to the board of directors to issue bonds before the full amount of the capital stock has been subscribed for and paid. It should be adopted as a principle to govern and control this body in relation to these acts of incorporation to provide that all of the capital stock should be subscribed and paid for before a single bond is allowed to be issued. That is the prime fact which should be considered and provided for in all such bills.

I shall therefore move as an amendment to the bill, to strike out the words "fifty per centum" and insert in lieu thereof the word "all;" so that all of the capital stock shall be subscribed and paid for before any bonds can be issued.

Mr. DOCKERY. What is the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I have just stated it. The bill now provides that the board of directors, when 50 per cent. of the capital stock has been subscribed for and paid, shall have power to issue bonds of the corporation. I propose to strike out those words and to amend the bill by providing that no bond shall be issued until all of the capital stock has been subscribed and paid for.

Mr. COMPTON. If the gentleman will turn to section 6 he will find that the amendment there covers the point which he has made.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. No, that does not meet the question which I have raised. When properly considered I do not see how there can be any objection to the amendment I have proposed. If it was the intention of the committee to provide an amendment in section 6 covering that point, why not make assurance doubly sure by adopting my amendment?

Mr. COMPTON. Just one word more. The amount of stock which is to be issued by this bill is only $60,000. Only 3 miles of the road is within the District. That is all this charter covers. This road is seeking entrance into Washington from Williamsport through the State of Maryland. The road will be operated mainly under the act of incorporation from the State of Maryland, and this covers only a very small portion of the road. As I have stated, the amount covered in the District will be some $60,000, and I think when the road is to be operated under the charter of the State of Maryland we ought not on account of this small portion of the road which enters the District to tie them down as the gentleman suggests.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. The principle is the same whether the amount of capital stock is $60,000 or $60,000,000. The question is whether bonds shall be allowed to be issued before the capital stock has been subscribed and paid for.

The gentleman assumes in the statement made here that these parties have no other purposes in view than an honest intention of building the line of road and of paying up their stock in full. Now, that being the case what reasonable objection can there be urged against the amendment which I have suggested, which provides that the stock shall be paid in full before they have the right to issue the bonds?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman, while the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COMPTON] has this bill specially in charge, yet I desire to say a word in reference to the objection urged here. The only purpose that a Legislature can possibly have in passing such an act is to see that so far as in them lies the public are not to be deceived by anything that grows out of the action of the Legislative Assembly.

The object of this measure is to provide for the construction of a railroad. If when 50 per cent. of the stock is paid in the railroad is so far completed that sensible people having money are willing to invest their money in the bonds, I do not see what danger there can be in allowing them to do so, or what objection could be urged against it. The principle of requiring every man to pay up in full of the stock subscribed by him in any enterprise is a very good principle for people who have plenty of money, but not a very good principle for those who are sometimes a little scarce of that very desirable commodity. If the gentleman from Illinois had a piece of land and was not able to pay for the whole of it, but by way of convenience, if he should not be able to do that, would mortgage the land to raise money enough to pay the balance on it, would he regard that as a great hardship upon the community? So it is with railroads. If people who want to construct them are able to pay 50 per cent. down, and other people who have the money are willing upon that investment to loan the additional 50 per cent. necessary to complete the road, taking the bonds of the road as security, it does not seem that there could be any serious objection to allowing them to do so. This is especially true in view of the fact that no certificates can be given under any circumstances for stock until the full amount of the certificate has been paid.

The gentleman from Illinois meets this by saying that these receipts issued in lieu of the certificates or before the certificates can be issued are negotiable and pass from hand to hand. That is true. But the receipt, the gentleman will remember, must express on its face the actual sum paid in; and if a man chooses to pay more than the amount the receipt calls for on its face, it does not seem to me that we should have any objection to his doing so.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, if the statement of my friend from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], that all subscriptions to stock in enterprises of this character must be paid up before any bonds can be issued, had been the rule in this country heretofore then the great West would still be a wilderness. It has been just the opposite policy that has made the country and this nation what it now is. The whole western country has been built up by bonding the railroads before the stock was paid up. It is no easy matter for such enterprises to get on and find money to complete them in advance of the work upon them. It is difficult to find men who are willing to put their money into such enterprises, and in fact the amounts involved are so large, as a rule, that it is almost impossible to get the necessary amount at the beginning. If all had to be paid in cash at the beginning very few roads would be built. That has not been the plan.

The rule has been that a considerable quantity of money has been put in, work has been carried on, and then that work used as the basis for securing new funds to go ahead still further. This work has been done by the credit of the companies on bonds issued; and the public do not care how the work is done so it is done. They are interested and want to get the benefit of the roads. If there was a law of Congress of the character proposed here by the gentleman from Illinois, it would put a stop to a great many enterprises of this character. If there is a loss on the part of those persons who invest their money and purchase these bonds, it is their own lookout. I do not see why the Congress of the United States should be responsible for it, or undertake to take care of these bondholders. If their investments turn out to be bad the public lose nothing by it. It is not their lookout.

It is true that the bondholders may lose, but as a rule they are sufficiently careful to look out for themselves, and they are not likely to invest their money in bad projects. I do not see, therefore, why Legislatures should look out for this class of people. The only thing for us to do is to see if the public requires the road, and if they do, then we pass here a law to allow the construction to go on under such reasonable safeguards as are always thrown around, or should be thrown around, such enterprises; and I for one do not care whether they build it with money of their own or whether they secure it on bonds at $2 to one or $3 to one. It can make no possible difference to us. These railroads in the West have been sold over and over again, from one set of creditors to another. It is an old story with some of them. Mortgages have been foreclosed, and the roads passed from one set of creditors to another.

But it has not affected the public, as a rule. They get the benefit of the roads all the same. They never suspended operations even while the sales were in progress; and no matter how often they change hands they are still run for the convenience and benefit of the public. That is the way here. This road is for the benefit of the public, not for a few capitalists who are pecuniarily interested in it.

Everything that capitalists undertake here or in other parts of the country does not prosper. They frequently put their money into bad and losing enterprises, and often undertake operations that they are sorry for afterwards. But that is their own lookout, and I do not think we should hamper or restrain them from investing their money as they please, and thereby cripple the enterprises of other people.

Besides that, such operations as this are of great service to the working people. The workmen are employed in every department for the construction of the road. The road must be graded, ties must be prepared, cars built, foundries run in connection with them, rails produced, and all classes of working people are interested in having public improvements go on. All this work has got to be paid for as it goes on; and it makes no difference in the eyes of the public whether the bondholders get caught or not. I say the bill ought to pass, therefore, without such restrictions as the gentleman suggests. I do not want to save the bondholders at the expense of the enterprises of the country.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I recognize the fact that the suggestions of the chairman of the committee and the gentleman from Indiana should have great weight in this matter; but it will be borne in mind by the members of the committee, upon reflection, that the proposed amendment which has been adopted to section 6 does not meet the objection that I have urged. Now, the gentleman says that no stock can issue until the subscription is paid in full. But it may be, sir, that they may go on from year to year and not pay up the subscriptions at all, and yet at the same time dividends may be declared upon the certificates, and the subscribers to the stock would get the benefit of the dividends although not a share of the stock had ever been issued.

Every person who is familiar with corporations knows that this is one of the devices that is resorted to by parties who desire to speculate in such corporations, formed or to be formed. Now, that is the reason why I insist upon the amendment which I have proposed here. No man ought to enter into an enterprise of this kind unless he is prepared to pay the amount of money that he subscribes. If he subscribes for ten shares in this stock he should be compelled to pay that amount before any liability is made upon the road. The public is interested in this matter as well as the incorporators themselves, and I ask for a vote upon my amendment.

Mr. GROUT. It seems to me that the gentleman is a little imaginative in reference to the mischiefs that are to arise. You allow the bonds to be issued before the stock is completely paid up. Of course if it were to be allowed that the stock was to be partly paid and a certificate issued as if it had been completely paid, the sale of stock on that certificate and the transfer of it might be calculated to mislead those who might desire to invest in the bonds of such an enterprise. As has been suggested by the chairman of the committee, as a man who took stock in the road you might feel an interest in the enterprise, as they undoubtedly would. In subscribing for the stock, if they have not sufficient money to pay for that stock, give them reasonable time in which to do it. But after they have paid, for instance, 50 per cent. of their subscription, there having been no certificate issued to mislead any one in reference to the amount which is paid, they learn of some one else who is willing to take bonds after that 50 per cent. has been paid in.

Bonds are issued upon the strength of that 50 per cent. already invested on each share; and so they get relief from the outside. If they were required to pay up on the stock then and there, it would not be necessary to issue bonds. As the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] suggested, those who subscribe for the stock may not have sufficient money to put in and complete the enterprise; but if 50 per cent. is paid in on the stock no harm can come to any one. There is certainly no deception practiced in that if no certificate is issued and they shall have paid in one-half of the amount of the stock. They might go out of the city and ultimately go to the bondholders, but there is no fraud on the bondholders and all the power that we should exercise here should be to protect it from frauds. When it is provided that no certificate shall issue until it is paid up, there is no chance for fraud. If any investor stands ready to put in his money on top of that 50 per cent., good and well; who is harmed? Who is to be harmed I can not see.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment and the Chairman stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 21, noes 24.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN appointed as tellers Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois, and Mr. HEMPHILL.

After proceeding for some time with the count,

Mr. HEMPHILL said: Rather than consume the time of the House further I will accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS].

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The amendment of Mr. HOPKINS was adopted.

The reading of the bill by sections was concluded.

The amendments recommended by the committee were adopted.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I move the adoption of the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "or tender," in line 9, in section 15; so that it will read: "Upon such confirmation of the first or any subsequent inquisition and report and upon the payment of the amount fixed in the inquisition," etc.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DOCKERY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. ROGERS reported that the Committee of the Whole House having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9418) for the incorporation of the Washington and Western Maryland Railroad had instructed him to report it favorably to the House with sundry amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any of the amendments? If not, the amendments will be taken in gross.

The amendments were taken in gross, and were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COMPTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WATER METERS, HOTELS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I call up the bill (H. R. 10050) to amend section 216 of the Revised Statutes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of section 216 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia as requires hotels to erect and maintain meters to determine the quantity of water used be, and is hereby, repealed.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. HEMPHILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred House bill 10050, respectfully report that they have had the matter under consideration and are of the opinion that the bill should pass.

The object of this bill is to repeal so much of section 216 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia as requires hotels to erect and maintain meters to determine the quantity of water used.

This section was passed in 1871, but has never been enforced in the District. The commissioners under authority given them by Congress adopted a schedule of annual water rates which virtually abrogated the former law and which have been found satisfactory. As this law has never been enforced, and as there has been no demand for its enforcement, your committee think it should be repealed. The commissioners of the District see no objection to the passage of this bill.

The committee therefore report the bill back to the House and recommend that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SALES FOR OVERDUE TAXES, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the bill (H. R. 10060) prescribing the times for sales and for notice of sales of property in the District of Columbia for overdue taxes, with an amendment of the Senate thereto.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, line 10, after the word "therefore," insert "and a list of said property shall be published once in a daily newspaper published in the District of Columbia, at a cost not to exceed the sum of 50 cents for each parcel of property so advertised."

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move that the amendment of the Senate be concurred in. It provides simply for having the advertisements of the sales of property published in a newspaper as well as in a pamphlet or list, as has been done heretofore.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON LABOR.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent that Tuesday, the 21st of August, be set apart for the consideration of measures reported from the Committee on Labor.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I desire to call attention to the fact that there is already a special assignment for that day, the presentation of statues by the State of New Jersey.

Mr. MILLS. Then let it be the next day, Wednesday, the 22d.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] asks unanimous consent that Wednesday, the 22d of August, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of business reported from the Committee on Labor. Is there objection?

Mr. LYMAN. I object, unless the Committee on Invalid Pensions can have a day assigned for general pension legislation.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, and I think it is but fair to members who have asked me about it to state that my purpose is to call up one of these trust bills.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. And therefore I hope the motion will not prevail.

The motion of Mr. HEMPHILL was not agreed to—ayes 15, noes 21.

INCREASED PENSION FOR DEAFNESS.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (S. 509) authorizing increase of pension in cases of deafness.

Mr. HEMPHILL. It seems to me that our friends over there are a little premature.

Mr. MATSON. I supposed the gentleman was through.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Not yet; but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Instead of being premature they are a good way behind. These soldiers have been deaf for many years.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill S. 509, and that the House now proceed to its consideration.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act all persons on the pension-rolls of the United States, or who may hereafter be thereon, drawing pensions on account of loss of hearing, shall be entitled to receive, in lieu of the amount now paid, in cases of such disability, the sum of $30, in cases of total deafness, and such proportion thereof in cases of partial deafness as the Secretary of the Interior may deem equitable; the amount paid to be determined by the degree of disability existing in each case.

Mr. MATSON. I move the previous question on ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MATSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WARNER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the dependent pension bill be taken up.

Mr. WALKER. I object.

Several MEMBERS on the Democratic side. Regular order.

Mr. WARNER. I did not see anybody rise to object.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that I have no further business from the Committee on the District of Columbia except the bills upon which the House has refused to go into Committee of the Whole.

LIFE-SAVING STATION AT KEWAUNEE HARBOR, WISCONSIN.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint as managers of the conference on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 1923) providing for the establishment of a life-saving station at the harbor of Kewaunee, Wis., the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. TARSNEY, the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. WILSON, and the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. THOMAS H. B. BROWNE.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of general appropriation bills. The Clerk will report the title of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10896) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that that bill be passed over for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the bill will be passed over for the present, and the Clerk will report the title of the next bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10998) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas desire the first reading of the bill for information to be dispensed with?

Mr. SAYERS. Unless it is the desire of the members of the committee to have the bill read for information, I will ask that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. TRACEY. I object.

Mr. DOCKERY. Nothing can be gained by objecting to dispensing with the first reading of the bill for information.

Mr. TRACEY. I will withdraw my objection to dispensing with the reading of the bill.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask that that be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the first reading of the bill for information is dispensed with.

The bill will now be read by sections for amendment.

The first section of the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sums of money herein provided for be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, namely:

For the protection, preservation, and repair of fortifications and other works of defense, $100,000. For the construction of sea-walls, and for earth embankments, $117,000.

For torpedoes for harbor defense; the purchase of submarine mines and necessary appliances to operate them; for needful casemates, cable-galleries, and appliances to render it possible to operate submarine mines; for continuing torpedo experiments; for practical instruction of engineer troops in detail of the service, and for movable submarine torpedoes propelled and controlled at will by power transmitted from shore stations, $200,000.

Mr. WEBER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas whether when that section was under consideration by the Committee on Appropriations Fort Niagara, or Niagara River, was taken into consideration in fixing the amount.

Mr. SAYERS. It was.

There being no objection, the second section was read, as follows:

SEC. 2. For the manufacture or purchase and test of cannon and carriages, including two ten-inch carriages maneuvered by power, one of which shall be a disappearing carriage, and also including those for the field and siege services; for the alteration of carriages on hand to adapt them to improved service guns; for machine guns; for projectiles, powders, fuses, and implements, their trial and proof; for experiments in the means of protecting torpedo lines; for compensation of draughtsmen while employed in the Army Ordnance Bureau on ordnance construction, and for the necessary expenses of ordnance officers while temporarily employed at the proving-ground and absent from their proper stations, at the rate of $2.50 per diem while so employed, and to test and, if found satisfactory, to purchase two breech-loading field guns of three and two-tenths inch bore, of aluminum bronze, $400,000, and not more than $10,000 of said sum shall be expended for providing increased facilities for the manufacture of projectiles: Provided, That all material purchased under this section, excepting samples, shall be of American manufacture.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I think that every member of the House should have a copy of this bill in his possession so he may intelligently understand it as it is read by the Clerk. I do not wish to delay the action of the committee on the bill, but it is necessary we should have copies to see what we are doing.

There are provisions in this bill which are obnoxious to the point of order. I shall make the point of order, and I want to know when to make it, and I can not do so unless I have a copy of the bill for that purpose.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman can get copies of the bill if he will send to the document-room for that purpose.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have sent to the document-room and I have just this moment been able to obtain a copy for the purpose I have indicated.

The Clerk proceeded to read as follows:

SEC. 3. To complete the guns now under fabrication by the Ordnance Department, and for testing the same, as follows: One 10-inch breech-loading steel gun, wire-wrapped, with longitudinal bars on Woodbridge plan, $20,000; for testing the same, $25,000; one 10-inch breech-loading steel-hooped gun, $7,500; for testing the same, $25,000; one 10-inch breech-loading rifle, cast-iron, wire-wrapped, $1,500; for testing the same, $12,000; one 8-inch breech-loading steel-hooped gun, $5,000; for testing the same, $12,000; for testing one 12-inch breech-loading rifle, cast-iron, steel-tubed, $20,000; for testing one 12-inch breech-loading rifle, cast-iron, hooped and tubed with steel on the French system, $20,000; for testing one 12-inch breech-loading mortar, cast-iron, hooped with steel, $10,000; in all, $158,000.

SEC. 4. For the erection, purchase, or manufacture of the necessary buildings and other structures, machinery, tools, and fixtures for an army gun factory for finishing and assembling heavy ordnance, to be erected at the Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. Y., in accordance with the recommendation of the Gun-Foundry Board of February 16, 1884, $750,000: Provided, That not exceeding $20,000 of this sum may be used for the erection and completion of two sets of officers' quarters.

For the purchase of rough-finished, oil-tempered, and annealed steel for high-power coast-defense guns of 8, 10, and 12 inch caliber, in quality and dimensions conforming to specifications, subject to inspection at each stage of the manufacture, and including all the parts of each caliber, $1,500,000: Provided, That no money shall be expended except for steel accepted and delivered, and no contract shall be made hereunder for gun steel at a greater average price per pound for each caliber than the lowest average price charged under contracts hitherto made by the Government for forgings of like caliber.

The material for the guns provided for herein shall be purchased in accordance with section 3709, Revised Statutes, for which purpose the Secretary of War is authorized to make contracts with responsible steel manufacturers, after proper advertisements, continuing not less than thirty days in the newspapers most likely to reach the said manufacturers: Provided, That each bidder with whom such contracts shall be made, unless already so provided, shall agree to erect in the United States a suitable plant, including the best modern appliances, capable of making all the steel required, and of finishing it in accordance with the contracts, and shall further agree to deliver yearly a specified quantity of each caliber, the time of the delivery of the steel for the smaller calibers of heavy guns to commence at the expiration of not more than eighteen months, and that for the largest calibers, specified in the advertisement, at the expiration of not more than three years from the date of the acceptance of the contracts; and that all the tools, machines, and material for said guns shall be manufactured in the United States.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What page is the Clerk reading?

The CHAIRMAN. Just now the Clerk is reading page 4, section 4.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to know the views of the Chair as to the proper place to make the point of order. I wish to make the point of order against every provision of this section 4.

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order to make the point of order at the end of every paragraph to which the gentleman desires to make the point.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to make the point of order against the whole section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain the point of order to any paragraph or section when it is reached.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to know, as a matter of convenience, whether the point of order can not be made at the close of the section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order should be made at the close of the paragraph to which it applies. But if the point of order be made against the whole section it can be withheld until the section has been read.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If the point of order be withheld until the section has been read, then the Chair can not take advantage of that fact to declare the point of order comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair under the circumstances would not take any such advantage.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will wait then until the section has been read.

The reading of the section was concluded as above.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I make the point of order against the entire section, and I make it against each portion of the section. In the first place, I base it on this ground, that the same provisions contained in this bill are contained in a bill pending before this House, which was reported favorably from the Committee on Military Affairs some three or four months ago. I do not remember the date, but I have sent for a copy of the bill.

That is a technical objection, but I make another point which I regard as absolutely fatal to the bill; and I do not see how the Chair, under the rules of the House, can avoid deciding that the point of order is well taken.

The rules that we have to govern the business of the House, which were adopted at the beginning of the session, clearly and specifically define the jurisdiction of the various committees of the House. If we are to be governed by those rules, and are to pay all respect to the jurisdiction conferred upon the various committees, it does seem to me that the point I make must be sustained.

The Committee on Appropriations, as is well known to the House, until the last Congress was entitled to assume jurisdiction over every one of the regular appropriation bills, amounting in number to some twelve or thirteen. At the beginning of the last Congress or soon afterwards it was determined by this House that the jurisdiction of that committee should be divided, and some six of the regular appropriation bills were taken away from the control of that committee and placed under the jurisdiction and control of the various other committees of the House.

Among the bills which were left to the jurisdiction of the Appropriations Committee was the bill known as the fortifications bill. An investigation of the facts in connection with that bill through many years past, and perhaps during all the past, will show that the appropriations therein contained related exclusively to the fortifications, to their care, and to the necessary expenditures in connection therewith; but it did not go beyond. When the Committee on Rules was draughting the present code they specifically stated that all subjects relating to the fortifications should be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and that it should have jurisdiction over that subject. I hold that under these rules there is no question whatever but that the Committee on Appropriations has the exclusive right to report bills here making appropriations to build new forts, for the proper care and repair of the forts already in existence, and for any permanent fixtures pertaining to them.

The Committee on Rules at the same time provided that all legislation should be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs which relates to the military establishment and the public defense, including the appropriations for its support, and to provide for the Military Academy. These subjects were specifically declared by the Committee on Rules, and adopted by the House, as proper subjects coming within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Military Affairs, and the rules of the House, so adopted, have up to this time referred all such subjects to that committee. Its jurisdiction according to the very letter of the rules is of all subjects relating to the "military establishment," a very broad, general, and comprehensive term, and to the "public defenses," as broad a term perhaps as possibly could have been used, a term that implies everything pertaining to the defenses of the coast or to the inland defenses of the country anywhere. In addition to that the committee goes further and declares that all appropriations in support of the public defense and relating to the military establishment shall be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Now, then, what do we have here? As I have already read you from the rules, the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations in this respect is confined to the one single subject pertaining to the military establishment, and that is "fortifications." Nothing more. The words "and to the public defense" are not in that provision of the rules which gives jurisdiction to the Committee on Appropriations. The only words employed in the rule conferring jurisdiction on that committee are the words "and fortifications."

Now, then, when the committee came to determine as to what committee should have jurisdiction over the public defenses, the Committee on Rules declared it should belong exclusively to the Military Committee, and specifically placed the words in the rule which empower the Committee on Military Affairs to take action in regard to it. The section of this bill which has been read seeks to deprive the committee of this jurisdiction. What does it provide? To what does it relate? To fortifications? It relates, sir, to the manufacture of guns. It relates to the establishment of a gun factory.

Now, that is not a fortification, but something very different and far away from any fortification of which I have any knowledge. It proposes to create a gun factory at the Watervliet arsenal; not at a fort. It has no relation to a fort. It is to make guns. For what purpose? Siege guns, field guns, and perhaps guns to be mounted on the fortifications. That is all true. But the provision here to which I refer has nothing to do with the fortification any more than the purchase of small-arms to arm the guards of the forts or the manufacture of swords or of bayonets or the manufacture of gunpowder or any other of the military equipments that do not form any part of a fort or enter into its construction. If the Committee on Appropriations have power here to exercise jurisdiction over this subject by building a gun factory and the purchase of steel forgings to make guns, why, on the same principle and on the same rule of construction, they would have jurisdiction also over the question of providing pay to the privates, non-commissioned officers, and general officers of the Army, and to furnishing them with clothing and provisions and all other supplies relating to the military establishment.

But, sir, I have no desire to arrogate to the Committee on Military Affairs any of the powers that are not conferred upon it by the rules. God knows we have had work enough in that committee without assuming additional duties. Something like 1,200 bills have been referred to our committee; but I would be derelict in my duty if I should sit here silent and allow a proposition to come before the House infringing upon the powers or duties and the rightful jurisdiction of the committee. It seems to me that if the Committee on Appropriations would confine itself to the jurisdiction legitimately conferred upon it, in the investigation of the six or seven great appropriation bills that belong to them, they would have enough to do without going around the House and seeking to take away from other committees their legitimate and rightful functions.

Therefore I submit to the Chair, in all candor, and without fear of successful contradiction, that this purpose for which the fourth section of the bill makes appropriation belongs legitimately and exclusively to the jurisdiction of the Military Committee, and the Military Committee, sir, has by the action of this House been clothed with additional powers to what are contained in the rules. A bill was introduced and referred to that committee which I think contains verbatim the language used here in this section of the pending appropriation bill, and I refer to the bill known as the Cutcheon or Tracey bill, introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TRACEY] and also by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON].

That bill was introduced early in this session. By the action of this House it was referred to the Military Committee, not to the Committee on Appropriations. Therefore by the action of this House it is confirmed as coming under the language of the rules, which defines the jurisdiction of the committee. The House acting under these rules declared by its own act that the construction we place upon the rules is a correct one, and the bill went to the Military Committee and not to the Appropriations Committee. The Committee on Military Affairs had the bill before it for some time, and after careful investigation reported it back to the House. It is now upon the Calendar. It makes appropriations for this very object, and I think, in the very language of the fourth section of this bill. I hold, first, that the rules declare that it belongs to that committee. Second, that the House acting under that rule thereby gave such a construction to its meaning as to refer the only bill that has been presented to this House on this subject to the Committee on Military Affairs. No such bill has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and I lay down this proposition that the Committee on Appropriations have no more right to report to this House a bill on this matter than it has to report a bill belonging to matters pertaining to the public domain, and which should rightfully be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

It has not been referred to that committee, but it has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. There is another fact which I desire to call to the attention of the Chair. The Army appropriation bill after it left this body and went to the Senate was amended by a provision, if not exactly, nearly exactly in the terms of the provision in this fourth section. That amendment is still upon that bill. The House has taken cognizance of the fact that the Senate had made such a provision in that bill, and the House, acting upon the motion of myself as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, has taken just such action as we desire to take, and has put that question in conference of the two Houses. The question is now in conference. This very appropriation that these gentlemen propose to make is in conference, and that conference committee was to meet at this hour. Now, is it not strange that at the very moment when the conferees of the two Houses are about to come together that the gentleman from Texas brings before the House that proposition which he knows is upon that bill which is to come before the conferees and upon which they are to pass?

Now, Mr. Chairman, suppose the House should take action upon the amendment the Senate has placed upon the Army bill. Shall it also take action on the proposition here and have two appropriations for the same purpose? Why has the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman on the Committee on Appropriations not sufficient patience to wait for the conferees' report, when that subject will come up rightfully and secure action harmoniously in this House? Why is he now bringing in this very proposition? Why should he seek to bring in here this disturbing element and seek to force it through this House?

But, sir, I desire more particularly to confine myself to the naked point of order; that there is not a single dollar in the fourth section of this bill that the Committee on Appropriations can legitimately report a bill making appropriation for. The House has adjudicated upon the question, and so far as it is possible in legislation it is res adjudicata. It has decided that this question belongs exclusively to the Committee on Military Affairs. Now then, sir, I will not detain the House further. This effort came entirely unexpected to me, or to any member of that committee. I simply desire to see the integrity of the proceedings of the House preserved; and therefore I have made this point of order against the entire fourth section.

Mr. SAYERS. I shall address myself to the particular question at bar. I shall not attempt to follow the gentleman from Illinois in his wanderings in and around this question, but come directly to the point of order as raised by him.

Now, I have a great deal of confidence in the gentleman from Illinois. He has been a member of this House for many years. He has taken an active part in its proceedings, and he has been considered one of the experts as regards its rules and usages. Now, if the gentleman from Illinois was the one person who had experience in this matter, I might feel some hesitancy in opposing the point of order raised by him. The Committee on Rules has considered this question, and I submit to the House and to the committee, that as between the gentleman from Illinois and the Committee on Rules there ought not to be any hesitation whatever in the mind of the Chair as to which should be followed. The Committee on Rules, Mr. Chairman, in reporting your present rules, used this language:

The fortification bill being one relating jointly to Army and Navy fortifications and the general defense, is left with the Committee on Appropriations.

And right here, Mr. Chairman, permit me to say that the Committee on Appropriations were not confined to recommending appropriations for the erection and repairs of fortifications, but also had to recommend appropriations for armaments in the fortification bill.

On the 9th day of February, 1887, this very same question came up before the Speaker. I read from the RECORD:

Mr. REED. I make the parliamentary inquiry as to this bill that was made with reference to the other, that is to say, if it goes to the Committee on Appropriations, will that committee be at liberty to report at any time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that so much of this bill as relates to the procurement of ordnance, guns, has usually, the Chair thinks, been included in the sundry civil appropriation bill when any appropriation was made for that purpose at all, and the remainder of the bill providing armament for fortifications is a subject over which the Committee on Appropriations has jurisdiction by the express terms of the rule of the House. The Chair thinks, therefore, this bill properly belongs to the Committee on Appropriations.

Again, the Speaker says:

The Chair has decided that this bill properly goes to the Committee on Appropriations under the rule of the House; and if this decision is correct, it would follow that the committee can report at any time.

The bill under discussion when the decision was made was an act to encourage the manufacture of steel for modern army ordnance, armor, and other army purposes, and to provide heavy ordnance adapted to modern army warfare, and for other purposes.

I will not detain the committee any longer upon the point of order except to refer to the decision of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union when this very question came up on the 17th of June last. The point of order was raised as to an amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TRACEY], and it was decided by the present occupant of the chair that it was not an amendment which had a proper place upon the Army bill, but that it should go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] has pursued the same tactics that he pursued the other day. When I had quoted the language of the rule which clearly states that all subjects relating to public defense should be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and that no such jurisdiction is conferred upon the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Texas, knowing full well that he could not meet the rule without admitting the force of my assertion and my argument, dodged the question by reading from the remarks of some gentleman who reported the rules to this House, and who, perhaps, by a slip of the tongue, or from not properly comprehending the nature of the rules that he was reporting, did say that the Committee on Appropriations would have jurisdiction over the subject of defense.

Mr. SAYERS. It was the language of the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then all I have to say is that if the Committee on Rules understood the nature of the language they employed in making that report, they were ignorant of the character of their own work.

The Committee on Rules bring in a code of rules providing, in language which no one can fail to comprehend, that jurisdiction over questions relating to the public defense shall be conferred upon the Committee on Military Affairs. Now for the gentleman from Texas, or any one else, to say that because the person reporting the rules to the House said, or because the person who draughted the report said, that the Committee on Rules intended to confer that jurisdiction upon the Committee on Appropriations, is to say the committee were ignorant of what they themselves had done in draughting the rules. I rose merely to make that remark, and further to say that I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] does not well remember the character of the decision made by the present occupant of the chair when the amendment which the gentleman has referred to was before the committee. The same point was not then made in its full force and effect that has been made now, and I believe that the Chair, upon an examination of the proceedings on that day, will not now, when his attention is called to the very language of the rule, disregard the rules of this House in order to permit the gentleman from Texas to assume a jurisdiction for his committee that does not rightfully belong to it.

Mr. MAISH. Mr. Chairman, I did not participate in the discussion that rose upon this question the other day. I thought then that the question was unnecessarily precipitated upon the House. Now, however, I think it has been fairly submitted to this body. I have always believed that these rules of ours are not as specifically drawn as they might be. They do not set forth the powers and duties of the various committees of the House as intelligently and definitely as they might do. But, after having carefully examined the language to which we must resort to ascertain the jurisdiction of the two committees now contending upon this question, I have come to the conclusion that the Committee on Military Affairs, according to the language of the rule, is fairly entitled to jurisdiction of this subject. Let me call the attention of the Chair for a moment to Rule XI, which defines the jurisdiction of the committees of this House. It begins in this way:

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows: * * * Subjects relating—

Then follow the committees until we reach the Committee on Appropriations. Its powers are provided as follows—to appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government as herein provided, namely: legislative, executive.

And this enumeration includes "fortifications." The powers of the military are defined as follows:

Subjects relating to the military establishment and the public defense, including the appropriations for its support and for that of the Military Academy, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Now, Mr. Speaker, whatever appertains legitimately to fortifications the Committee on Appropriations is fairly entitled to, but whatever appertains to the public defense is a question to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Committee on Appropriations the other day contended it had the right to make appropriation for the erection of an armory. What has an armory to do with fortifications? What, I ask, has the construction of ordnance to do with fortification? Nothing at all, and they have much to do with the public defense.

Hence I say whatever pertains to the public defense the Committee on Military Affairs has the exclusive jurisdiction to make appropriations for that purpose.

Now, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], who has been such an extraordinary stickler for his committee—and I have not been disposed to combat his ideas further than he has incorporated them in his own bill—even he must concede that questions pertaining to the public defense belong exclusively to the Committee on Military Affairs. How can he, therefore, and how can you decide that the erection of an armory belongs to the subject of a fortification, or that the construction of ordnance belongs to the appropriation for fortifications?

If I understand the rules of the House they are intended to define what these respective committees shall make appropriations for. I understand by the word "fortifications" the erection of a fort with the permanent fixtures, and I use the word advisedly, "fixtures" belonging to a fort, all the artillery, all the ordnance, all the gunpowder, all the gun-carriages, all the uniforms of the men—all those, Mr. Chairman, belong exclusively to be appropriated for by the Committee on Military Affairs.

It will not do for the gentleman from Texas to maintain that the committee which reported these rules have said in their report this particular subject belongs to the Committee on Appropriations. I will only call attention to the ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case in which you, Mr. Chairman, took a conspicuous and worthy part—I refer to the case of the appropriation to the Centennial Exposition. There it was contended by the attorneys on the part of the Centennial Commission, because it was understood here in this House, in the debates of the House, that the appropriation was to belong to the commission, therefore the Supreme Court should take that view of the matter.

It has been held always the mere language of the debates and the mere understanding of the members of the body making the law do not rise as high as the language of the law itself. We are not to be governed by the opinion of the members of the Committee on Rules when the language of the rule itself is so plain. The rule itself is the highest evidence of the intention of the committee which made the rule. That is the highest rule of construction, and we can not resort to the opinion of members of the body until we find it is so ambiguous and so obscure that no construction can be given to it.

Mr. Chairman, I do not see there is any great privilege involved in this. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] the other day showed very plainly that no privilege was invaded. None is intended to be invaded. In the orderly conduct of the business of the House the committee to whom specific duties shall be assigned should be permitted to perform those duties. If this is true in the abstract, how much more is it true when a committee has had this whole subject committed to them. They have had it committed to them twice. First it has been committed to them by reference of the bill they have reported almost in the exact terms of this bill, a measure providing for the erection of an armory at Watervliet and the purchase of a large amount of steel. And again when the Speaker of the House of Representatives appointed the conferees on the part of the House to meet the conferees on the part of the Senate to consider and dispose of this subject, in regard to which we will meet in all probability during the day.

Mr. GEAR. I have but a word to add in support of the position taken by the Military Committee on this bill. It may be that the Congress which adopted the rules made a mistake, but the rule in regard to fortifications and the appropriations therefor is in language and terms perfectly clear. It gave consideration of these measures to the Committee on Appropriations alone. To the Committee on Military Affairs it gives the control of appropriations for public defenses. I have looked through the bill under consideration and I found but four lines, in my judgment—not as a member of the Military Committee, but as a member of this body and outside of the Military Committee—that are germane to the powers conferred under the rules upon the Appropriations Committee; and I refer to lines 6, 7, 8, and 9 of the first section of the bill. I fail to see under what construction of language the Appropriations Committee can take charge of a bill which applies not only to the defenses of fortifications, but also to field works. The bill goes on and provides for guns of large caliber. To that I do not object. I am in favor of the country having every system of defense and proper appropriations for defense. That is the principal thing we want. We also want fortifications. But under the rules as contained in this book I do not see how the Committee on Appropriations can have any control of siege guns and fort guns and field guns as provided for here. It is manifestly taking away from the Military Committee a part of the jurisdiction conferred upon it by the rules.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard but briefly on the point of order, and shall confine myself to a few words in addition to what has been said by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAISH].

The House is familiar with the fact that for a long time the Committee on Appropriations possessed the power to appropriate for all the purposes for which appropriations could be made by Congress. It was the great committee which held the purse-strings of the nation in regard to every appropriation of the public money. Some Congresses ago, even long before the Congress which made the division of powers of that committee by the adoption of the present rules, the same question was raised as to whether or not the committees having in charge the specific matters intrusted to them were not better qualified to judge of the amounts to be appropriated and that should be applied to the specific objects under their immediate charge, rather than any general committee of the House. And the first invasion that was made of the rules of the House in that regard and the first division of the authority of this subject occurred many Congresses ago, when the Committee on Agriculture insisted that, the subject of agriculture being confided to them, they should be intrusted also by the House with the authority and the power to determine what should be the amount of the appropriation for the encouragement of this great industry of the country, which was placed under their especial charge and management.

That was the first departure from the rules of the House as regards the power of the Committee on Appropriations, and the first break in the powers of that great committee to make provision for all legitimate objects under the Government. It paved the way, sir, for a change of the rules with regard to other committees of the House; for if the reason that if the rules as applicable to the Committee on Agriculture was potent to warrant a change in regard to the method of making appropriations for that Department, then it was urged by the members of the House with equal force that other committees should also be intrusted with the same powers over the subjects under their control, and that it would be proper for the Committee on Naval Affairs to determine the amount of appropriations necessary for the Naval Department of the Government, and that the Committee on Military Affairs should determine the question of the requisite amount to be appropriated for the maintenance and support of the Army and all of the details connected therewith, and so on through the list of committees designated by the rules of the House.

In this manner the power of the Committee on Appropriations was, by the adoption of the recent rules now prevailing in this House, curtailed of its former dimensions and restricted in its theretofore great and enlarged powers to certain specific purposes of appropriation, which were still retained as appropriately belonging to the Committee on Appropriations. And I will refer to the language of the rules themselves in order that the chairman of the committee may see, in the adoption of the amended rules by the Forty-ninth Congress, what was intended, designed, and expressed in specific terms to be retained as subject-matters which properly belong to the Committee on Appropriations and by it to be considered. These items are specifically enumerated in the rules upon the subject in paragraph 3 of Rule XI. This rule provides that—

> All legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rules, as follows, namely, * * * Subjects relating to appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government, to the Committee on Appropriations.

Now it specifies:

> For legislative, executive, and judicial expenses.

And the Committee on Appropriations alone can entertain cognizance of and take jurisdiction of bills introduced in the House for this department of the Government, and no other committee can infringe upon the functions of that committee in this respect, because by the specific enactment in the rules these subjects are confided to the Committee on Appropriations.

Again it proceeds:

> For sundry civil expenses,

the Appropriations Committee must also provide.

Again:

> For fortifications.

And it will be remarked, Mr. Chairman, that there is nothing else of a military character left now under the existing rules within the control and jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations except the words quoted, "for fortifications." What does that mean? It necessarily means appropriations for the erection, maintenance, and support of fortifications, and that alone. Beyond that the committee has no control of the subject. For, what does the plain language of the rule confer upon that committee?

Why, appropriations for the erection, maintenance, and support of fortifications, for the District of Columbia, and for all deficiencies, to the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, it will be observed that of the subject-matters which relate to military affairs there is reserved to the Committee on Appropriations alone jurisdiction over the subject of fortifications. That is one paragraph or section isolated and by itself. There are no other military improvements confided or left in charge of the Committee on Appropriations but fortifications. What are fortifications? By fortifications is meant the erection of coast defenses and defenses for the interior. That is the one item that has not been taken from the Committee on Appropriations. They have it there under the formation of the rules; they hold it now as they held it before. Then we have fortifications as contradistinguished from other defenses of which the Military Committee holds jurisdiction, and no other committee can invade the functions of that committee upon the subject of fortifications nor of the Military Committee on the other.

But when you come to ascertain, Mr. Chairman, what are the powers conferred upon the Committee on Military Affairs you find under the same rule that all proposed legislation "shall be referred," and I call your attention especially to that word. Shall be referred to what? To the appropriate committee to which it belongs, and designating what shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. And now in section 12 in this very Rule XI is defined what subject-matters shall be referred. Referred how? Referred by bills introduced. Referring bills to a particular committee and acted upon by the committee and reported to the House. That section 12 says that "for the military establishment and the public defense, including the appropriations for its support and for the support of the Military Academy." For the support of what, Mr. Chairman? For the support of public defenses "including appropriations for its support and for the Military Academy," to the Committee on Military Affairs. Now, clearly this is a generic term. What relates to the defense of the country goes to the Military Committee. If it does not, then what does the term of defense mean?

Mr. FORNEY. Would the Military Committee have the right to build a monitor?

Mr. HOOKER. They would have the right to build anything for the purpose of maintaining our defense and for the purpose of manning our forts. I would like to ask my distinguished friend from Alabama what is meant by the words "defenses of the country" in the terms of the twelfth section?

Mr. FORNEY. Fortifications require not only the building of the fortification itself, but to complete it you must have the guns there.

Mr. HOOKER. And the fortification would have to have small-arms also.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And soldiers too.

Mr. FORNEY. We have the right to purchase small-arms.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. You furnish them to the fortifications.

Mr. HOOKER. I say that the gentleman can not get rid of the argument that the Committee on Rules, when it used the term that all bills relating to the defense of the country should be referred to and considered by the Military Committee, must have meant something.

Mr. FORNEY. Why did not they say fortifications too.

Mr. HOOKER. Because they did not intend to give it fortifications. They reserved that for the Committee on Appropriations. The construction of the works themselves, as my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAISH] has said, whatever they may be, is retained by the Committee on Appropriations.

But when you say to the Military Committee shall be referred all bills, and that all appropriations shall be made by that committee for the defense of the country, you either mean to state that it shall go to the Military Committee or you use language which was very unfortunate in conveying the meaning of the Committee on Rules and the meaning of the House when they voted for the rules. I say, therefore, that by specific terms whatever relates to the defense of the country belongs properly to the Military Committee, and that what relates to fortifications belongs to the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, sir, this question was settled, so far as this particular section of the bill is concerned, when the bill of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TRACEY] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] was introduced on this floor. Where was it referred to? It was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. By whom was it reported? It was reported to this House by the Committee on Military Affairs, and not by the Committee on Appropriations. It was considered by this House as coming from the Committee on Military Affairs. It went to the other branch of the National Legislature, was considered by that body, and returned to this House with certain amendments.

I say if you look to the plain provisions of the rule itself, it is stated that all matters relating to the defense of the country shall be referred to the Military Committee. That must have meant something, and if it does not mean the construction of arms both large and small then the Committee on Rules has been unfortunate in adopting the language which was designed to confer that power upon the Military Committee of all matters for the defense of the country, if they intended to give it to the Committee on Appropriations. I submit, therefore, if you look to the meaning of the rule itself and the division of power between the committees of the House, the Chair must be forced to the conclusion that all matters of defense are properly referred with the appropriations for them to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say only a word on this subject. It is a matter of absolute indifference to me personally what the judgment of the Chair may be upon this point, but I wish to say a word in the interest of the orderly transaction of the business of this House. When the work of the Committee on Appropriations was in part distributed to other committees that distribution was made by stating the titles of the bills that were to be referred to those committees. To the Committee on Military Affairs was given the military appropriation bill. Does anybody for a moment contend that either the Committee on Rules which made that report or the House which adopted it intended that anything more should be given to the Committee on Military Affairs than had been carried in the military appropriation bill in the past? Was it not to be determined by the well-known character of that bill, and by what it had contained invariably almost throughout its whole history? To the Committee on Appropriations was left the fortifications appropriation bill. What was intended to be given by that language to the Committee on Appropriations?

Was it not the fortifications bill as it was known and understood for years? What other appropriation bill had ever carried fortifications and the armament of fortifications? In all its history of sixty years that bill has carried the appropriations for fortifications and for their armament and everything relating thereto. It would be absurd if it were otherwise. They say they leave us now the fortifications bill, but they say that a fortification does not imply any armament. We are left the patriotic task of making provision to hire some men to put up a few earthworks along the coast, and those, forsooth, are "fortifications!" What a terror that would be to the great powers of the world—a fortification without a gun!

I had supposed, sir, that the material part of a fortification was its armament; I had supposed that a gun foundry or a gun plant was essential to the manufacture of guns to put upon the forts. Perhaps I am mistaken; I am, if the theory of the gentleman on the other side of this question be correct. Now, sir, I call your attention to another fact, and that is the ignorance and stupidity of the War Department in making their estimate for fortifications, in placing these items, all of them, under the title of "fortifications." Why, sir, it seems to me the proposition is too absurd for argument, and I will not detain the Chair longer.

Mr. HOOKER. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the clause which follows immediately after the twelfth clause of the rule conferring this power upon the Military Committee, which provides that all matters pertaining to the naval establishment, including the appropriations for its support, are referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. There is precisely the same language as is used in the twelfth clause, and as well might the Committee on Appropriations, under the head of "fortifications," invade the power of the Committee on Naval Affairs as invade the power of the Military Committee, so far as the public defense is concerned.

Mr. LAIRD. I question somewhat the taste of discussing the proposition presented to the House, in view of the fact that it has been so repeatedly presented in previous contests of this nature. There are, however, certain public considerations which must impress themselves upon the judicial mind, or the legislative mind, either upon the quasi-judicial officer who has to pass upon this question of order or upon the members of the House—certain considerations sounding in public policy which it seems to me are proper to be considered in whatever light this question is to be discussed. Neither the House nor the country can be indifferent to the fact, which must be conceded, that there is an unhappy inability on the part of our friends of the majority to agree among themselves either as to the course which legislation shall take or as to the committees to whom it shall be referred, or to be satisfied with the decisions of the gentlemen who have made rulings upon the general subject controverted here of the jurisdiction of the different committees seeking to exercise power over these matters.

That is an unfortunate condition in which the country is a participant to this unfortunate extent, that out of this confusion of authority and of jurisdiction unequaled since the philological miracle of the confusion of tongues at the Tower of Babel, the country gets absolutely nothing. We have here the old story which has been often told, and better told than I can tell it, of waiting upon the Committee on Appropriations. That is a committee certainly toward which I entertain no ill-will. I have a profound respect for the gentleman who presides over its deliberations as one of the cleanest, squarest, manliest, bravest men in the public service, and I have a somewhat mitigated affection for the balance of the committee. [Laughter.] It is shaded somewhat, but it is not discolored. It is kindly and wholesome, if not always happy. To digress for a moment—because I believe I am invited to talk as long as I may for the purpose of preventing the decision of this matter——[Laughter.]

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, with such an admission on the part of the gentleman from Nebraska I demand the ruling.

Mr. LAIRD. I withdraw that remark. I will forego the digression and address myself to the question of order. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LAIRD. Certainly.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. When the attention of the House has been properly called to the fact that there was really an invasion of the jurisdiction of this body, not by the Military Committee but by the Senate, in disregard of our rules, in attaching to this appropriation bill items which, under the well-settled rules ordained for the government of this body, properly belong to another, I ask him whether he approves or is willing to consent to that course of conduct on the part of the Senate? That is the question which we have here to dispose of. The Military Committee did not add these items to this bill, but observed the rightful jurisdiction of the Appropriations Committee; but the Senate added them in conscious disregard of the rules and jurisdiction of this House in reference to originating money bills. Does my friend approve of that?

Mr. LAIRD. I am happy to say that in the judgment of the gentleman who adapts his conduct on this subject to that of the gentleman from Ohio it does not make any difference what the individual views of gentlemen may be or the views of gentlemen collectively, if the jurisdiction of the Senate be conceded that carries with it the jurisdiction of the House over the subject.

It seems to me logically and legally it involves this question, and that is the only jurisdiction of the Military Committee. If they did as a matter of fact, in the exercise of that jurisdiction, attach that amendment to the bill and send it back, then not only the jurisdiction of the House is acquired by the previously acquired jurisdiction of the Senate, but we are estopped from going behind it, and it takes position not as a part but as an entity by the exercise of the power conferred by the Constitution itself.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Will my friend deem it an interruption if I ask him to yield to me?

Mr. LAIRD. Certainly not.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The Senate has, I think, a Committee on Fortifications. I do not know what jurisdiction it has, but heretofore never at any time to my knowledge has the Senate felt at liberty to cross the line which marks the jurisdiction of the committees of this House by adding amendments to one appropriation bill covering subject-matter which belongs exclusively to another bill.

It is not true in point of fact, I submit, that the Senate has heretofore claimed or exercised the right of making amendments, such as we are considering. That body has by its rules and its uniform practice recognized that none of the items we are considering belong to the military bill, but belong to the fortification bill.

I repeat what I have heretofore said touching the prerogatives of this body. If the Senate may at pleasure exercise the right in disregard of the rules ordained for the orderly conduct of business in this House, if they may add to one appropriation bill the subject-matter apportioned by the rules to other bills, why may they not attach to the bill making appropriations for pensions appropriations for the Navy, and why may they not in that way complete the whole list of appropriations by adding amendments to a single bill and thus deprive the House of its constitutional prerogative to originate money bills?

Mr. LAIRD. One sufficient answer springs from the fact that they have not done it, and we will therefore not undertake to cross that bridge until we reach it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Has that committee any jurisdiction over appropriations?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not know whether it has or has not.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The rules of the Senate require every general appropriation bill, Army, Navy, fortification, or other appropriation bill, shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. However that may be, whether they have or have not, I notice they have a committee on fortifications. Their business is ordered there as ours is here, but they have not the right to disregard the rules of this House which provide an orderly method of originating money bills, a jurisdiction which under the Constitution belongs to this body.

I wish to call my friend's attention to the fact that in the Thirty-fourth Congress the House clearly raised and determined this question. I call his attention to the fact that the House was delayed in its organization at that time, and possibly because of solicitude lest proper provision might not be made for the several Departments, the Senate assumed jurisdiction and passed two appropriation bills.

When they reached this House, however, the House refused to consider them and did not consider them, and that because it would not consent to recognize that the Senate had any constitutional authority to originate money bills. And it has been distinctly held by the Senate that the clause of the Constitution which confers upon this body the exclusive jurisdiction to originate revenue bills covers and includes appropriation bills, and clearly what the Senate may not originate as a separate and distinct proposition they may not add by way of amendment. In other words, such items could not be regarded as amendments, but as original propositions. The right to amend does not carry with it the right to originate.

Mr. HOOKER. I will call the attention of my friend from Ohio to the fact that there is a constitutional provision which precludes the origination of revenue bills in the Senate.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Undoubtedly. But, as I have stated, that clause of the Constitution covers and includes appropriation bills, and it follows, if the Senate may take any appropriation bill originating in the House under the orderly methods we prescribe and append to it other matter belonging to other appropriation bills, our jurisdiction is ousted. And my friend from Mississippi will observe that when, for the more orderly and convenient transaction of the business of preparing, or, if you please, of originating appropriation bills (money bills), we apportion a part to the Military Committee and a part of it to the Appropriation Committee, and a part of it to the Ways and Means Committee, and so on, we do this in the exercise of our constitutional right to provide rules governing our procedure, but we certainly surrender no jot or tittle of our exclusive jurisdiction.

In prescribing these rules we have provided that this work should belong to this committee, this work to that committee, and this to the other committee, in the matter of preparing and reporting to this House bills making appropriations for carrying on the Government. Now, if the position of my honored friend is a correct one, when we send an appropriation bill for the Department of Agriculture to the Senate they may attach every other appropriation in the whole category of appropriations and send it back to us so amended, and thus the Senate would in fact originate nine-tenths of the money bills and confuse and confound the jurisdiction of the several committees of this House. The gentleman insists, however, that this appropriation belongs to the Military and not to the Appropriations Committee.

Sixty years of unbroken precedent sustains the jurisdiction of the Appropriations Committee, and more than sixty years of continuous legislation in this House in the line of the precedent so established would seem to prove that the gentleman is in error, and beyond that the Military Committee did not transgress the rule, nor leave the domain of its own jurisdiction, for they did not include in the bill they reported to this House the subject-matter covered by the Senate amendments. But, on the other hand, when it comes back from the Senate amended by the addition of subject-matter foreign to the bill, then all of a sudden we find the jurisdiction of the Military Committee attaches. If it did not attach before the bill went to the Senate, it can not attach by virtue of anything that the Senate did, for if that were so the jurisdiction of the committees of this House would be fixed by the action of the Senate, and not by the rules of this House, which would be absurd.

Mr. LAIRD. Now, let me interrupt just there for a question, and a question that is germane to a point that my friend from Ohio is making in defense of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SAYERS. I hope we will have a ruling.

Mr. LAIRD. I do not desire to take the gentleman from Ohio from the floor, but I want to ask a question.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will yield the floor back to the gentleman.

Mr. LAIRD. Just let me put one interrogatory right there.

Mr. SAYERS. I want a ruling so that the committee can rise. It is getting near 5 o'clock.

Mr. LAIRD. I wish to ask this question——

Mr. CANNON. Oh, let us have the point of order disposed of.

Mr. LAIRD. This is entirely in the line of argument the gentleman from Ohio has been pursuing. You say that the Committee on Military Affairs as a matter of fact has not sought jurisdiction over the subject-matter. I beg the gentleman's pardon to correct that statement, to begin with, and I should like the gentleman himself either to correct or explain it. The committee to which it was referred did take up this bill; they did consider it; they reported it to the House, and it was placed on the Calendar; and there is a very wide distinction between the action of the Military Committee in presenting this subject in their bill and the action of the other committee, which the gentleman defends. We presented the subject, having considered it——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. They did not in the original bill. I do not know what they did after the Senate amendment came back to the House.

Mr. LAIRD. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. MAISH. We did it before.

Mr. SAYERS. Can we not have a ruling?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I trust the gentleman from Nebraska will be permitted to finish his remarks, and I also wish to make some observations in response to the gentleman from Ohio before the Chair makes a ruling upon the question.

Mr. SAYERS. I insist upon a ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is now prepared to decide the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No matter, Mr. Chairman, what may be the desire of the gentleman from Texas or any one else to hasten a decision of the question, I appeal to the fairness of the Chair to permit the gentleman from Nebraska and other gentlemen to answer arguments which have been made against the point of order. [Cries of "Decide!"]

Mr. SAYERS. The discussion has run on for a long time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to argue the point of order myself, and I claim that I have a right to be heard. It will not be fair after the gentleman from Ohio has sprung an argument here to cut us off without a reply and deprive us of an opportunity to answer the points made by him and at the same time take the gentleman from Nebraska off the floor. Of course I am aware of the fact that the Chair will decide the question according to his own judgment, but the gentleman from Texas has no right to demand that the Chair shall decide in advance of the discussion. It is entirely in the discretion of the Chair to permit the discussion to proceed; and I assume, as I know to be true, that the Chair desires to be entirely fair, and I am satisfied will not deprive the gentleman from Nebraska, or any gentleman who wishes to be heard, of an opportunity of finishing his remarks in response to the points raised by the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has indulged the debate to a very considerable length on the point of order, and is prepared to decide the question that has been submitted. The Chair would ask the gentleman from Nebraska if he desires to proceed further.

Mr. LAIRD. I desire to yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear any gentleman who desires to submit remarks on the point of order during the time that remains until the hour of adjournment.

Mr. HOOKER. I suggest that the committee rise now and let this question go over.

Mr. SAYERS. I wish to submit to the Chair that it is evident gentlemen are talking simply to consume time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope the gentleman from Texas will not apply that to me. I am only anxious that there shall be a correct understanding of the question before a decision is reached.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman from Nebraska has given the whole case away on the statement that he has already made, and I move that the committee now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest that a few minutes yet remain before the hour when the committee must rise, and the Chair will hear, if there be no objection, arguments directly on the point of order until that time is reached.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I desire before the committee rises to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Ohio. If he will look to the rules of the House he will find that they present a safe and unerring guide as to what are the proper functions of each one of these committees. The Committee on Rules declare that the Military Committee shall have jurisdiction over the military establishment, the public defense, and appropriations for its support. The same language is used in conferring jurisdiction upon the Naval Committee, except the "naval establishment" is inserted in place of the military establishment. What does that mean? What has been the action of the Committee on Naval Affairs? That committee has made appropriations for every piece of ordnance that is used upon the ships or vessels of war, and has uniformly reported bills here covering these subjects since the appropriations were divided, and provided for establishing a gun factory and for the manufacture of ordnance for the Navy. Where do they get their authority? They get it exactly from the same rule, and the same words that are used in conferring jurisdiction on the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. But ships are not fortifications.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No, sir; but the guns are such as belong also to fortifications.

Mr. RYAN. Oh, no; those belong to the ships.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Does my friend mean to say that the guns for the ships can not be useful upon fortifications?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is true; but it does not prove anything.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It proves a good deal. But the point I want to make is this: that by the interpretation of the rule relating to the Naval Committee and the power of that committee in regard to appropriations for the naval establishment, we find that the consideration of these subjects has been uniformly assumed by that committee since the adoption of these rules; and they have power to establish gun factories and to purchase steel forgings for the manufacture of guns for the Navy. This power has not been questioned.

Now, again, the words "public defenses" include and would include fortifications and everything else in the nature of public defenses, and if the rules did not expressly reserve to the Committee on Appropriations the subject of fortifications, the Committee on Military Affairs would have jurisdiction of that subject. That is the language of the rule, and no one can dispute it.

Again, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House the committee must now rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. McCREARY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the fortifications bill, had come to no conclusion thereon.

And then (the hour of 5 o'clock having arrived) the Speaker pro tempore declared the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. A. R. ANDERSON: A bill (H. R. 11150) for the relief of Ohio E. Hukill—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STOCKDALE: Petition of Knights of Labor of Moss Point, Jackson County, Mississippi, for the passage of House bill 8716, to protect free labor against convict labor—to the Committee on Labor.

Also, petition of administrator of George R. Dent, of Adams County, Mississippi, for reference of his claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WADE: Papers in the claim of James Clay—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WHITTHORNE: Petition of administrator of George R. Dent, for reference of his claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, August 14, 1888.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

WILLIAM COLLINS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives for reference, to which he calls the attention of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE].

The bill (H. R. 793) for the relief of William Collins was read twice by its title.

Mr. FRYE. I was desirous that that bill might go to the Committee on Commerce, so that it would be attended to at once. It legitimately belongs, however, to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOAR. What is the bill?

Mr. FRYE. It is a bill for the relief of William Collins, to pay a bounty to a fisherman which was cut off by the repeal of the law while the vessel was at sea.

Mr. HOAR. The Committee on Claims, I take the liberty of saying in the absence of the chairman, has a very large docket. It is impossible at any one session to dispose of the cases that have come there. That committee meets once a week, at 10 o'clock in the morning, and is in session two hours, and very frequently runs into the sessions of the Senate. Besides that, it has had several extra meetings on days when the Senate was not in session; and it is impossible to clear the docket. If the Committee on Commerce will take the bill in charge, I shall have no objection.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce. The original law was reported by that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CHURCH AT CHATTANOOGA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill from the House of Representatives will be read twice by its title and placed on the Calendar, a similar bill having been reported from the Committee on Claims of the Senate.

The bill (H. R. 1073) for the relief of the Roman Catholic Church of St. Peter and St. Paul, at Chattanooga, Tenn., was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has examined the Senate bill and finds it identical with the one whose title has just been read. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, received from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. 204) granting a pension to Frederick C. Shaw;

A bill (H. R. 2120) granting a pension to Elizabeth Evans;

A bill (H. R. 2139) granting a pension to George Rhody;

A bill (H. R. 2908) to increase the pension of W. B. Stokes;

A bill (H. R. 4038) granting a pension to Victoria, Gertrude, Margaret, and Helen, minor children of Lieut. George R. McGuire;

A bill (H. R. 4039) granting a pension to Mary Pfeiffer;

A bill (H. R. 4575) granting a pension to Michael Hargain;

A bill (H. R. 5446) granting a pension to William H. Dowdall;

A bill (H. R. 5525) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane Potts;

A bill (H. R. 6001) granting a pension to Sarah J. Fraily;

A bill (H. R. 6344) granting a pension to William J. Toncray, of Tennessee;

A bill (H. R. 6501) to grant a pension to Joseph F. Garrett;
A bill (H. R. 8494) granting a pension to Gilbert Reed;
A bill (H. R. 8534) granting a pension to Jacob Copes;
A bill (H. R. 8545) for the relief of Samuel Purcell;
A bill (H. R. 8889) granting a pension to Charles Molseed;
A bill (H. R. 9253) granting an increase of pension to Richard Hogan;
A bill (H. R. 9341) granting a pension to Mrs. Dulcenor Noel;
A bill (H. R. 9372) granting a pension to John Dean;
A bill (H. R. 9653) granting a pension to Henry Alward, dependent father of Henry M. Alward;
A bill (H. R. 9684) granting a pension to William J. Brown;
A bill (H. R. 9719) for the relief of Thomas Shackelford;
A bill (H. R. 10017) granting a pension to Samuel Anderson;
A bill (H. R. 10275) granting a pension to Joseph Hunter, M. D.;
A bill (H. R. 10356) granting a pension to John T. Vincent;
A bill (H. R. 10418) granting a pension to Hannah L. Irwin;
A bill (H. R. 10525) to increase the pension of Edward Jardine;
A bill (H. R. 10705) granting a pension to Mary L. Tanner;
A bill (H. R. 10789) granting a pension to Philip Neuman;
A bill (H. R. 10906) granting a pension to Fidel Gates; and
A bill (H. R. 10954) for the relief of Mary Ann Reid.

The bill (H. R. 10735) for the removal of the political disabilities of Theodore Lewis, of Louisiana, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (H. R. 1029) for the relief of J. S. Flake, guardian of Samuel Howard;
A bill (H. R. 2661) for the relief of James Caler;
A bill (H. R. 6347) for the relief of Alexander Moffitt;
A bill (H. R. 9464) for the relief of Hudson G. Lamkin; and
A bill (H. R. 11007) for the relief of the Catholic Church at Macon, Mo.

The bill (H. R. 1067) to amend the war record of Alfred H. Thomas, deceased, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WILLIAM KELSEY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2106) granting a pension to William Kelsey, which was, at the end of line 5, to add:

And pay him a pension of $14 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Kelsey, late of Company G, Sixth Regiment Kansas Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension of $14 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

Mr. SAWYER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented a petition of Matthew Gray Post, No. 93, Grand Army of the Republic, of Ida Grove, Department of Iowa, praying for the passage of the per diem rated service-pension bill; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GEORGE presented the petition of Philip Goble, of Jasper County, Mississippi, praying to be allowed a pension on account of services rendered in the Mexican war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. Lucy A. Grant, widow of Capt. John Grant, late a citizen of Louisiana, praying for certain relief; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TURPIE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3417) granting a pension to George E. Fernald, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3335) granting a pension to Thompson D. Hatfield, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 834) for the relief of the heirs of John H. Newman, deceased, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3338) granting an increase of pension to Joseph D. Hill, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 3422) granting a pension to Kate C. Van Arnum; and A bill (S. 3421) granting a pension to Mary B. McVean.

Mr. PADDOCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3208) granting a pension to William S. Bradshaw, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 889) granting a pension to Ishmael Jones, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8697) to increase the pension of Martin McLaughlin, a survivor of the Mexican war, and late a private in Company D, Third United States Infantry, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MARTINSBURGH, W. VA.

Mr. DANIEL. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3432) for the erection of a public building at Martinsburgh, W. Va., to report it without amendment.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate consider the bill at this time. I expect to leave the city and I do not know when I shall be back.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. FAULKNER. There is one amendment which I venture to suggest. In line 25 I move to strike out the word "toward," so as to limit it beyond question to the amount appropriated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 25, before the words "the construction," it is proposed to strike out the word "toward;" so as to read:

And the sum of $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to be used and expended in the purchase of said site and the construction of said building.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMITTEE ON INDIAN TRADERS.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. CHANDLER July 16, 1888, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on Indian Traders be authorized to continue during the recess of Congress the investigations directed by the resolutions of the Senate of June 3, 1886, December 20, 1887, and March 5, 1888, with the authority and in the manner and to the extent provided in said resolutions, and also, if it is deemed necessary, to visit as a full committee, or by such subcommittee as may be appointed by the chairman thereof, the Chippewa Indian reservations mentioned in said resolution of March 5, 1888, and said committee shall have power to employ a clerk and messenger during said recess; and the necessary expenses of such investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PADDOCK introduced a bill (S. 3436) to provide for the refunding of certain sums to the purchasers of lands in the late reservation of the confederated Otoe and Missouria tribes of Indians in the States of Nebraska and Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 3437) granting a pension to Sarah B. Pool; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STEWART introduced a bill (S. 3438) to refund illegal internal-revenue tax collected of the late Alexander W. Baldwin, as United States district judge for the district of Nevada; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3439) authorizing the Secretary of War to ascertain the amount of money which has been expended and the obligations assumed by the State of California, growing out of Indian hostilities therein and upon the borders thereof, not heretofore reimbursed by the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. STEWART. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and that 200 copies of the accompanying papers connected with it be printed for the use of the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN introduced a bill (S. 3440) to define trusts and to provide for the punishment of persons connected with them or carrying them on; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. BECK. Let that bill be read in full.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read the second time at length, if there be no objection.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a trust is the combination of capital or skill by two or more persons for the following purposes:

First. To create or carry out restrictions on trade.

Second. To limit, to reduce, or to increase the production or prices of merchandise or commodities.

Third. To prevent competition in the manufacture, making, sale, or purchase of merchandise or commodities.

Fourth. To create a monopoly.

SEC. 2. That any person who may be or may become a member of any such trust, or who may be or may become engaged in the business of any such trust in any trade or business carried on with foreign countries, or between the States, or between any State or Territory and the District of Columbia, or between the District of Columbia and any Territory, or between the United States and the waters adjacent to any foreign country, shall be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof in any district or circuit court of the United States after indictment shall be fined in a sum of not more than $10,000 nor less than $1,000, and may be imprisoned in the penitentiary for a period of not more than five years and not less than one year.

SEC. 3. That the purchase by any trust, or by the agent of any trust, of merchandise or commodities in a foreign country for sale in this country; or the manufacture, making, or purchase of any merchandise or commodity in this country for sale in a foreign country; or the manufacture, making, or purchase of any merchandise or commodity in one State for sale in another; or in any State or Territory for sale in the District of Columbia; or in the District of Columbia for sale in any State or Territory; or in any Territory for sale in any other Territory or in any State or in the District of Columbia, shall constitute a violation of this act, and shall subject the offender to the aforesaid penalties.

Mr. SHERMAN. To what committee is it proposed to refer the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BECK. It should go to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN. Upon the question of reference I desire to say something.

Mr. REAGAN. I had marked it to go to the Committee on the Judiciary, but it is immaterial to me whether it goes to that committee or the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance is already in charge of that subject. It has been instructed by the Senate to inquire into and report whether there is any remedy for trusts, combinations, etc.

Mr. REAGAN. Very well; I have no objection then. If the Committee on Finance has the subject before it the bill may go to that committee.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say that the Committee on Finance has got its hands very full just now, and is likely to have until the end of the session. I do not believe the Committee on Finance can look into this question any further, and the bill ought to go either to the Committee on Commerce or the Committee on the Judiciary on that account.

Mr. REAGAN. I indicated the reference to the Committee on the Judiciary because the bill involves an exceedingly interesting and important question of law, and I supposed that that committee perhaps had better have the consideration of it. But if the Senator from Ohio prefers that it should go to the Committee on Finance, or prefers it should go to any other committee, it will be agreeable to me.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to say that the Committee on Finance has already been charged with the consideration of this subject. I have myself given some attention to it, to see how far it is within the constitutional power of Congress to prohibit trusts and combinations in restraint of trade. It is very clear there is no such power unless it is derived from the power of levying taxes; that it is a power which must be exercised by each State for itself. Similar laws have been passed in England and in other countries. Indeed, in Blackstone's Commentaries there are declarations and denunciations of trusts, monopolies, etc., as strong as can be written in the English language. Whether such legislation can be ingrafted in our peculiar system of government by the national authority, there is some doubt. If it can be done at all, it must be done upon a tariff bill or upon a revenue bill. I do not see in what other way it can be done.

My impression is that in any bill reported to the Senate in respect to the collection of the revenue there will be provisions offered seeking, if possible, to prevent the evils which unquestionably grow out of these combinations and trusts, especially by corporations. The difficulty, however, is that many of these combinations and trusts, some of the most dangerous of them, like the Standard Oil Company, grow out of matters as to which there is no tax, and where they do not grow out of the revenue laws. Whether in such cases we can reach the combinations and trusts, which affect every citizen of the United States, I do not know; but it is certain that where these combinations grow out of revenue laws, as the sugar trust, which is one of the most dangerous and wrongful trusts ever organized in this country, the trust can certainly be reached by the operation of our revenue laws.

Perhaps it is the best way to let this matter go where the Senate have already sent it—to the Committee on Finance—and if the provisions reported by that committee should not be deemed wise, or if it is thought better to take the opinion of the Judiciary Committee upon their constitutionality or efficiency, then I should have no objection to having the subject go there. But, as a matter of course, legislation upon the subject of trusts and combinations in trade will naturally grow out of our revenue laws, and if it does not grow out of our revenue laws, it is not within the power of Congress to deal with it.

Mr. REAGAN. This bill was framed with a view—whether it has been successful in accomplishing that purpose or not—of avoiding the constitutional difficulty of assuming to legislate upon matters within State jurisdiction; and that question arises, as well as the difficulty of defining what a trust is, and providing proper penalties. I have indicated the reason why I had mentioned its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary, but I am willing to leave it to the Senate to make whatever reference it chooses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the right of a Senator introducing a bill to move its reference to any committee he may prefer, but if no motion is made the Chair will then exercise his own judgment in referring the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to hear the last section of the bill read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again read.

Mr. PLATT. The whole bill may as well be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be again read at length.

The Chief Clerk again read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Texas to withdraw his motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator from Ohio, I believe, has moved to refer it to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Ohio to refer the bill to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. RANSOM. I have no objection whatever to the bill being referred to the Committee on Finance, but I will venture to make a suggestion to the Senator from Ohio, if he will permit me.

That Senator intimates that if this power is to be derived at all, it is to be derived from the authority of Congress to lay and collect taxes.

Mr. SHERMAN. And to regulate commerce.

Mr. RANSOM. It strikes me, with great deference to the Senator from Ohio, that the best source of this power, if found at all, and I think it can be found, is in the power of Congress to regulate commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN. I always take the revenue laws as commercial laws. They always go together, interchangeably. But this very subject was embraced by a resolution offered by me, which was referred to the Committee on Finance, under which that committee was instructed to inquire into the subject and consider it.

Mr. RANSOM. As that committee has it in charge I agree with the Senator from Ohio in thinking that it had best continue to consider it, although it properly belongs to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance, if there be no objection.

Mr. REAGAN introduced a bill (S. 3441) to regulate commanders and crews of certain merchant, fishing, and whaling vessels; which was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after three months from the passage of this act the officers and at least three-fourths of the crews of any merchant vessel belonging to citizens of the United States engaged in the transportation of merchandise or passengers, or both, to or from any foreign country, or between the States; and all fishing vessels owned by citizens of the United States and engaged in fishing in waters outside of the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, and all whaling vessels belonging to citizens of the United States and pursuing their vocation in waters outside of the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, shall be either native-born or naturalized citizens of the United States: Provided, That this act shall only apply to whaling vessels which leave the ports of the United States after its passage.

SEC. 2. That the owner or owners of any such vessel, or their agent or agents, and the commanders or masters of such vessel, found guilty after indictment in any district or circuit court of the United States of a violation of this act, shall be fined in a sum not less than $1,000, nor more than $5,000 and may, at the discretion of the court, be imprisoned in the penitentiary for a term not exceeding two years.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 3442) for the relief of E. R. Shipley; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE (for Mr. PALMER) introduced a bill (S. 3443) increasing the pension of John Winchell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, introduced a bill (S. 3444) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Fort Smith and Choctaw Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the Poteau River, in the Choctaw Nation, near Fort Smith, Ark.;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 3445) to declare unlawful trusts and combinations in restraint of trade and production; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 3446) granting to the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company certain tracts of land upon the Umatilla Indian reservation for station and railroad purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO THE GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. GORMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL-BANK DEPOSITS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to furnish the Senate a statement of the amount deposited with each national banking association holding public money on the 1st day of August, 1888, and the amount and description of United States bonds and other securities pledged for the repayment of such deposits.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be printed so that we can look at it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over under the rule and be printed.

PENSIONS TO ARMY NURSES.

Mr. BLAIR. If the morning business is through I wish to ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the army nurses bill. I should like to dispose of that measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business?

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business that order is closed, and the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The first bill on the Calendar will be stated, and the Chair will then recognize the Senator from New Hampshire.

The CHIEF CLERK. Order of Business 1906, a bill (S. 1917) for the relief of John R. Reynolds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill being in order, the Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 273, a bill (S. 373) for the relief of women enrolled as army nurses.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the fisheries treaty in open executive session.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] had the floor yesterday evening, and he is not in the Chamber as yet. I suggest that the Senator from Maine postpone his motion for awhile, until the Senator from Mississippi comes in.

Mr. FRYE. I shall not press the motion just now.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire unanimous consent to make a statement in reference to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate can only proceed by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BLAIR. The Army nurses' bill came before the Senate for discussion a long while since, and upon the objection of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], who wished to obtain some data regarding it, it was laid aside informally or without prejudice. Subsequent to that time an amendment as a substitute for the bill was prepared, which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] examined carefully, and in fact brought to me, saying that he approved of it. I do not imagine if that should be proposed as a substitute for the original bill, there would be any occasion for discussion or dissatisfaction or delay. I am anxious that the bill shall go to the other House. It is an important bill, and I do not think it will take any time. I therefore ask that it may be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon an examination of the RECORD the Chair finds that the bill was passed over without prejudice. Under the uniform practice of the Senate, the Senator from New Hampshire is, therefore, entitled to ask for its consideration without the submission of a motion, which the Chair thought was necessary.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator speaks of a substitute. Has that ever been printed?

Mr. BLAIR. No; it was brought to me by the Senator from Indiana. I have it here. It may be read for information.

Mr. COCKRELL. I shall object to the consideration of the bill this morning, so that I may have further time. I did not know it would be called up to-day, and there are some statistics I wish to get so that I can present them to the Senate. I ask that the amendment be printed, so that we may see what it is.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that he offer the amendment now as an amendment and let it be printed as such, so that it will be on our desks and we can see it.

Mr. BLAIR. I will do so. I have no anxiety to press the bill unduly.

Mr. COCKRELL. The amendment may meet the very objections I have to the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly. I offer the amendment by way of a substitute for the bill, and ask that it be printed, and that being done I shall not press the bill further at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert. Does the Senator desire to have it read or printed without being read?

Mr. HARRIS. Let it be printed as an amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD, and also printed in the ordinary form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection, and the bill will then be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. HARRIS. The amendment will be printed in the ordinary form?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And in the RECORD also, the Senator from New Hampshire asks.

Mr. HARRIS. There is no objection to that.

The proposed amendment is as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That all women who volunteered or were registered in the United States service under medical authority as army nurses or hospital agents during the late war of the rebellion, and who rendered six months' service in the hospitals or on the battle-fields, or who prior to the completion of the period named were disabled in said service, and honorably discharged by reason of such disability, or on showing present necessity, upon making proof of service rendered, from surgeons or others having personal knowledge of the same, which may be verified as far as possible by any records on file in the War Department according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, shall be placed upon the pension-roll, and entited to $25 per month during life, such pensions to commence from the passage of this act: Provided, That persons who are now receiving pensions under special enactment, or under general laws, who are entitled to the benefits of this act may, by making application to the Commissioner of Pensions, as herein provided, receive the above sum, in addition to their present pension, as an increase.

SEC. 2. That any agent, attorney, or other person instrumental in prosecuting any claim under this act who shall, directly or indirectly, contract for, demand, receive, or retain for his services or instrumentality in presenting and prosecuting such claim, a sum greater than $10 (payable only upon the order of the Commissioner of Pensions by the pension agent making payment to claimant of the pension allowed) shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall for every such offense be fined not exceeding $500, or imprisonment at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 3. That all laws and parts of laws which conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

ANDREW R. G. SMITH.

Mr. HALE. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the bill (H. R. 5156) for the relief of Andrew R. G. Smith. It will give rise to no debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill 1917 being in order under Rule VIII, the Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that it may be laid aside for the purpose of enabling him to ask for the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that if we go to the Calendar for two hours we shall certainly reach that case this morning.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will allow me to say that I am obliged to spend my time in the room of the Committee on Appropriations. I got off for about five minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5156) for the relief of Andrew R. G. Smith?

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of War to cause an office-muster to be made in the case of Andrew R. G. Smith, late hospital steward of the Second Regiment of Maine Cavalry Volunteers, so that he shall thereby rank as assistant surgeon of the regiment from the 1st of December, 1865, the date of the issuing of his commission by the governor of Maine, he having performed the duties of assistant surgeon from the 1st of December, 1865, until the 6th of December, 1865, the date of the muster-out of the regiment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RETIREMENT OF NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. HALE. I should like to have the Senate take up the bill (S. 870) to provide for the retirement of a certain class of officers in the United States Navy.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a general bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to that.

Mr. HOAR. Let the bill be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri objects to the present consideration of the bill. Shall it retain its place on the Calendar or go over under Rule IX?

Mr. HALE. I should like to have it retain its place.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to the bill retaining its place.

Mr. HALE. I shall not take the time of the Senate now in explaining it. It is not a general bill, although it appears so in form. I shall call it up at some other time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will retain its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII.

YANKTON RESERVATION.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 7547) granting the right of way to the Yankton and Missouri River Railway through the Yankton reservation in Dakota. It is a bill which will not bring out any debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the bill been previously called and passed over without prejudice?

Mr. TELLER. It has not. The Committee on Indian Affairs report an amendment in the nature of a substitute to the House bill, and the amendment consists of the very bill the Senate passed some time since.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Yankton and Missouri Valley Railway Company, a corporation duly organized under the laws of the Territory of Dakota, its successors or assigns, are hereby invested and empowered with the right of locating, constructing, owning, equipping, operating, using, and maintaining a railway, telegraph, and telephone line through the Yankton Indian reservation in said Territory, beginning at any point to be selected by said railway company on the east line of said reservation between the northeast corner thereof and a point 1 mile south of the junction of the west fork of Choteau Creek with the east fork thereof, and running thence westerly or northwesterly through said reservation, but at no point farther than 15 miles to the south of the northerly boundary thereof: Provided, That if said right of way be so located as to begin on the eastern boundary of said reservation at any point south of said 15-mile limit, it shall run thence northwesterly so as to come within said 15-mile limit at some point not more than 10 miles westward from the eastern line of said reservation.

SEC. 2. That said corporation is authorized to take and use for all purposes of a railway, and for no other purpose, a right of way 100 feet in width through said reservation, and to take and use a strip of land 200 feet in width, with a length of 3,000 feet, in addition to right of way, for stations, for every 10 miles of road, with the right to use such additional ground where there are heavy cuts or fills as may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of the road-bed, not exceeding 100 feet in width on each side of said right of way, or as much thereof as may be included in said cut or fill: Provided, That no more than said addition of land shall be taken for any one station: Provided further, That no part of the lands herein authorized to be taken shall be leased or sold by the company, its successors or assigns, and they shall not be used except in such manner and for such purposes only as shall be necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railroad, telegraph, and telephone lines; and when any portion thereof shall cease to be so used, such portion shall revert to the Indians of said reservation, or, in case they shall have ceased to occupy the same, to the United States: And provided further, That before any such lands shall be taken for the purposes aforesaid the consent of the Indians thereto shall be obtained in a manner satisfactory to the President of the United States.

SEC. 3. That before said railway shall be constructed through any lands held by individual occupants according to the laws, customs, and usages of any of the said Indians, full compensation shall be made to such occupants for all property to be taken or damage done by reason of the construction of such railway; the amount of such compensation to be ascertained and determined in such manner as the Secretary of the Interfor may direct, and to be subject to his final approval.

SEC. 4. That said railroad company shall not charge the inhabitants of said Territory a greater rate of freight than the rate authorized by the laws of the Territory of Dakota for services or transportation of the same kind: Provided, That passenger rates on said railway shall not exceed 3 cents per mile. Congress hereby reserves the right to regulate the charges for freight and passengers on said railway, and messages on said telegraph and telephone lines, until a State government or governments shall exist in said Territory within the limits of which said railway, or a part thereof, shall be located; and then such State government or governments shall be authorized to fix and regulate the cost of transportation of persons and freights within their respective limits by said railway; but Congress expressly reserves the right to fix and regulate at all times the cost of such transportation by said railway or said company whenever such transportation shall extend from one State into another, or shall extend into more than one State: Provided, however, That the rate of such transportation of passengers, local or interstate, shall not exceed the rate above expressed: And provided further, That said railway company shall carry the mail at such prices as Congress may by law provide; and until such rate is fixed by law the Postmaster-General may fix the rate of compensation.

SEC. 5. That said railway company shall pay to the Secretary of the Interior, for the benefit of the Indians of said reservation, the sum of $50, in addition to compensation provided for in this act for property taken and damages done to individual occupants by the construction of a railway, for each mile of railway that it may construct in said reservation, said payments to be made in installments of $500 as each 10 miles of road is graded: Provided, That if the said Indians, through the United States Indian agent in charge of said Indians on said reservation shall, within four months after the filing of maps of definite location as set forth in section 6 of this act, dissent from the allowances provided for in this section, and shall certify the same to the Secretary of the Interior, then all compensation to be paid under the provisions of this act shall be determined as provided in section 3 for the determination of the compensation to be paid to the individual occupant of lands, with the right of appeal to the courts upon the same terms, conditions, and requirements as therein provided: Provided further, That the amount awarded or adjudged to be paid by said railway company shall be in lieu of the compensation that said Indians would be entitled to receive under the foregoing provision. Said company shall also pay, so long as that part of said reservation through which said right of way may be located is owned and occupied by the Indians, to the Secretary of the Interior, the sum of $15 per annum for each mile of railway it shall construct in the said reservation. The money paid to the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of this act shall be expended by him, in accordance with the laws and treaties now in force, for the benefit of said Indians or be paid to them as to him shall seem best: Provided, That Congress shall have the right, so long as said lands are occupied and possessed by said Indians, to impose such additional taxes upon said railroad as it may deem just and proper for their benefit; and any State hereafter formed through which said railway shall have been established may exercise the like power as to such part of said railway as may lie within its limits. Said railway company shall have the right to survey and locate its railway immediately after the passage of this act.

SEC. 6. That said company shall cause maps showing the route of its located line through and station grounds upon said Indian reservation to be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and that said location shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior before any grading or construction on any section or part of said located line shall be begun: Provided, That said railway shall be located, constructed, and operated with a due regard for the rights of the Indians, and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe.

SEC. 7. That the officers, servants, and employés of said company necessary to the construction and management of said road shall be allowed to reside, while so engaged, upon such right of way, but subject to the provisions of the Indian intercourse laws, and such rules and regulations as may be established by the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with said intercourse laws.

SEC. 8. That said railway shall be built through said reservation within four years after the passage of this act, or the rights herein granted shall be forfeited as to that portion not built; and that said railway company shall fence and keep fenced all such portions of its road as may run through any improved lands of the Indians, and also shall construct and maintain continually all road and highway crossings and necessary bridges over said railway wherever said roads and highways do now or may hereafter cross said railway's right of way, or may be by the proper authorities laid out across the same.

SEC. 9. That the said company shall accept this right of way upon the express condition, binding upon itself, its successors, and assigns, that they will neither aid, advise, nor assist in any efforts looking towards the changing or extinguishing the present tenure of the Indians in their land, and will not attempt to secure from the Indians any further grant of land, or its occupancy, than is hereinbefore provided: Provided, That any violation of the condition mentioned in this section shall operate as a forfeiture of all the rights and privileges of said railway company under this act.

SEC. 10. That all mortgages executed by said railway company conveying any portion of its railroad, with its franchises, that may be constructed in said reservation, shall be recorded in the Department of the Interior, and the record thereof shall be evidence and notice of their execution, and shall convey all rights and property of said company as therein expressed.

SEC. 11. That Congress may at any time amend, add to, alter, or repeal this act, and the right of way herein and hereby granted shall not be assigned or transferred in any form whatever prior to the construction and completion of the road, except mortgages or other liens that may be given or secured thereon to aid in the construction thereof.

SEC. 12. That said railway company shall execute a bond to the United States, to be filed and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, in the penal sum of $10,000, for the use and benefit of the Indians of said reservation, conditioned for the due payment of any and all damages which may accrue by reason of the killing or maiming of any Indian belonging to said reservation, or of their live-stock, in the construction or operation of said railway, or by reason of fires originating thereby; the damages in all cases, in the event of failure by the railway company to effect an amicable settlement with the parties in interest, to be recovered in any court of the Territory of Dakota having jurisdiction of the amount claimed, upon suit or action instituted by the proper United States attorney in the name of the United States: Provided, That all moneys so recovered by the United States attorney under the provisions of this section shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States, to be placed to the credit of the particular Indian or Indians entitled to the same, and to be paid to him or them, or otherwise expended for his or their benefit, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "An act granting the right of way to the Yankton and Missouri Valley Railway through the Yankton reservation in Dakota."

Mr. TELLER. I move that the Senate insist on its amendment and ask a conference with the House of Representatives thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. DAWES, Mr. PLATT, and Mr. JONES of Arkansas were appointed.

BUILDING OF CUTTER THOMAS CORWIN.

Mr. MITCHELL. Some time since a conference was appointed on the bill (H. R. 1761) for the relief of the First National Bank of Portland, Oregon, for money advanced the Oregon Iron Works, the contractor in building the United States revenue-cutter Thomas Corwin. The conferees on the part of the Senate were the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON], and myself. The Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Maryland are absent and probably will be for some time. I ask unanimous consent that the vacancies may be filled.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Chair will appoint two managers of the conference on the part of the Senate in place of those who are unavoidably detained and unable to act.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that the Senator from Maryland is present. I have seen him in the Chamber this morning. He was absent yesterday, but he is here to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then I ask to have one change made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection; and the Chair announces as a manager of the conference on the part of the Senate, in place of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] who is unavoidably detained from the Senate, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. 10050) to amend section 216 of the Revised Statutes with reference to the District of Columbia; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 2524) for the relief of Clement A. Lounsberry;

A bill (H. R. 2592) for the relief of Andrew Gleeson;

A bill (H. R. 2611) for the relief of Joseph W. McClurg;

A bill (H. R. 3329) to regulate the subdivision of land within the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 3859) for the relief of Sone and Fleming Manufacturing Company, Limited, of the city of New York;

A bill (H. R. 5222) for the relief of A. M. Anderson and others;

A bill (H. R. 5494) for the relief of John T. Robeson;

A bill (H. R. 5539) for the relief of John J. Coughlin;

A bill (H. R. 6491) for the relief of Lowman & Co.; and

A bill (H. R. 8956) for the relief of S. B. West, administrator of Thomas Becton, deceased.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

An act (S. 2700) granting increase of pension to Allen Blethen; and Joint resolution (S. R. 37) providing for the printing of a supplement to Wharton's Digest of International Law.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FRYE. I renew my motion.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the Senator from Maine to yield to me a moment that I may ask the Senate to take up House bill 2190, Order of Business 1940, granting a pension to Jane Smallridge. It is a pension bill, granting a pension to an old lady who is now liable to pass away.

Mr. BERRY. I shall have to object to anything except the Calendar. There is a bill for which I have been waiting for three or four days, the second number that is on the Calendar, and if we are to have bills considered I insist on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar is in order under Rule VIII until 1 o'clock.

Mr. FRYE. I have moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the fisheries treaty in open executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate do now proceed in open executive session to the consideration of the fisheries treaty. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes have it.

A division was called for.

Mr. SHERMAN. We had better have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN].

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. I do not know how he would vote on this question. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA], but I have transferred the pair to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER], and vote "yea."

Mr. TURPIE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. VANCE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa (when his name was called). I see the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON] is not here. I am paired with him, and therefore will not vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. I announce the pair of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN], who, I think, has left the city, with the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

Mr. MORGAN (after having voted in the negative). The Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], I believe, is not in the Chamber. I am paired with him, and withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama withdraws his vote.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand from the Senator from Kentucky that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] is absent, and I will transfer my pair to him and let my vote stand.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] having come in and voted, I now vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. ALLISON. I inquire whether the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He is not recorded.

Mr. ALLISON. I have a general pair with him, and therefore refrain from voting.

Mr. PADDOCK. My colleague [Mr. MANDERSON] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. EVARTS. If the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has not voted——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has transferred his pair and voted. The Senator from New York is at liberty to vote.

Mr. EVARTS. I vote "yea."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks there is a misunderstanding about the vote of the Senator from New York. The Chair understood the Senator from Alabama to say that the pair he had had with the Senator from New York was transferred to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES]. Is that correct?

Mr. MORGAN. That is correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Senator from New York should be announced as being paired with the Senator from Indiana who is absent [Mr. VOORHEES].

Mr. EVARTS. If my pair is transferred, I withdraw my vote of course.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Hiscock,	Sabin,
Blair,	Edmunds,	Hoar,	Sawyer,
Chace,	Farwell,	Ingalls,	Sherman,

Cameron,	Manderson,	Spooner,	Wilson of Md.

So the motion was agreed to.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now in open executive session. If there be no objection, the reading of the Journal of the last open executive session will be dispensed with. The Executive Clerk will report the treaty by title.

The EXECUTIVE CLERK. Treaty between the United States and Great Britain concerning the interpretation of the convention of October 20, 1818, signed at Washington February 15, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to postpone the further consideration of this treaty until the Wednesday after the first Monday in December next. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am advised that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] had the floor. If the Senate is ready to vote I am willing to take the vote by yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not desire to occupy the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, yesterday afternoon the debate on this motion to postpone this treaty seemed to have taken a good deal of the temper of the times, and seemed to have found the consideration of this subject in an atmosphere that was uncongenial to deliberate consideration of the very grave questions involved in it. It has been my purpose all the time to try to get the consideration of this treaty under such conditions or under such circumstances as that the American people would be satisfied that we had passed a quiet, judicial opinion upon it, not influenced by the pressure and heat of party politics.

I have apprehended for some time that I should not be able to accomplish this very desirable result, but I have determined that so far as I am concerned the fault of the failure to present what facts I am able to array before the Senate in support of this measure shall not be mine.

I have been a good deal criticised during the progress of this debate for having rather a serious view of this question and of its outcome in the future, and I confess that all of these criticisms make a very great impression upon me ordinarily. I am only the more confirmed in this instance by such matters, in the opinion that it is my duty as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations to try to get this question considered at a time when the Senate is more dispassionate than it is to-day, or has been since this debate began, and I am also still more impressed with the belief that the attitude in which the Government of the United States will be put at the conclusion of our proceedings upon this treaty will be one that will be very embarrassing and probably one of very great danger so far as the peace of the country is concerned, or at least so far as the quietness and proper progress of our commercial affairs is concerned in this country.

I believe that after this treaty has been rejected by the Senate we shall be abroad again upon this sea of turmoil which has so long agitated this country on this question; that we shall find renewed difficulties in our way, and that we shall find the American people hardly in a state of preparation to receive with composure what I conceive to be the necessary outcome of this action on our part.

I do not indulge in prophecy about it. It is very vain for any human being to indulge in prophetic forecasts about matters of this kind; but arguing from fact to conclusion, and arguing on the lines that our experience has justified for a great many years, and quoting in my own mind, as I do not expect to do to the Senate, however, those very anxious declarations that have been made by our most eminent statesmen from time to time when this controversy has been before the American people, I confess that I have very serious apprehensions as to what will then be our situation.

I propose to read from the RECORD the utterances that have fallen from the lips of Senators of denunciation of this treaty and of the persons who are engaged in an attempt to ratify it, as well as those who negotiated it, with a view to show to the country exactly what is the temper of mind in which we are now coming to a conclusion about this negotiation.

I do not fail to attribute this, Mr. President, to the heat of partisan politics. I believe just as much in the sincerity of the Senators on the other side as they can possibly believe in mine, and in their patriotism and in their wisdom. I know, however, that they do not give a man in my attitude credit for patriotism. Certainly some of them have been quite free to say that they do not give me any credit for wisdom; nevertheless, embarrassing as it must be for a Senator representing a sovereign State on this floor to take such thrusts put at him personally and at the State he represents and the society that he happens to have belonged to in past political affiliation, I must firmly perform my duty about it. I will try to do it openly and without reserve. I will do it sincerely and as patriotically as I know how. For if there is any country that I love better than this, I do not know where it is on the breadth of this great globe. If there are any people I more admire than the American people, I do not know who they are. If there are any institutions that are sounder and wiser than ours, I have not heard of them in history. I have an idea about the Constitution of this Government, this peculiar system of government under which we live, that leads me to have an affectionate regard for it above that of any institution that ever was devised by the wit of man.

I believe, what I fear many do not believe, that this Government was born in a revolution that was organized in the world eighteen hundred and eighty-eight years ago, and I believe the King that gave to us our liberties Himself sacrificed to the children of men His imperial power when He was surrounded by legions of angels for the purpose of establishing His authority among men as He chose, in either His temporal authority or His spiritual authority. I believe that revolution is the foundation of the system that we are practicing in the United States, and that it was the first declaration that was ever made by supreme authority of the right of a human being to participate in his own government and of his responsibility to human as well as divine authority for his conduct in that particular. I believe that there is laid upon our shoulders in this country by divine command, not the divine right of kings to rule and the duty of obedience to the possessor of a strain of blood that may come down to us through certain veins or certain loins, but the divinity of manhood with which we should be clothed and which we have put in force and are to continue to act out through the most successful examples that have ever been set to mankind in all the annals of government. That divinity is the right of a human being to participate in his own government and his responsibility to God and to man also for his political conduct. I believe a sin against the Government of the United States, willfully perpetrated by an American citizen who is conscious of the wrong at the time he does it, is a very high moral offense. I believe that the Constitution of the United States, as it is and as it will be after we have amended it better to conform to our future experience, places us under a moral obligation which is almost the coequal of any that could be mentioned in respect of any duty that is to reach away into the depths of an unknown futurity. I have that sort of reverence for this Government and for this Constitution which inspires me with the belief that when I serve, when I obey, and when I honor it, I am obedient at least to that extent to the divine authority that rules amongst nations and also amongst men.

So, while I make no boast of any peculiar patriotism, and while I am under a shadow, so far as the other side of this Chamber is concerned, to which they very frequently refer in respect to what they suppose to be my loyalty or my allegiance to the Constitution of the United States, I feel that I stand before this Senate to-day in the rectitude of an honest manhood, bound in conscience, in honor, and by my oath to the voluntary and free, yes, the cordial support of everything that belongs to the organic law of the United States of America; and I beg Senators, therefore, hereafter, when they wish to refer to me in the character of an ex-rebel and to my honorable associates also in that same category and undertake to reproach any work with which we may connect ourselves by reflections upon our persons or upon our history, that they will at least do us the credit to believe that our adhesion to the Constitution of the United States is not one of compulsion, but it is one of an honest allegiance yielded from honest hearts.

After this declaration on my part I shall hear with less of disagreeable emotion those taunts and flings that have been made at me and my colleagues here because in times past we were owners of slaves, because in the times past we found an occasion when our duty, as we believed it, to the Constitution of the United States required us to present our lives as a sacrifice to those principles, whether erroneously or whether correctly let them judge. Mr. President, we have treasured in our own bosoms the consciousness that what we did in those struggles was done under emotions of the very highest character, done in obedience to a sense of duty than which none ever yet was stronger or will ever rise higher in the heart of a human being.

I suppose that the President of the United States, when he submitted this negotiation to the Senators who surround me to-day, had the right to expect that his views, to which he committed himself by sending in with a recommendation this treaty, would be received and treated with ordinary decency and respect. It was due to his office that it should be so. It was due to the dignity of his office that it should be so, due to the dignity of the country that it should be so, due to the respect that we desire to have from the observing nations of the earth that it should be so. But I submit that no measure has ever yet been laid before the Senate of the United States which has received so much of imprecation, so much of abuse, so much that is unjustifiable in thought and utterance, as this treaty.

The President of the United States, coming to us for the purpose of assisting him in a negotiation—for I insist that that is the attitude of the affair, and the American people will so think also—coming to us to assist him in the negotiation as the constituted authorities in this country to advise him and to consent to an arrangement that he proposed to make with Great Britain, had the right to expect that we should enter into this negotiation in the same spirit that he did, with a view of benefiting the country, with a view of removing difficulties by which we are surrounded, and of distributing justice and equity amongst the people of the United States under this treaty, and that the history of our past negotiations on this subject, the principles by which our statesmen had been guided, and the results and conclusions to which they had arrived at different periods of time along the channel of our history, would all receive that mature and deliberate consideration which he gave to the subject, and that his negotiators gave to it when they were confronted face to face with the British negotiators and had to agree upon something, or else disagree entirely in respect of this very vexed and very important question.

But we have not received his message in that spirit. We have not acted upon it in that way. This treaty was very young in the Senate when it was found necessary to carry it into a party caucus and there receive a mandate which should influence the votes of Senators in its consideration, a mandate that reversed the action of this Senate absolutely in very important particulars, a mandate which prohibits me to-day from referring to certain letters of Edward Everett that I have now in my desk, which form a part of the correspondence connected with this treaty—a very important part of it—which shuts me out from the opportunity to do so, and notwithstanding my efforts to be authorized by the Senate to do so, my motion and my resolution that I should be permitted to read them in the open Senate lie on the table of the Committee on Foreign Relations, put there on the motion of the majority and by their votes.

I think it is a hideous gap, an unseemly disfiguration, in the pretended consistency of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber when they come in with a declaration, a resolution from a party caucus, that this treaty shall be considered in open session, and yet when we arrived at that part of the discussion, when two very important letters, written by Edward Everett to Mr. Calhoun, Secretary of State, when Mr. Everett was minister to England, were thought to be necessary to be presented to the people as well as to the Senate for the vindication of the present action of the President of the United States, it was found necessary by the majority to conceal those facts, and that a resolution to revive them should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and should by the vote of the majority of that committee be put upon the table. That is a hideous gap, a sad disfiguration of the assumed and pretended consistency of the majority of this body in their action on this matter of the open discussion of this treaty.

They say to the people of the United States in their resolution for an open session, "We intend to lay this whole subject before you," and yet when we come to facts which are in the secret archives of the Government of the United States that we are afraid to advise Great Britain about, facts stated and arguments made by Edward Everett, this same power that votes us into an open session refuses to let these facts come to the light! That, sir, is an inconsistency that will busy these Senators the balance of their natural lives to account for, and nothing could have forced them into such a disagreeable attitude as this but the pressure of a party caucus. This is not going to be forgotten. The people of the United States are not going to be trifled with in this way.

If we are to have an open argument of this treaty, let it be upon all the facts that bear upon it, and let those who are to judge of our positions here have all the light we are able to afford them, and not when we come to a place where we find that we are endangering our country by publishing facts that come from the pen of as great a man as Edward Everett, skulk behind the rules of the Senate and refuse to allow these unpublished letters to come to light. If we must ask the world to witness our senatorial diplomacy, let us not keep them ignorant of the facts.

Perhaps the Senator from Ohio will think that is "a moot question." It is not a mute question, as I observed the other day. It will speak trumpet-tongued to these people just as long as the archives of this Senate last. That course of conduct, sir, never would have been necessary, that step never would have been taken but for the pressure of a party caucus, that forced you, for the purpose of trying to get votes by stirring up strife in this country, by animadversions, heat, and party bitterness, and yet the very moment that you found that this party compulsion expressed through the voice of a caucus brought you into contact with facts that you did not dare disclose to the British Government, you drew into your shells, and prevented me from making any reference to them. I leave that part of the subject right there.

Now I propose to read what has been said by way of animadversion, not argument at all, upon this treaty, because I want to put it all together. I want the American people and the whole world to see the picture that has been drawn by Senators on that side of the Chamber of this treaty, of its supporters, of its negotiators, and then I want them to determine with impartial fairness whether or not the spirit that prompted those utterances was one of judicial consideration of a great subject like this, or whether they are irascible, ungovernable, ill-tempered views, of a sort that sometimes disgrace the hustings of the United States, I am sorry to say.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] on the 29th of May, 1888, said as follows:

If we had taken a manly course at that moment, if this great Republic of 60,000,000 people had simply stood on its rights then and there, there would have been peace, there would have been quiet, all the rights we were entitled to we should have been enjoying to-day; but Secretary Bayard could not permit it. He has an itching palm for diplomacy. It delights his very soul to be engaged in a diplomatic correspondence. He was profoundly ignorant of the fishery matter then, as could be proved without the slightest difficulty if I had the time to do it. I suppose he would admit it himself. There was a gentleman here, Sir Lionel West, the British minister, who was not ignorant, and he easily persuaded Secretary Bayard, honestly, too, so far as the Secretary was concerned, that it would be six months before Congress met, that it was right in the midst of a fishing season, that there would be conflict between the fishermen of the United States and of Canada, and very likely that might lead to a war with Great Britain, and he said, "What can I do? Anything you say," and he made a modus vivendi, clearly without any right to do it under the Constitution, which gave us the right for six months to fish in the British waters and them the right to fish in ours for the same length of time. But that was not the nub of the arrangement. It was this:

"And the President of the United States shall recommend to Congress the appointment of a commission to settle the fishery rights."

The President of the United States, in obedience to the behest of his Secretary of State, sent in his message to Congress the moment it met, recommending that Congress provide for a commission to settle fishery rights. I believe I then had the honor to offer another resolution that it was the sense of the United States Senate that we wanted no commission to settle fishery rights. I suppose the Senate then believed it had had enough of treaties; that the last one had given us sufficient not to desire another right away. That was sent to the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported unanimously, came back to the Senate, was discussed, deliberately acted upon, and unanimously passed, I believe.

I will comment upon that after awhile to show how utterly mistaken the honorable Senator was in his statement of what he stated before this body and the action of the Senate thereupon.

What was the result? There it is. The mountain labored; there is the mouse. I have to say about that treaty that it is the most disgraceful, humiliating, and cowardly surrender the American Republic has ever been called upon to submit to, not excepting the treaty of 1818.

* * * * * * *

Again, Mr. President, I declare that this treaty is a dishonorable, humiliating, and cowardly surrender.

* * * * * * *

Further, the Senator from Maine said:

I say once more that the treaty of 1871 gave Great Britain a market, having obtained it by her own outrages upon us as a people. The fishery part of the treaty was due to Canadian outrages, while the Alabama claims part came from England's own acts of injustice. That treaty endured for twelve years. But before going on with that I wish to go back a bit. I said we appointed a commission, and I will say a few words in relation to that. We had for a commissioner a weak old man, no more fit to cope in diplomacy with Sir John A. Macdonald than Secretary Bayard was with Joseph Chamberlain and Sir Charles Tupper.

Mr. MORGAN. Who appointed him?

Mr. FRYE. A Republican President. The umpire appointed was Mr. Delfosse, a Belgian, practically controlled by Great Britain, as she well knew when he was appointed. They went to Halifax, as these plenipotentiaries sat here. They investigated and found that we must pay Great Britain or Canada $5,500,000 as the balance in her favor under the treaty. Mr. Delfosse determined it. He was the umpire with the casting vote. We paid it, but after paying it, and within a very short time, asked Great Britain to let us abrogate that treaty, and she refused, though we had paid the $5,500,000 for the whole twelve years. She still had a very good bargain, and would not give it up.

What more? During the twelve years we remitted in duty to Canada over $6,000,000, making $11,500,000 we paid for that attempt at diplomacy. What did we gain from it? We, during the whole twelve years, captured in British waters about $700,000 worth of fish, and to catch them cost us $1,200,000. The last three years of the treaty there were not a dozen American fishermen in British waters fishing, notwithstanding we had a right to go where we pleased.

* * * * * * *

Sure enough, what would be said of Canada? And yet we have been compelled to make it an article in this treaty as a concession to the United States that when a poor fisherman driven by stress of weather to a Canadian port for repairs, with a mast or a spar blown away, part of her cargo thrown overboard in the storm and the rest liable to be destroyed by the weather, she can land the cargo and shall not be compelled to throw it away. Oh, that is valuable! I know the President congratulates his people that they have obtained this concession finally from Canada, and when I remember the poor Mollie Adams and her experience I think perhaps he may be right. But there is not a civilized nation on the face of this earth, and no Senator can name one, in which it is necessary to make that a treaty obligation. It is a disgrace to a nation to-day in the nineteenth century that such should be an obligation or a right under a treaty.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] on the 10th of July, 1888, said:

Mr. HOAR. I would suggest that Mr. WILLIAM P. FRYE, of Maine; Mr. W. H. Trescot, General WILLIAM COGSWELL, of Salem, Mass.; Fitz J. Babson, of Gloucester, or Mr. Charles Levi Woodbury would have saved us from the disgrace and humiliation of this treaty.

Three of those gentlemen, or two of them, very probably would have worked very hard, because they have been in the pay of the fisheries associations all the time as hired counsel.

One other matter I ought to advert to. The Committee on Foreign Relations very properly calls attention to the refusal by the President, under the advice of the Secretary of State, to communicate to the Senate confidentially the course of the negotiations and discussions, and the various propositions and arguments arising in the negotiation. The committee deems the refusal contrary to the constitutional relation between the President and the Senate, and the reverse of the continuous practice in such matters from the beginning of the Government until this time. The Secretary of State alleges as the reason for the refusal—

"That the negotiation is intrusted to the discretion of the Executive, and that it could not hopefully be entered on without the guaranty of mutual confidence between the agents."

He implies that his refusal is due to some confidential obligation to the British side of the conference. But Sir Charles Tupper, on the other hand, in his speech of May 10, expresses his "great surprise that the protocols as published did not give all the proposals made, and the counter-proposals and the replies on both sides."

So it is clear, Mr. President, that this concealment from the Senate of what took place there as preliminary to the treaty is solely of Mr. Bayard's own seeking, and is contrary to the expectation and to the desire of the British commissioners. The suggestion of the confidential character of this communication, and that it is essential in order that such proceedings might be hopefully entered upon, finds no support in the understanding of the other side. Something took place there which Sir Charles Tupper desired and expected to make known to Canada, and which the Administration desires and expects to conceal, not only from the American people, but from the Senate, to whom the Constitution commits the duty of advising in regard to the transaction.

Mr. FRYE. Right there will the Senator from Alabama kindly name the three gentlemen who he says are counsel for the fishermen?

Mr. MORGAN. As I have been informed, Mr. Trescot and Mr. Charles Levi Woodbury.

Mr. FRYE. I simply wanted to leave it without any imputation upon me.

Mr. MORGAN. Of course I never had such an idea or thought as that.

In regard to each of these, the Secretary of State seems to have dealt with the subject, I will not say in total ignorance, but in total disregard of the American position and the American rights.

He does not give me the benefit of the doubt, which the Senator from Maine was so kind to do. He was too weak or too ignorant, we are to infer, to understand what was going on.

He says, in his letter to gentlemen in Boston, that "the sole and difficult question to which the treaty relates is that of the fishery rights of one nation in the jurisdictional waters of another." This is the statement of the American case from the British point of view. Mr. Bayard's letter and the utterances of a few other supporters of the treaty are the first and only statements of this character ever heard on this side of the Atlantic south of the Canadian border since the continent was settled.

It was well that declaration was made before the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] had the floor yesterday, because he utterly destroyed it. Further on the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] says:

Now, what an unwise, blundering, timid, un-American diplomacy is that which, when one hundred and fifty American ships cry out to their Government for redress of vexatious treatment in British harbors, for denial of ordinary hospitalities, for oppressive use of legal authority, to turn wholly away from their injury and suffer Great Britain to discuss over again the interpretation of the treaty of 1818 as to fishing limits, and take down from her walls the rusty, disused weapons of seventy years ago and brandish them again in our faces! What statesmanship, what patriotism is it for President and Secretary and Democratic Senators to set themselves with one voice to arguing the British case!

Further on he says:

Our complaint of Mr. Cleveland is not that he negotiated, but that he refused to negotiate in regard to the American grievance. That he puts off to a more convenient season. He negotiates where we need no negotiation, and leaves our condition worse than he finds it. Our demand for redress which is a fit subject for negotiation, the gravity of which he has again and again admitted, he wholly ignores or postpones. He has done the things he ought not to have done, and has left undone the things he ought to have done.

Again he says:

The whole tone and temper of the negotiation is feeble, spiritless, ignoble, and timid.

* * * * * * *

The weakest Canadian official laughs in the face of an American complainant when he thinks of Grover Cleveland and Mr. Bayard.

Again he says:

But, Mr. President, I should fail to do justice to my own conviction if I did not say that I hold it ignominious to undertake to make terms for a change in our tariff laws in the face of the behavior of Canada to our fishermen, which the Administration knows was adopted to coerce us to that very action.

As if any change had ever been made or attempted in this treaty in our tariff laws. The Senator surely knows that nothing of the sort was done.

Again the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] says:

You will scarcely find a claim of the American opponents of this treaty that is not supported by the speeches of its friends in the Canadian Parliament. Sir Charles Tupper begins by appealing to that body not to press him unduly to show the great advantage of the treaty to Canada until the Senate has acted. The particulars in which he has specially outwitted Mr. Bayard he keeps for the present in his own breast.

He concludes with these remarks:

I confess that, much meditating on these things, I take little satisfaction when I think of Grover Cleveland. I do not like the policy which everywhere robs American citizenship of its glory. I do not like the methods of fraud and crime which have destroyed popular elections in so many Democratic States. I would have the box where the American freeman casts his ballot sacred as a sacramental vessel. I do not like this conspiracy between the old slaveholder and the English manufacturer, to strike down the wages of the American workman and the comforts of the American workman's home. I do not like your refusal to maintain the American Navy and to fortify and defend the American coast. And I like no better the present treaty. It leaves the American sailor to be bullied and insulted without redress, and abandons the American right to the fisheries, older than the nation itself, which the valor of our fathers won for us and the wisdom of our fathers preserved for us.

The real caption of his speech, Mr. President, comes in at the conclusion. That which gave color and tone and emphasis to every word in it is uttered in the last few clauses, and it is an amalgam of all the prejudices that the honorable Senator has been capable of nurturing up during now quite an extended life, and I suppose really that there is no man ever created by the hand of God who has more capacity for treasuring up prejudices in his heart than the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. They seem to burst out of him on all occasions like the waters from the foot of a mountain; they are perennial in their flow; they are almost universal in their scope; they seem to embrace everything except a little area of land around the Massachusetts Bay colony.

Very few of us can ever escape the raking, harrowing tongue of the Senator from Massachusetts; very few of us, and few of the institutions of the country; few of its habits and few of its manners. He even went so far in his speech as to speak of that "rum jug" in the South, which he never saw, of course, or heard of in the Northern States, where the man to whom the jug was handed would not bear the inhospitality of having anybody else measure out his drink for him, and the like. Of course, that institution of slavery down there, which became ours by having bought it from his ancestry; our institution of slavery which we paid for after his fathers had captured them in their native wilds in Africa or paid for them with New England rum; our institution of slavery which has christianized the slave to a degree that no negro race or family in this world have ever yet attained to; our institution of slavery which his fathers put into the Constitution of the United States with a guaranty of its protection and preservation absolutely; our institution of slavery which they broke up by war and by the sacrifice of thousands and tens of thousands, not of men only, but of women and children, and by the orphanage of whole multitudes and great communities; our institution of slavery comes in for the Senator's reprimand on all occasions. A man who happens to have the misfortune to have been born in the midst of it, though he might never have owned a slave at all, is identified by the ill will of that Senator with that institution of slavery as if he had been born to it, as part of his inheritance, or as if he had done as the Senator's ancestors did when they went abroad to Africa and captured the negroes there in their own homes, made merchandise of human flesh and fixed it in the loins of the captured negroes that he should breed slaves to inherit his misfortunes while the Constitution of the United States should stand.

We have learned to fortify ourselves to some extent against the cold, unfailing raspings of the Senator from Massachusetts; still, with his great ability, his keen wit, his immense learning, his fine taste in belles-lettres scholarship, except when he drops, like Silas Wegg, into poetry, and through poetry into doggerel sometimes in his speeches, we feel that he is capable on occasions when he desires to do so for some purpose of his own, to make us feel uncomfortable, and even to abash us at times in the advocacy and support of those things which we feel in conscience bound and honor compels us to support and advocate. But more recently he seems to have turned his attention a little from the South and Southern men and the ex-rebels and their negroes and the slaveholders upon Grover Cleveland. He seems to have an utter abhorrence of Grover Cleveland and Thomas F. Bayard. They seem to be in the way of his progress, still I do not think they are, either of them, occupying any highway upon which the Senator from Massachusetts is likely ever to journey.

Mr. President, I do not know any institution in this country against which the Senator from Massachusetts can more completely wear himself out than by buffeting Grover Cleveland. He is a massive and powerful man. He is firmly planted in the integrity of an honest heart and an honest manhood. He is immovable. And if the Senator from Massachusetts is fatally bent on political self-destruction he can not do a quicker work for himself than to dash against Grover Cleveland. So far he has made very little impression upon Mr. Cleveland, and I think in the outcome he will make still less. I need not defend this man. He is backed in this country by probably 6,000,000 votes; a man who received the first overture from a national convention of a unanimous nomination—I believe the very first. Of course he whipped in all these more than 6,000,000 of voters to his support. Of course every politician on the Democratic side in the United States was forced into Grover Cleveland's support. But what do you think of a man who can whip in 6,500,000 voting men? He must be a very powerful man if he can do that.

I should say if he could realize that unseemly, impolite, unjust hint that has been thrown out here—not hint, either, but statement—that he could take the Senators on this side and move them into line at his will and pleasure—if he could accomplish that much he would be considered a very strong man. When he can go into a national convention at St. Louis and command the support of every Democrat in the American Union by acclaim without anybody to oppose him, perhaps Senators on that side will find out that it requires something more than mere personal abuse or personal contempt to break Grover Cleveland down. The American people are not going to have this man dislodged from their just appreciation of his value merely because Senators who have realized terrible disappointments in their own aspirations see cause in this Senate to abuse him with unseemly and unjustifiable abuse.

The Senator from Massachusetts, after having gotten through with the other part of his discourse and the larger and heavier subjects, turned upon me and said:

The Senator from Alabama told us the other day how he thought the South would look at this business. He said, if I correctly understood him, that the masters of these fishing vessels were holders and importers of slaves.

How I could utter such a sentence, which is not found in print anywhere, so as to have made that impression on the mind of the Senator from Massachusetts is more than I can account for. It would be utterly idiotic and entirely void of veracity, and yet that honorable Senator in a speech that was prepared and printed two or three weeks before it was delivered in this body put that utterance in there about me. He said further:

He said the fishermen were a small per cent. of the population of the country. He said, too, as I understood him, that if the issue were presented to the people of the South whether we should have free fish or a war with England, they would prefer free fish.

Mr. President, that is a perversion. I never said a word nor hinted a word about what the people of the South thought of it. I spoke about the people of the American Union. The people of the South do not eat codfish. Do you not know that? I can empty a ten-acre field of Southern men and women by carrying a codfish into it. [Laughter.] They do not want them at all and have not any use for them. I am at a loss to know how the Senator from Massachusetts should have thought that I could have said such a thing as that about them.

He now says, in reply to the Senator from Maine, that what he said was this: "I admonished that side of the Chamber, and I respectfully do it again, that if you present to the people of the United States going to war with Great Britain against the question of letting in fish free of duty, you have a dangerous issue before you; that is all."

Dangerous in what respect? Only in the respect, of course, of losing your tariff on fish. That is sought to be perverted, and the Senator from Massachusetts goes on:

What an utterance is that! American vessels by the hundred seized, insulted, harassed, vexed, dishonored. The American flag hauled down from an American masthead. American mariners in foreign ports subjected to treatment which our Democratic Secretary declares is "outrageous," "brutal," "inhuman," "inhospitable." All this is done to bully us to put fish on our free-list, that the fishery marine and the naval strength of our rival may grow, and our fishing marine and naval nursery may dwindle and decay. And when the Senate of the United States is considering what to do about it the Senator from Alabama tells us these sailors of ours are few in number, and that "a question between putting fish on the free-list and war with Great Britain is a very dangerous issue." Are we China, that opium is to be forced into our markets at the point of British bayonets or the mouth of British cannon?

The solid South is represented in this body by 34 votes. They are all Democrats save one. His seat is soon to be filled by a Democratic successor.

Which one is that? The Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER]. I do not want to harrow up any unnecessary reminiscences in this body; but I think a Senator who holds his position as chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections by the vote of the Senator from Virginia had better be a little cautious about the ground he walks over if he wants the American people to preserve that high respect for him in which he has been so long held:

Of that thirty-four twenty-nine have inserted in the official catalogue of the Senate as their title to honorable remembrance a statement of distinguished service in an attempt to destroy their country and bring its proud flag in dishonor to the dust.

There it breaks out again. The Senator can not forget a war that cost him so much grief and so little blood.

They are fond of telling us that all that is changed now. They say that if the country shall ever be in peril again, if the flag shall be menaced anew, whether it be foreign levy or domestic malice, it shall find no readier or braver defenders than among the men who stood in arms against it. I, for one, have never questioned their sincerity. I do not question it now.

Why refer to it, then? What has that to do with this treaty? Is this treaty to be scandalized because twenty-nine Democrats on this side voted for it and a number of them were in the war? There was not one single respectable man that I know of in the Southern States of the age to perform military duty, whether he was an old-line Whig or an old-line Democrat, who did not take his heart in his hand and go right into that war, and the leading and most powerful men that we had in arms in the South belonged to the old Whig party, and my colleague [Mr. PUGH] there knows it perfectly. There was no man in the South who really had any influence or position there that did not go into that war—no man of talent or ability who did not; and he was not dragooned into it either by the pressure of public sentiment. If there ever was a sentiment amongst fifteen million people that was universal and without exception, it was that sentiment that we were standing in that war for our rights under the Constitution of the United States and for those guaranties that had been given to us by the most express and solemn sanctions contained in that instrument.

I know—

I know, as the people of the North know, that there was courage in the stout hearts which maintained that conflict for those four long years. I do not believe that the men of the noble Southern stock, who displayed, even when in the wrong, the courage, the affection for home and State, the aptness for command, the constancy, the capacity for great affection and generous emotion, the readiness to encounter poverty and death and exile, which won the admiration of mankind, when the flag of the country which has forgiven them and restored them and trusted them is insulted and dishonored, will be quite content to take their tone from the Secretary of State or the Senator from Alabama.

There is an attempt, a cold-blooded, deliberate attempt to put the Senator from Alabama in a non-representative position in regard to the Southern sentiment, and that too for something that he never said, and more than that, for something that he never thought of. A cause that has to be supported by finesse, misconstruction, misinterpretation, and misrepresentation like that, is a cause that is not worthy of the abilities of that great Senator. He proceeds:

There is no occasion for a note of war. Firmness and strength and calmness and dignity and understanding and maintaining our own just rights are much more likely to keep peace than the supplicating and yielding diplomacy of the present Administration.

Supplicating and yielding diplomacy! He will find out how that is presently and who has prayed and who has yielded and bought peace.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] said on the 16th of July:

The treaty is dishonoring to the nation in many points:

1. It is a national dishonor, because it has been negotiated after a series of wrongful seizures and other outrages perpetrated upon American fishing vessels for the very purpose of forcing upon us a disadvantageous bargain, and yet it does not include any acknowledgment of the wrongs done or provide reparation therefor. The long catalogue of unjustifiable assaults upon American rights has been often proclaimed to the world. The oppressions seem to have been purposely intended to be offensive to American honor. The flag of the Union has been hauled down on the deck of an American vessel by a British captain for the apparent purpose of degradation and insult.

The intent of Canada's whole course has been apparent from the beginning, to harass us into a new treaty of some sort. Therefore, no treaty should have been made as long as the outrages were continued, and the very first article of a treaty should have provided apology and ample reparation for the wrongs done. And yet no allusion to these occurrences is made in the treaty or in the President's accompanying letter; and the claims for damages for seizures and wrongs which were once valiantly presented are now at last left unadjusted and unnoticed. No independent nation should stoop to make a treaty under such circumstances and with such an omission.

If that had occurred to the Senator from New Hampshire when he was a member of the Presidential Cabinet during which these very evils and wrongs were perpetrated as flagrantly as they have been during Cleveland's administration, if that idea had occurred to him then in the plenitude of his patriotic love of country, I suppose that that Senator would have been in St. Elizabeth's by this time through the pressure upon his brain of the terrific neglect with which he had treated the great affairs of this American Union, for he and all his colleagues were as dumb as oysters about these things. The old offenses and the new, this long category, which I grant you has been unredressed through many varying administrations of the Government of the United States, this long category which has oftentimes been condoned by purchases of a very expensive nature made by our people was smoothly passed over by this alert administration of which that Senator was a member. These gentlemen now proclaim from the house-tops to the world the delinquences of everybody, forgetting that they themselves were the chief delinquents. What did they do or even attempt while in the Executive Departments to assert the rights or redress the wrongs of our fishermen?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; I can not yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama declines to yield.

Mr. MORGAN. I have a good deal of work ahead of me yet, and I do not want to occupy any time skirmishing with the Senator from Colorado. I read again from the Senator from New Hampshire:

2. The treaty is a national dishonor, because by it we are forced by Canada towards alterations in our customs duties desired by her.

It has occurred to me that there is really no better argument to be made upon this treaty than just to read these propositions and let the world understand, as they show upon their face, their absurdity. There are very few boys in this country who are so illogical that they can not understand the absurdity of these statements.

She wishes reciprocity treaties opening our markets to her products. We have declined so to open them. She begins to harass us on subjects not connected with customs duties, and we yield and negotiate a treaty looking to changes in those duties.

That is not the fact.

This is degradation.

Yes, it is. It is not the degradation of the Administration, however, but it is the degradation of somebody else. That is the right word to put at the bottom of that sentence.

A reciprocity treaty may be honorably made, each side giving what are natural and customary equivalents. But a treaty by which we change our customs duties and Canada gives no natural equivalent which we can honorably accept as such is not friendly reciprocity, but on our part a pusillanimous surrender.

We claim full commercial rights for our vessels in Canadian ports without regard to customs duties imposed by either country. She offers to give to those ships limited commercial rights on condition that we will remove our duties on fish, and we are asked to make that bargain. We can not afford to do it. The equivalent for commercial rights for our vessels in British ports is the similar rights now accorded their vessels in our ports. Thus let both stand or fall. Commercial rights for our ships, which we persistently claim and to which we believe we are entitled in return for like privileges given British ships, we can not safely purchase by alterations in our tariff. If we do, what shall we ask of Great Britain as an equivalent for the commercial rights of her vessels? It can not be too much emphasized that the whole controversy with Canada proceeds from her determination to reach our markets at reduced rates of duty or with duties removed. It is national injury, dishonor, and degradation to allow Canada, backed by Great Britain, to compel us in such ways as are proposed to alter our customs duties.

And that, after the act of 1870 making fresh fish free of duty, and then repeated in 1883, was made a voluntary offer on the part of the Republican party of the United States to Great Britain, or to Canada.

I read further:

3. The treaty is a national dishonor because it is a part of a negotiation conducted by the representatives of England, not alone with the United States Government, but, avowedly, with one political party in this country.

When in 1885 Minister West first enticed Mr. Bayard into an unlawful agreement to extend the fishing articles of the treaty of Washington for six months and to ask Congress to submit the fishery question to another joint commission, and public outcry against this arrangement was made in behalf of the fishermen, Mr. West declared that of course a majority of the Republican Senate would assail any arrangement made by the Cleveland administration. Mr. Chamberlain has also been free in thinly veiled assaults upon the Republican party, and Mr. Bayard has followed in his wake, while Sir Charles Tupper discloses the whole purpose of the treaty negotiation to make an alliance with the Democratic party and through the agency of that party to secure the reduction or removal of customs duties and free trade for Canadian producers in our markets.

I wonder if that is the same game they played on General Grant in 1870, when they got the duty removed from fresh fish.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] asks me what was unlawful about the arrangement of Mr. Bayard in 1885. We shall see presently. I will come to that after a while.

It was not only lawful, but it was indispensable to the peace and security of our fishermen and the whole country.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] continued in his abusive strain. I have never seen a gentleman so liberal in his abuse as this gentleman. It must be a favorite production of his mind and heart that he is able to lavish it to such an extraordinary extent. Perhaps he is retaliating for something he has received heretofore himself. I do not know anybody who has a better right to retaliate than he has. If I only knew the cause of his severe animadversions I could probably better understand his utter abandon.

He further says:

No further evidence can be needed to prove the truth of the assertion that the agents of Great Britain have opened negotiations with the Democratic party to obtain for Canadians alterations in our customs laws and free access to our markets; and to give these is the whole purpose and object of this British-Democratic alliance. It is a most shameful procedure; discreditable to all parties, British and American, engaged in it. Never before in the history of this country did emissaries of foreign governments openly engage in negotiations and alliances with one political party. Citizen Genet attempted, not an appeal to one party, but what he called an appeal to the people, and Washington sent him back to France.

* * * * * * *

Equally disgraced in this unprecedented business are Sir Charles Tupper, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, and Mr. Secretary Bayard. The American Senate ought to find a way to tell them that while our party strifes are bitter enough they shall not, without rebuke, be made the open basis of diplomatic negotiations.

4. The treaty is a national dishonor, because two of the so-called plenipotentiaries, being appointed by the President without the consent of the Senate, were not constitutionally selected.

By section 2, of Article II of the Constitution, the President is given power by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls. Without that consent (except temporarily in case of vacancies in offices previously established by law) he has no power to appoint officers of the United States to negotiate with foreign nations. But without the consent of the Senate and in defiance of the Constitution, Messrs. Angell and Putnam, two private citizens, were appointed plenipotentiaries to negotiate a fisheries treaty with Great Britain; and for months in Washington, directly in sight of Congress, they pursued their negotiations; and the wrong was the greater because the Senate had by a vote of 35 to 10 declared that no commission ought to be constituted for the negotiation of any treaty.

* * * * * *

The consequences, whatever they may be in future controversies, of the admissions made by the President and Secretary of State are inevitable; but against the admissions of the miscalled plenipotentiaries, who were in fact only impertinent private citizens, the country had the right to be protected.

I suppose there are a good many people in the United States who, when they hear that President Angell and Mr. Putnam are impertinent private citizens because they were invited by the Government of the United States to come into its councils and assist in its negotiations, will be very much surprised at this lofty Senatorial declamation which the Senator from New Hampshire uses for the purpose of characterizing those gentlemen. It will probably be considered as a denunciation ex cathedrâ, and hereafter they are not to be considered as ordinary citizens holding ordinary intercourse with their fellow-citizens, but as "impertinent private citizens," intruders into affairs far above the level either of their talents or respectability. Alas, that they should be condemned from this august Senate by an ex-Secretary of the Navy!

Well, Mr. President, I do not expect that they will feel very much hurt about it after all. I should not wonder if they would not be willing now to give to the Senator from New Hampshire carte blanche on the floor of the Senate to say anything he pleases about them; but I think the American people will not lower their estimate of Mr. Angell, or Mr. Putnam, or Mr. Bayard, or anybody else, because it happens to strike the dignified and able Senator from New Hampshire that they are "impertinent private citizens" when negotiating upon matters of deep interest to this country on the invitation of the President of the United States. The Senator continues:

The assumed character and office of those persons ought to be emphatically repudiated by the Senate.

5. The treaty is a national dishonor, because the American negotiators secure only the bare rights of hospitality for our fishing vessels in British ports and do not obtain for such vessels free entry and full commercial rights in those ports, such as are now and have been freely granted to the fishing vessels and other vessels of Canada and Great Britain in American ports.

When the statutes of the United States come to be read in connection with that declaration, the Senator from New Hampshire will find that it would have been better if he had revised his knowledge of the law before he made that statement. It is not correct. He continues:

But it happened that Mr. Bayard was even more anxious than Mr. Chamberlain. Perhaps the vanity of the aged statesman, the desire to be known as the negotiator of the Bayard-Chamberlain treaty, overcame any wish he had to protect the rights of the New England fishermen and to maintain the national honor; and so Mr. Chamberlain at last, suddenly and unexpectedly, obtained an easy victory.

Mr. Bayard is hardly a vain man, but he is a very proud man. I doubt very much if the American family in all of its generations has given birth and nurture and support to a man whose character for integrity, for worth, for excellence in every respect, is higher than that of Thomas F. Bayard. I know, Mr. President, that there are men in the United States who hold themselves up very high, who when they come into his presence can not bear the contact. They feel that there is something about him that rebukes them; that there is an atmosphere about him that they can not live in, but I have never heard that man charged by friend or foe, until this debate started, with being anything else than a true man of splendid bearing, of what I might term immaculate honor.

The tongue of detraction and censure has been let loose here in this Chamber and at this time in a way to convince the world, I am afraid, that when our doors are closed in executive session nothing but the scorpion's whip is applied to the backs of American citizens when we are investigating their fitness for office or their work in negotiating treaties; but I dare say, I will say in behalf of the Senate of the United States, that this open and public exhibition induced and compelled by the necessities of a political situation at this moment of time, is the very first occasion when I have heard these things said and done. God, send us speedily back into the seclusion where our fathers placed us one hundred years ago and where we have been kept ever since, that we may have an opportunity of affecting the minds of each other in debate by logic and by argument and by reason, instead of being forced out into that field where politicians love to revel and to scatter their revilings before the mobs that gather around the stumps of this country too often to listen to their depraved harangues.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] then continues, as follows:

But there must have been more in the surrender than the vanity and decrepitude of Mr. Bayard. It is impossible to resist the conclusion that a combination was formed between the leaders of the Democratic party to sacrifice the interests of the New England fishermen and to break down our tariff system. The utterances of Sir Charles Tupper, which I have quoted, conclusively prove this. To carry out this plan diplomatic correspondence was dropped; an unconstitutional commission was created; the demand for commercial rights was abandoned; a surrender was made to all the Canadian theories concerning the fisheries, and the initial step in the main purpose of the alliance was taken in Article XV of the treaty, which is intended to force Congress to remove some of our customs duties. Southern Democrats gave the orders to Northern Democrats; the Democratic party abandoned its spasmodic attempt to defend the fishermen against Canadian aggression; and the great object of this Democratic-British alliance now is to pass the Mills bill, keep the Democratic party in power, and destroy the American tariff system.

* * * * * * *

Thus does the Administration of Cleveland and Bayard discredit the United States in its foreign relations.

The dishonoring acts and omissions do not concern one section of the country alone.

And thus, beneath this heap of unjust and unseemly abuse, lies buried what was once as proud a name and as noble and generous a man as ever sat in the Senate.

I suppose that requiescat in pace would be a charitable inscription to put in the RECORD just after that funeral oration that has been pronounced upon Bayard by his slayer, the Senator from New Hampshire. Then he winds up as follows:

South of us a French company, instigated and supported by the French Government, is slowly but surely pushing its canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and within five years the Isthmus of Panama is likely to become a French colony, while this Administration is opposing and defeating the Nicaragua Canal scheme, proposing no canal in its place, giving up all efforts to prevent or neutralize French aggression, and abandoning all assertions against either France or England of that traditional policy known as the Monroe doctrine, which has been cherished by all American statesmen, almost from the foundation of the Government down to the inauguration of this un-American Administration.

North of us the Dominion of Canada, aided by the British Empire, is growing stronger and more powerful than she ever dreamed she could become. Her transcontinental railroad and her naval stations are making her as formidable on the Pacific as on the Atlantic. She is boldly seizing our transportation business and forcing her way into our markets. She perpetrates outrages upon our fishing vessels, and thus compels us to treat with her upon unequal and degrading terms, and Great Britain backs all her demands, while President Cleveland submits to all these British aggressions, and in his last annual message, through an amazing solecism then perpetrated by a President for the first time in our history, he omits to treat of any question of foreign or domestic policy except one. He recommends to Congress to join with him in his alliance with Great Britain to strike down the American tariff system and to push on the plan of the Democratic party announced by its national convention of 1876 as "progressive free trade throughout the world," which, it may be added as a further part of the policy of the Administration, is to be carried on in British-built ships, while the flag of the American merchant marine disappears from the foreign carrying trade.

How long are the protection of American interests, North, South, East, West, at home and abroad, on sea and on land, and the defense of the national honor of the United States to be intrusted to hands like these?

The answer is, not long, if the American people should relapse into their condition in the Hayes campaign.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] said July 21, 1888:

Mr. President, if there is a disgraceful chapter in American history it is in connection with this negotiation, by which it is undertaken by the Secretary of State to aid and assist the Democratic party by allying it with the Canadian party and the British party. It is fortunate for us that in a hundred years no such exhibition has been made heretofore, and it is to be hoped that it will not occur again. It was not intended that it should be known; there was nothing said about it, and if Mr. Tupper had not, in his innocence, mentioned the subject in the Canadian Parliament, I suppose it would have escaped observation except in a general way. Those who believed this treaty was a surrender of American rights without equivalents might have believed that there were some reasons for it, I do not know what; I am unable to state.

I know that here is a treaty made by the present Administration which, if it had remained of the opinion that it was all through the year 1886 and through a good portion of the year 1887, it would not have sent to the Senate. I do not know what influences were brought to bear. I do not know whether it was supposed it would be popular with Great Britain and Canada and whether it would or would not assist in the coming election. I know that is a treaty unfit to be made, and the transaction is one for which the Department and the whole country, so far as it has had any connection with it, ought to be ashamed.

* * * * * * *

If any Senator desires proof that the Administration is the active propagandist of this treaty, I will furnish it. If not, I think I can rest upon the general assertion. Surely when you see the Secretary of State writing letters for publication, when you see the members of this commission, who were connected with the Administration, making public addresses in its defense and support, when you find the Secretary of State submitting to newspaper interviews in order that he may give the public his views of this treaty, I do not need to go to further proof to show that the whole force of this Administration has been brought to bear to compel the Democratic Senators and the Democratic party to accept this as a Democratic measure.

What is there about a Secretary of State that compels him to listen in silence to every one who chooses to berate him, and impute to his best actions the worst motives?

The Senator argues entirely to his own satisfaction upon that, and I will leave him to his own enjoyment.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] on the 24th of July said:

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps my colleague will allow me to say (as that interview contains a good deal of reference to me, I should not have alluded to it at all anywhere in public if it had not been alluded to by others first in the Senate), that I read it with profoundest pity, with no other sensation. The misstatements, the anger, the feeble and impotent rage which somebody has imputed to a high officer of our Government could only make any patriotic American citizen experience a sensation of mortification and not of anger. If that interview be true, the Secretary of State has learned nothing in relation to the fishing interest except the language of the fish market, and that the language of the London fish market. I am very glad that there is a report somewhere that the Secretary of State has disavowed it.

I do not know anything about the language of the London fish market. It takes a wiser and more learned man than I am to say anything about that. I never had any opportunity of getting any information upon that subject at all.

The other Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] said on the 24th of July:

I remember on one occasion just such a demand set up as the justification of an attempt to obtain peace and silence. It was in the record of those dark and gloomy days of the session next preceding the inauguration of Lincoln, when, as early as January of that year, the Pensacola navy-yard was surrendered to demands not a whit less justifiable, not a whit less tenable in the eyes of the people of the United States than the demands to which this treaty is a surrender; and when a Government official, whose duty it was to guard and protect the navy-yards of the nation, was called before a committee of the House of Representatives and the inquiry made of him why he surrendered the Pensacola navy-yard without a blow, his answer was, like the answer of to-day, "It was the only way to preserve the peace."

Mr. GRAY. Of course the Senator knows no such answer has been made to-day.

Mr. DAWES. The only way to preserve the peace! "Why, sir," said he, "you have no idea of the extravagant demands that are made by those men down there upon us. If we had fired a gun or struck a blow there would have been, as certainly as we live, bloodshed;" and, with a pious aspect, he lifted up his hands and said, "I thank God that by a surrender of that navy-yard I have saved this nation." A sorry and spiritless—I will not say cowardly—parallel is in the exclamation, "We have obtained peace" to-day; "we have saved the people of this country from a continuance of the annoyances, the harassments of the past, but we do not stop to say whether we have gained anything."

As a treaty of peace, Mr. President, this treaty is an utter failure, and it is to that point I desire to confine, as near as may be, what I propose to say on this occasion. If we could forget the humiliating conditions, if we could pass over the strange and inexplicable manner in which it has been negotiated, and if we could shut our eyes to everything but the result, I venture to say that it is utterly impossible to defend this treaty as a treaty of peace. There can be no peace under it. Those who negotiated it on the one side and those who negotiated on the other, though for very different reasons, will find their dissatisfaction with it so increased that the occasions for strife will multiply on either side until, if it were the treaty to-day, not a twelvemonth would pass before by common consent we should wish it in our power to retrace our steps to the time before it was negotiated.

* * * * * * * *

But it so happened, Mr. President, that the Canadian negotiator, when he came before the Canadian Parliament to justify his course in the negotiation, found it necessary, being a member of the Parliament and compelled to answer, to disclose what were the steps, so that those who sent him here could judge whether he was justified or not, and he adjourned the debate till he could telegraph to the British minister here to get from Mr. Bayard one of the propositions which he made preliminary to the result to which after several months he was induced to give his consent. When he got that which Mr. Bayard refused to let the Senate have, he came before the Canadian Parliament and made a reply to this statement of Mr. Bayard that they had agreed that nobody should know these steps.

I desire to put upon the record side by side the statement of Mr. Bayard that these men had agreed that nobody should know these steps, and the statement of Sir Charles Tupper upon the same subject, so that hereafter those who care to look into the diplomacy of this time shall have the material to make up a correct record.

In respect to the amendment of the treaty, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] said:

I am under no obligation not to make an amendment of a treaty which, in my opinion, is not a treaty of peace, but a treaty full of strife, and contention, and disorder, and disturbance.

Further on he said:

Sir, not less Canada than the United States will find this treaty not a treaty of peace with the United States, because it is a pusillanimous surrender by us of valuable rights, and because, though the Canadians have obtained concessions, yet in the greater and the larger object for the attainment of which they used this only as an instrument they have utterly failed.

It is a marvel to see how deftly the Senator has answered himself when he shows how the Canadians have "utterly failed" to get what they expect from this treaty.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] said, further on:

Mr. GRAY. But I will ask him, if he has any real doubt, whether he ought not, in behalf of the interests involved, to offer an amendment to make clear what he says is obscure?

Mr. DAWES. When I am invited into the councils of these negotiators and not told that it is none of my business what were the steps which led to this result, I shall consider the proposition made by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. GRAY. Are we not negotiators ourselves under the Constitution?

Mr. DAWES. Then I should like to know why we are not permitted to see and hear what has been done up to this time in the negotiation?

Mr. GRAY. We have been permitted to see and hear all that has been done.

Mr. DAWES. Yes, and we are indebted to Sir Charles Tupper in the Canadian Parliament for it, in the face of an absolute refusal by our own Secretary of State to give us anything except the result. We have got into it pretty thoroughly, and I repeat the obligations of the American people to that foreign negotiator for the benefit of it.

This is not a just statement.

Then the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] paid his respects to me again. He said:

Mr. President, yesterday when the Senator from Alabama concluded his address to the Senate he turned to the Democratic side of the Senate and said, "Fellow Democrats, let us be true to the Government," and when he said that he looked into the faces of three-fourths of those on the Democratic side of the Senate who had been in arms against the Government of the United States, who had forfeited every right they had to citizenship and to liberty and to life, and yet the Government of the United States never spilled a drop of blood after the war was over and gave them the privilege of coming here and sitting here to make laws and to pass upon treaties!

I suppose if I had turned around towards the Senator from Colorado I would have seen a valiant hero, who had wounds on him and blood which he had shed under the other flag. Perhaps he did; I do not say he did not, but I only can say I never heard of it. I am sorry I did not. If I had known he was going to be such a formidable antagonist I think I would have gone upon a raid for him; I would have tried to pick him up and got the Democratic party rid of a man who seems to be ready to fight them with bayonet and saber and sword as long as there is one of them left to fight only with words. A man of peace who will not be peaceful, a man of mercy who is always cruel, a man who has had great opportunities to settle fishery questions with or without a fight, but who was so devoted to other matters of supreme concern during the administration of which he was a very distinguished member that the fisheries never occurred to him. The Senator from Colorado proceeded:

But does the Senator believe that the American people will be edified when he turns to his late Confederate associates and says, "The men on the other side of the Chamber are not patriots; they do not act in the interest of the Government; they act for party purposes and party purposes alone, and although we have belied our record, although we have gone back on that which we asserted, although we are compelled to go back on the assertions of the Secretary of State and the minister to Great Britain, yet we are the patriots and we alone are to be trusted?" Ah, Mr. President, he will not fool anybody. We heard that before the war, and we have been hearing it ever since. The great American heart lies in the North. It was the great American heart that was touched when Sumter was fired on; it was the great American heart that stood all the hardships and the expense of the war and brought these people back in close connection with the Government, rightfully there now, and we will welcome them to all that we claim for ourselves, but we will not here or anywhere else permit it to be said that they have more virtue, more patriotism, more love for American manhood and American integrity and American glory than we.

Comparisons are odious; I have never indulged in them, and I do not mean to do so on this occasion; but I expect if the world has not seen the time it will see the time, some of these days, when you will be very glad indeed to find that there still lingers in the Southern veins that old tide of blood which has been true to convictions of honor and honesty during all times of public need and during all times of persecution.

Mr. President, having shown to the country—because the Senate is not here to understand anything about this, and does not want to know—having shown to the country, however, the temper of mind in which we are now engaged in discussing the questions concerning this treaty, and having presented really the pith and substance of the argument against it in these denunciations, for whoever reads these denunciations and unravels them with the touchstone of truth will find at the bottom of them the true solution of this caucus movement, I shall now proceed to show what has been the course of history about a preliminary matter which has been very much discussed here, and for which this Administration has come in for a very large share of acrimonious abuse, and that is in regard to the protocol which provides a modus vivendi.

I want to treat that as I do every other extraneous question, as a matter by itself, because the true merits of this treaty question are not to be jumbled up and confused with other matters which are irrelevant or extraneous to it. There is quite enough for us to comprehend in coming to a proper conclusion about the merits of the treaty; about the facts which belong appropriately to it, to its interpretation, to the necessity for its existence, and to the good that it is hoped that it will accomplish.

I shall this morning devote my time to an investigation of three protocols; and I wish to have the RECORD speak the truth about the matter, for it is rather an important one, because it is in reference to this feature of the case that it has been very frequently asserted and alleged that the Administration has been guilty of pusillanimous cowardice. I want to inquire where this pusillanimous cowardice began, and how it began, with whom it originated, and the fruits and results of it, so as to see whether these charges against the present Administration are justifiable.

We all know that the treaty of 1854 expired in 1866; that it continued for twelve years. We know that that was a treaty of pretty broad reciprocity. There is one thing about that treaty which I suppose is not generally known; that there is not in the Department of State or in the archives of the Senate or anywhere else preserved in writing any statement or memorandum whatever which shows what the negotiation was, except merely the treaty itself. Calls were made by the Senate, on the resolution of Mr. Webster, for a production of the memorandum, of the protocol, or of any other thing that was connected with the negotiation of the treaty of 1854, but nothing was to be found to illustrate it or to explain it in any way whatever.

I am not complaining of that. In fact, I think that the best system of diplomacy is to let a treaty speak from its four corners exactly what its meaning is, so that neither party can resort to extraneous matter, such as protocol or précis or contemporaneous correspondence, for the purpose of interpreting the text of the treaty. Both the Governments have had a good deal of trouble in the interpretation of the treaty of 1783 and the treaty of 1818 regarding the fisheries, to say nothing of many other treaties we have made with Great Britain and other foreign powers, through the emphasis that protocols sometimes throw upon a particular word or a particular sentence to the destruction of the meaning of the treaty as it might have been read aside from any such gloss.

The treaty of 1854 thus negotiated stood for twelve years as an arrangement between the people of the United States and the people of Canada and Great Britain on the subject of these fisheries. It will appear in the remarks and in the statements which I shall produce from the record presently, that prior to 1854 there had been a great deal of very severe controversy between Great Britain and the United States, or rather between the Canadian provinces and the United States, over every one of the questions which has been introduced into this debate. When Mr. Seward found that that treaty was about to expire, with that bold and splendid sagacity which never deserted him and which made him a masterful man in diplomacy, he saw the necessity of arranging some manner by which the people of the United States and Canada could get along after our abrogation, under notice, of the treaty of 1854 should have relegated us to the influence of the treaty of 1818.

What did Mr. Seward do? He did not hang back and say, "We shall have retaliation with Great Britain." He did not say, "We shall have no further negotiations; that the time for negotiation has passed." He did not say that we paid more for our fishery rights under the treaty of 1854 than they were worth. He did not sit himself down in the gloom of sullen silence and refuse the outstretched hand of Great Britain for a further negotiation. Not by any means. On the contrary, he invited it; he provoked it. What did he do? He wrote a letter to Mr. Adams, April 10, 1866, as follows:

[Inclosure 4 in No. 459.]

Mr. Seward to Mr. Adams.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 10, 1866.

SIR: I send you a copy of a very suggestive letter from Mr. Richard D. Cutts, who, perhaps, you are aware, was employed as surveyor for marking, on the part of the United States, the fishery limits under the reciprocity treaty.

By the way I shall here take occasion to remark that it was in that treaty of 1854 that the first delimitation was ever attempted, and that was attempted by a joint commission between the two countries, as Mr. Bayard concluded it was best to do and as Mr. Arthur recommended should be done. Mr. Seward proceeds:

Mr. Cutts's long familiarity with that subject practically and theoretically entitles his suggestions to respect.

It is desirable to avoid any collision or misunderstanding with Great Britain on the subject growing out of the termination of the reciprocity treaty.

When a second Daniel came to judgment, who is just now leaving the Senate Chamber [Mr. FRYE], it had ceased to be desirable to avoid any misunderstanding or collision with Great Britain, and even the venerable keeper of the peace (the Senator from New York) who worked and labored so assiduously during his administration as Secretary of State, and tried to reserve to the people of the United States the enjoyment of the blessing of an era of peace, has concluded in the report which he signs here that we are to have collision, and we are to have controversy, and we are to promote and continue misunderstanding. We are to let it stand a misunderstanding; we are to have no negotiation; "the time for negotiation has passed;" the subject has ceased to be one for negotiation, and we are hereafter to have what we can win by a little game of retaliation across a line.

Mr. Seward, not pretending to compare any other statesman with him, can justly be claimed to have the honorable distinction of being a very eminent American statesman. He said:

It is desirable to avoid any collision or misunderstanding with Great Britain on the subject growing out of the termination of the reciprocity treaty. With this view I inclose a draught of a protocol, which you may propose to Lord Clarendon for a temporary regulation of the matter. If he should agree to it, it may be signed. When signed it is desirable that the instructions referred to in the concluding paragraph should at once be dispatched by the British Government.

As the fishing season is at hand, the collisions which might be apprehended may occur when that season advances.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

I shall read the protocol, although I believe I ought to pause in my remarks to make another commentary before I do so. The protocol was drawn up by Mr. Seward and sent on by him. It was drawn by his own hand, doubtless. The protocol is as follows:

PROTOCOL.

Whereas in the first article of the convention between the United States and Great Britain, concluded and signed in London on the 20th of October, 1818, it was declared that "the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within certain limits heretofore mentioned;" and whereas differences have arisen in regard to the extent of the above-mentioned renunciation, the Government of the United States and Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain, being equally desirous of avoiding further misunderstanding, have agreed to appoint, and do hereby authorize the appointment of a mixed commission for the following purposes, namely:

A mixed commission—people were to be taken from both countries—

1. To agree upon and define by a series of lines the limits which shall separate the exclusive from the common right of fishing on the coasts and in the seas adjacent of the British North American colonies, in conformity with the first article of the convention of 1818; the said lines to be regularly numbered, duly described, and also clearly marked on charts prepared in duplicate for the purpose.

2. To agree upon and establish such regulations as may be necessary and proper to secure to the fishermen of the United States the privilege of entering bays and harbors for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and to agree upon and establish such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent the abuse of the privilege reserved by said convention to the fishermen of the United States.

Commercial rights were not hinted at by Mr. Seward, and yet they were just as important that day as they are to-day, and much more so, too—that is to say, if the testimony taken by the Committee on Foreign Relations is to be relied upon, and if the statements of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] are to be relied upon.

3. To agree upon and recommend the penalties to be adjudged, and such proceedings and jurisdiction as may be necessary to secure a speedy trial and judgment with as little expense as possible, for the violators of rights and the transgressors of the limits and restrictions which may be hereby adopted.

That is precisely what Mr. Bayard did in this treaty—not a change of the jurisdiction from the Canadian ports to the home ports, as the Senator from Massachusetts seems so earnestly to crave, such as one nation heretofore has never granted to another in all the history of mankind where the seizure was made within what is called jurisdictional waters, but only "to agree upon and recommend the penalties to be adjudged, and such proceedings and jurisdiction as may be necessary to secure a speedy trial and judgment with as little expense as possible." Mr. Bayard has tracked Mr. Seward's protocol precisely, and if Bayard's treaty could be open to any objection in a Democratic mind, it would be the objection that he had too closely copied the plan laid down by Mr. Seward. Mr. Seward put a qualification in his protocol, as follows:

Provided, however, That the limits, restrictions, and regulations which may be agreed upon by the said commission shall not be final, nor have any affect, until so jointly confirmed and declared by the United States and Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain, either by treaty or by laws, mutually acknowledged and accepted by the President of the United States, by and with the consent of the Senate, and by Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain.

Pending a definitive arrangement on the subject, the United States Government engages to give all proper orders to officers in its employment, and Her Britannic Majesty's Government engages to instruct the proper colonial or other British officers to abstain from hostile acts against British and United States fishermen respectively.—Foreign Relations, 1886, volume 1, page 98.

Up to that time a great many controversies had arisen between the people of the United States and the people of Canada which had been put in a state of repose for twelve years by the reciprocal arrangements contained in the treaty of 1854; but prior to the date of that protocol, that offer of Mr. Seward to secure the peace by a modus vivendi, as it is termed, there had not been, so far as I have been able to gather from the history of these negotiations or of these transactions, one single dollar in money recovered for any wrong done except in the case of the Washington and the Argus, which was decided under another convention, those being claims by citizens of the United States against the Government of the United States which the citizens pressed upon their own account and at their private expense, I suppose, of course, and of which they got the benefit under a subsequent convention. I believe it was dated in 1853; I am not quite sure about the date of it.

Among other things which had occurred prior to this offer of Mr. Seward are various insults to our flag, about which some of our superpatriotic citizens now in the Senate are very much aggrieved and terribly wounded. The only difficulty about it is that the United States have had that same blow put across our shoulders for so many years—yes, for so many decades of years—that it is rather a late hour for us to begin now to wince at the pain. As far back as 1823 a case of this kind, of insult to our flag, occurred. It was a case of a very remarkable character, and it was followed up by case after case from that time clear on down to 1854—cases of quite as flagrant wrong, some of them, as that was.

In a letter from H. U. Addington to John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State, in reply to a letter that Mr. Adams had addressed to Mr. Stratford Canning, Mr. Addington says:

By the report of Captain Arabin it appears that the said schooner was found at anchor in Shelburne harbor, into which she had not been driven by stress of weather.

That was her whole offense.

From that harbor she had already sailed once, after having previously anchored there, and had returned a second time, before she was captured by the Argus, the weather being fine and moderate the whole time. She was accordingly detained by Captain Arabin for a breach of the act 59 George III, chapter 38, passed for the protection of the British fisheries, in conformity with the stipulations of the convention concluded between His Majesty and the United States on the 20th October, 1818. On the same grounds that vessel was subsequently condemned by the vice-admiralty court at St. John, in the Province of New Brunswick.

He proceeds further:

With regard to the equipping of the said schooner, by the captain of the Argus, and dispatching her in quest of smugglers, you will observe, sir, that Admiral Fahie acknowledges that act to have been irregular; but he at the same time states that irregularity to have been practiced then for the first time, and announces that he has taken measures for preventing the recurrence of it.

That was a statement in reply to Mr. Adams's demand upon that Government, which is as follows:

I am directed by the President of the United States to solicit your good offices in the first instance to obtain the restitution of the schooner Charles to Mr. Moody—

Mr. Moody was the owner—and in the next to claim the satisfaction and indemnity due all the sufferers by the interruption of their voyage and the disturbance in their lawful occupations, and all other damages sustained by them in consequence of these acts, to which should be added the reparation to the United States for the indignity offered to their flag and the injuries inflicted upon their citizens.

Mr. Adams had a clear conception of the indignity to the flag.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The Right Honorable STRATFORD CANNING,
Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Great Britain.

That is the demand to which I have just read the reply—part of it, all that is necessary.

Now for the apology, as it is termed, on page 6 of Senate Executive Document No. 100, Thirty-second Congress, first session:

Mr. Canning's departure for Europe causes me to avail myself of the intimation of your appointment as chargé d'affaires ad interim—

This is addressed to Mr. Addington—contained in his letter to me of the 24th of June, to forward for your information and that of the American Government copies of several documents, as particularized at the foot of this letter, which go to contradict, in material points, the statements made in the protest, and will, I trust, sir, furnish sufficient evidence that the Charles was detained and proceeded against on legal grounds.

The manning, however, and sending her "down the bay in pursuit of smugglers," which is admitted in the report of Mr. Innes, the first lieutenant of the Argus, was certainly irregular; and if she had been acquitted—

If the Argus had been acquitted!—

it would probably have induced the court to award a proportional remuneration to the claimants. It is the first instance of such a proceeding that has come within my knowledge, and I have taken measures to prevent its recurrence.

That is the whole of it; that is all the apology which was offered. The statement is that it was irregular, but inasmuch as the ship was condemned, the manner of her seizure, the cause of her seizure, and all that is placed entirely beyond dispute. Now, let us see for what she was seized. Henry Trouch, midshipman, in reporting to Capt. John B. Dundas, of His Majesty's sloop Argus, said:

HIS MAJESTY'S SLOOP ARGUS, Halifax, August 11, 1823.

SIR: In compliance with your order to make known to you such particulars as I may be acquainted with, relative to the schooner Charles—American fishing vessel—I beg leave to state that, having been ordered by Captain Arabin, on the 9th of May, 1823, to board the said schooner, lying in Shelburne harbor, I went in the gig, manned by four seamen and the corporal of marines, and, having boarded, demanded her papers. I inquired what brought him within the limits. And the master replied, to avoid a storm. How long he had been at anchor? He replied, he had but just anchored. I then ordered the master to weigh; and, according to the orders I had received from Captain Arabin, anchored close to the Argus. I was ordered on board and to bring the master and schooner's papers with me.

I am, sir, etc.,

HENRY TROUCH, Midshipman.

Capt. JOHN B. DUNDAS,
His Majesty's Sloop Argus.

That was the manner of the seizure. Now, what was done with her on that same day?

HIS MAJESTY'S SLOOP ARGUS, Halifax, August 10, 1823.

Being ordered by Captain Arabin, on the 9th of May, to take charge of the American schooner Charles and proceed along the coast to St. John, New Brunswick, and detain such unlawful vessels as I might meet in my way, I sailed from Shelburne on the 12th of May, and, on my way to St. John, detained one English and one American schooner, and arrived at St. John on the 20th of May, at which place I was taken out of the schooner Charles and she was delivered into the custom-house.

H. LEGARD, Midshipman.

It was seized on the 9th of May, the flag was hauled down, the British flag put upon her as a cruiser, and on that same day she was sent down the bay for the purpose of arresting smugglers, and she arrested and detained one English and one American schooner. They got back with her, as will appear in the next letter of Mr. D. B. Innes, lieutenant of His Majesty's sloop Argus, on the 20th of May. He says, in writing to Capt. John Dundas of the same ship:

On the 20th of May the Charles arrived, and was reported to the collector of the customs for libeling. On the 21st she was manned and given in charge of Mr. Hugh Bowers, midshipman, and sent down the bay in quest of smugglers; when the master requested a passage, he was taken on board and landed at Campo Bello, about 2 miles distant from Moose Island (United States). On the 7th of June the Charles again joined the Argus, and was ordered to St. John's, where she was given up to the collector of His Majesty's customs for legal adjudication.

John Quincy Adams was Secretary of State at that time, the man who, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] affirms, never did anything contrary to his conscience and never omitted to act when his conscience was brought into play and challenged as the ruler and guide of his conduct. Here was this ship which was seized for nothing else but the fact that she had run in for shelter, run in from a storm, which was there but a few hours within a bay to which she had a right to resort under the treaty of 1818. She was seized on the 9th day of May, 1823; on that day immediately she was converted into a British cruiser, sent down the bay, arrested one American and one English ship, and then returned, and on the 20th day of that month she was reported to the collector of customs for libeling, and on the 21st was libeled, and afterwards she was condemned.

Mr. President, there was an affront to the flag of the country which aroused the attention of Mr. Adams. There was an injury to a private citizen by which his ship was taken away from him and condemned for a cause that was entirely unjustifiable, for he had a right to go there under that treaty for shelter. He went in out of a storm. It was a thorough abuse of the treaty, and yet after Mr. Monroe went out of office that matter was referred to the subsequent administration, and so on down, and when the matter was brought distinctly to the attention of Mr. Clay by the consul at Halifax as something which demanded recompense from the British Government, the whole subject was allowed to pass away in absolute silence.

Mr. President, the statesmen and citizens of that day and time were just as proud and as patriotic as we are, but they did not feel the necessity on that occasion of calling it a humiliating and pusillanimous surrender to the British Government. They did not then feel the necessity of demanding some higher apology than Mr. Bayard obtained from the British Government in a recent case of the like kind.

Why are these distinctions? Because on that occasion a political party had not got hold of this thing as a football, whereas to-day the idea in this treaty and in everything connected with it is to attempt to identify the great Democratic party of this country with the British Government. The idea is to reflect upon our efforts, feeble and unavailing though they have been so far, to relieve this country from taxation by showing or attempting to show before the great body of the people of this country, especially our Irish friends, that the Democratic party are in sympathy with Great Britain, and Senators, honorable men, who in private life would hesitate and would not actually inflict a wrong or an injustice upon another man, either as to his sentiments or opinions, are found here undertaking to brand men as being on the side of the British when they have demanded and wrung apologies and reparations from the British Government for acts which John Quincy Adams did not pass over in silence, it is true, but for which he really demanded no reparation and got none.

No man can state a stronger case of abuse of the flag, the abuse of international comity, the abuse of international law, the abuse of the treaty of 1818, the abuse of every claim we had to respectability—no man can state a stronger case than that which passed under the observation of Mr. John Quincy Adams in 1823. It finally came down as a legacy to Henry Clay, and he buried it.

Mr. Addington replied to this demand of Mr. Adams upon this subjecton the 10th of June, 1824, as follows:

Mr. Addington to Mr. Adams.

WASHINGTON, June 10, 1824.

SIR: In reference to the subject of a letter which I had the honor to address to you on the 12th of October last, namely, the detention by Captain Arabin, of His Majesty's ship Argus, and illegal employment as a British cruiser of the American fishing schooner Charles, on which subject I subsequently, in pursuance of instructions from home, gave you verbally the assurance "that orders wouldbe issued by His Majesty's Government that any American vessel detained by the Charles while thus irregularly employed should be restored to the owner, even although liable on other grounds to be condemned," I have now the honor to inform you that an inquiry having been instituted into this subject by orders of the admiralty it has been found that only one American vessel, the Dolphin, was detained by the Charles previous to her adjudication, and that the requisite intimation for the restoration of that vessel has been made to the proper authorities in conformity with the assurance thns given to the United States Government on the part of His Majesty's ministers.

I have the honor to be, with distinguished consideration, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

H. U. ADDINGTON.

To Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, etc.

That is what was done to us in the way of apology and excuse. Charles R. Vaughan, writing to Mr. Clay on the 5th of February, 1826, three years after the date of this seizure, says:

Mr. Vaughan to Mr. Clay.

WASHINGTON, February 5, 1826.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note dated the 2d instant, calling upon me to enable you to satisfy the inquiries of Mr. Moody about the result of the reference of his case to the British Government by my predecessor, Mr. Canning, complaining of the capture of a fishing schooner, his property.

Upon a reference to the archives of this mission, I find that the complaint of Mr. Moody was referred, in the first instance, to the rear-admiral commanding the British naval force at Halifax, and that, subsequently, in a dispatch dated November 15, 1823, a communication from the British admiralty was transmitted to Mr. Addington, His Majesty's chargé d'affaires at Washington, informing him that the schooner Charles had been regularly condemned in the vice-admiralty court of the Province of New Brunswick, and that it was not expected that the Government of the United States would lend further countenance to the complaints of the owner.

The condemnation of this vessel took place upon the grounds of a breach of the act of the 59th George III, chapter 28, for the protection of the British fisheries, and which act was passed in conformity with the stipulations of the convention concluded between His Britannic Majesty and the United States on the 20th October, 1818.

The circumstances attending this capture are detailed in a note addressed by Mr. Addington, His Britannic Majesty's chargé d'affaires, to the minister of the United States having the Department of State, dated the 12th October, 1823. I have the honor to refer you to that dispatch, which contains the documents in explanation of this capture, received from the rear-admiral upon the Halifax station, and to request you to accept the assurances of my highest consideration.

CHAS. R. VAUGHAN.

Right then and there that question died. A greater insult than that was never offered to the American flag, that you should seize one of our fishing vessels in violation of the treaty of 1818, and on the same day, within a very few hours, you should haul down the American flag, dismiss the crew from on board the ship, take the captain and transfer him in custody really to the shore; that you should run up the British flag and send the ship down the bay cruising; that she should on the same day seize an American ship for an alleged offense of smuggling and also a British ship; that she should stay out, as a British cruiser, until the 20th day of the next month, in June, and then she should be brought in and submitted to the custom-house for libeling; that on the 21st day of June the libel should be prepared and lodged against her; that immediately she should again be put into commission, for that is the idea, as a British ship, and sent out on another cruise, and kept at that work until finally she is condemned, and that not only no apology is made for it, but that a justification was interposed by the British Government of the seizure, and the act of her colonial court in condemning the ship was to be held of such force and validity, and was so accepted by the American Government as being of such force and validity, as that the British Government should be allowed to say that it was not expected that the Government of the United States would lend further countenance to the complaint of the owner; and sure enough they did not; and there died the case of the Charles. That is the whole history.

Man after man has graced the position of Secretary of State from that day down to this, and the case of the Charles sleeps in the tomb of the Capulets. No man has ever reached forth his hand, armed with American patriotism and panoplied by truth and justice, to make a demand upon the British Government for the Charles, for the honor of the flag. It is all right to haul down American flags provided it is not done when Grover Cleveland is a candidate for the Presidency.

Next come the cases of the Reindeer and the Ruby. Let us see what they had against the Reindeer and the Ruby, two American fishing ships. This case is stated by John Jones, master, to Captain Hoare, of His Majesty's sloop Dotterel.

HIS MAJESTY'S SLOOP DOTTEREL'S BOAT,
St. Andrews, N. B., July 27, 1824.

SIR: I beg leave to represent that on 25th instant, when cruising in the yawl, in pursuance of your orders, off the Grand Menan—

That is near the mouth of the Bay of Fundy—for the protection of our fisheries, I received information of several American fishing vessels being at anchor at Two Island Harbor, and that two of them, namely, Reindeer and Ruby, of Lubec, were at White Island Harbor on the 24th, where they got their wood and water, and that on their anchoring they fired their muskets and told the inhabitants they were armed, and would not allow any man-of-war's boat to board them, and after they had their supplies they shifted to Two Island Harbor, Grand Menan.

I made sail from Gull Cove, and at daylight, the 25th, observed four schooners at anchor at Two Island Harbor, which vessels got under way on our appearing; when I got close to three of them they lashed alongside each other, and all hands, about thirty in number, went on board the middle one with their fire-arms and fish spears. I desired them to separate, which they refused to do until I threatened to fire on them. On boarding they proved to be the Reindeer, master's name Small, and Ruby, master's name Small (brothers), of Lubec, two fishing vessels, and Friend's shallop, of the same place.

It being fine weather, and they not being in want of wood or water, I detained the Reindeer and Ruby, and put their men, with the exception of the masters, on board the two American schooners with provisions for a passage to Lubec, and made sail in the Reindeer and Ruby for St. Andrews through East Quoddy. About 6 p. m., when abreast of harbor De Lute, I observed two schooners and an open boat full of armed men, muskets and fixed bayonets, hoisting American colors; one of them went alongside Mr. Towneau in the Ruby, boarded and took the arms from him and his three men; the one abreast of me was kept off for about a quarter of an hour, when they commenced firing into us. Though with great reluctance I thought it most prudent to surrender to such superior force, having but four men, one musket, and three cutlasses.

On delivering them up, I found there were in the two schooners about a hundred armed men (including the crews of the schooners, about thirty in number), the rest having the appearance of militiamen, and headed by a Mr. Howard, of Eastport, said to be captain in the United States militia.

I have the honor to be, etc.,

JOHN JONES, Master.

To CAPTAIN HOARE,
His Majesty's Sloop Dotterel.

That is the case. He found them lying quietly in that harbor where they had taken wood and water, as they had a right to do under the treaty of 1818, but inasmuch as some of the crew, upon a boat, doubtless out getting wood or water, had said they did not intend to be boarded by a British man-of-war the evening before and had fired some of their guns, not at anybody, the ire of the British lion was aroused and the next morning at daylight this officer, Mr. John Jones, set sail for that place, captured these ships, took them into custody, and was going off with them, but the people on shore got wind of it and when they undertook it they came out to meet them and rescued the ships from them by violence.

Now, see what was said about that. Mr. Vaughan wrote to Mr. Clay, as follows:

Mr. Vaughan to Mr. Clay.

WASHINGTON, April 29, 1826.

SIR: On the 5th October, 1824, Mr. Addington, His Majesty's chargé d'affaires, addressed a note to the Government of the United States, in which he stated that an outrage had been committed by some armed citizens of the State of Maine in forcibly rescuing, off Eastport, two American vessels, the Reindeer and Ruby, which had been captured by His Majesty's cruisers while fishing in the Bay of Fundy, in places where the United States had by treaty renounced the right so to do.

No answer having been given by the Government of the United States to the remonstrance made by Mr. Addington, I am directed to ask for an acknowledgment of the impropriety of the conduct of the persons concerned in the forcible recapture of the above-mentioned vessels.

In all complaints which the Government of the United States has had occasion to bring forward against His Majesty's cruisers employed in the protection of the British fisheries in the Bay of Fundy the fullest investigation into every case of alleged misconduct has been instituted by the British agents, and the reports of the commanding officers have been laid before the American Government. If it has been necessary to call for the judgment of the colonial tribunals, prompt and impartial justice has been administered, in proof of which I have only to refer you to the case of the American ship Charles, which had been legally detained, but having been illegally employed by her captors after her detention, was restored.

I ask with confidence, on the part of His Majesty's Government, for an acknowledgment of the improper conduct of the persons engaged in the forcible recapture of the Reindeer and Ruby, as the British Government is disposed to waive all demand for the punishment of the offenders, as the act resulted apparently from unpremeditated violence.

I request that you will accept the assurances of my highest consideration.

CHAS. R. VAUGHAN.

There was the demand of the British Government based upon an unlawful act. It was the case of Fortune Bay repeated, except that the quarrel was about a different subject. There a mob came on board the ships. They came to the ships, the Ruby and the Reindeer, from the shore, and upon the vessel that had them in charge, and assailed them with fire-arms and went into actual battle, and captured the ships from the British captors who were then taking them into a port for condemnation.

In order to show how people felt to each other who had not been very long out of the toils of war about questions of this kind, I will read what Mr. Addington said to Mr. Adams on this general topic:

Mr. Addington to Mr. Adams.

WASHINGTON, February 19, 1825.

SIR: On the 8th and 21st of September last I had the honor of receiving from the Department of State two letters, in which my good offices were requested in behalf of certain individuals of the State of Maine, engaged in the fishing trade, who desired redress and reparation for injury done to them by the seizure of their vessels by His Majesty's sloop Dotterel, while employed in cruising on the coasts of His Majesty's North American possessions.

I informed you, sir, in reply to those communications, that I should forthwith address an application to the British naval commander-in-chief on the North American station, recommending that a full and impartial investigation should be instituted into the various cases which formed the grounds of complaint on the part of the American Government.

I have the honor to transmit to you herewith copies of a correspondence which took place, in consequence of my application, between Captain Hoare, commanding His Majesty's sloop Dotterel, and Rear-Admiral Lake, in reference to the cases set forth in your letters above mentioned. The depositions of the officers and men concerned in the capture of the vessels therein enumerated are also annexed.

By a perusal of these documents it will, I trust, sir, most conclusively appear to you that the complainants have no just ground of accusations against the officers of the Dotterel, nor are entitled to reparation for the loss they have sustained; that, on the contrary, they rendered themselves, by the willful irregularity of their conduct, justly obnoxious to the severity exercised against them, having been taken, some flagrante delicto, and others in such a position and under such circumstances as rendered it absolutely impossible that they could have had any other intention than that of pursuing their avocations as fishermen within the lines laid down by treaty as forming the boundaries within which such pursuit was interdicted to them.

With regard to the charge preferred against Captain Hoare, of his having converted detained American vessels, prior to their adjudication in the courts, into tenders for assisting him in his operations against the vessels of the same country, I have only to observe that that officer broadly, and in the most explicit terms, denies ever having committed or authorized one such act. And in respect to the other accusation addressed by the complainants, of maltreatment by the British officers of those persons whose vessels had been detained, I trust that a perusal of the inclosed papers will make it equally clear to you that that charge is entirely unfounded.

I can not but apprehend, sir, that the acrimony with which the proceedings of Captain Hoare have been viewed by the citizens of the State of Maine, employed in the fishing trade on the British-American coasts, may be justly ascribed to the circumstances of the recent substitution of vigilance, on the part of the British cruisers, for the laxity which appears to have prevailed heretofore in guarding those coasts from the intrusion of foreign fishermen and smugglers; and I doubt not that if those persons could be prevailed upon to confine themselves within the limits prescribed to them by the treaty, no cause of dissension or complaint would ever arise between the individuals or vessels of the two nations.

It remains for me to observe that in one case in which, by the ignorance of the midshipman employed in the service, the territory of the United States had been violated by the pursuit and seizure of an American vessel within the American boundaries, Captain Hoare made all the reparation in his power for his officer's misconduct by delivering up to the Americans the boat which had been detained, and paying all the expenses incident to her detention.

I have the honor to be, with distinguished consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

H. U. ADDINGTON.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, etc.

That was a magnificent apology to deliver for taking a boat which had been unlawfully seized, that he had paid the expenses of her detention! What becomes of your flag question? What becomes of this sudden spasm of grief about the dishonor to the flag and the rescue of the boats I was speaking about awhile ago? Wherever the British Government found one of the men who were alleged to be implicated, it made no difference where he was within British jurisdiction, it seized him and carried him to port for trial, our Government not even making a protestation against it, but admitting in the broadest way it is possible to make an admission the jurisdiction of the local courts to proceed in matters of this kind, and that we were conclusively bound by it.

There were still other seizures. Mr. Morrow at Halifax on the 27th of June, 1839, writing to Hon. John Forsyth, then Secretary of State at Washington, said:

United States consul at Halifax to Mr. Forsyth.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Halifax, Nova Scotia, June 27, 1839.

SIR: I have to state that a number of American vessels have been seized in this province for violating, as has been alleged, the convention between the United States and Great Britain, and the law of this province, a copy of which I forwarded in my letters numbered 41 and 63, namely:

Schooner Shetland, of Boston, 98 tons burden, seized at Whitehead, near Canso.

Schooner Magnolia, of Vinalhaven, seized at Tusket Island Harbor, near Yarmouth.

Schooner Independence, of Vinalhaven, seized at Tusket Island Harbor.

Schooner Hart, of Deer Isle.

Schooner Java, of Islesborough.

Schooner Charles, of Mount Desert, seized at Canso; this vessel has been released.

Also, a schooner, name unknown, seized at Guysborough.

Schooner Mayflower, of Boothbay, seized and sent into Guysborough.

Schooners Battelle, Hyder Ally, and Eliza, seized at Beaver Harbor.

I inclose copies of two letters, which I thought it my duty to write to the governor, with several statements submitted to him. Also a copy of an affidavit, made by the master and crew of the schooner Eliza, of Portland; and a copy of a letter addressed to me by Sir Rupert D. George, baronet, secretary of the province; also a report made by the Queen's advocate-general in the matters referred to the governor.

You will perceive, from the papers now transmitted, the position in which I am placed, urging the claims of the owners and masters of the vessels, and having the expense of the crews to pay, they being utterly destitute; and I have been compelled to afford them the assistance they required.

I have received information that the revenue-cutter Hamilton had arrived at Yarmouth for the purpose of inquiring into the circumstances of those seizures, and I wished most earnestly to have seen her commander; but it is now said that she has proceeded to St. John's, New Brunswick. And, although I have felt the impropriety of my interference in the business of the consulate of St. John's, New Brunswick, Pictou and Sydney (Yarmouth and the Tuskets being nearer to St. John's than to Halifax—Whitehead and Guysborough being nearer either to Sydney or to Pictou), I could not refuse my assistance to American citizens in distress, and I hope this will pass without censure.

I beg leave also to refer to the journals of the house of assembly, now transmitted, from which it would appear that the provincial act has been principally framed on the documents therein contained.

Many other vessels will no doubt be seized, and I shall be called upon by the crews of the vessels to intercede for them, and to supply their wants. This I took the liberty of bringing under your notice in my letter No. 62; and I respectfully urge that the labor of protecting the interests of American citizens in this province should not, of necessity, devolve on me, as living near the seat of government, while all the perquisites of the office are enjoyed by others within whose consular jurisdiction the seizures have been made.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient, humble servant,

JOHN MORROW.

Hon. JOHN FORSYTH,
Secretary of State, Washington.

Now, let us see what these six ships were seized for. The same Mr. John Morrow reports in regard to the Shetland, of Boston:

That a lad, whose name is unknown, came on board the schooner. [Supposed to be about sixteen years of age. This not in the affidavit.] Requested the master to sell him a pair of trousers, which he (the master) refused to do, but on repeated importunities consented that the young man might select a pair; the boy also requested to have some tea and tobacco, and, after much hesitation, the master, having none to spare, and not having beam, scales, or weights on board, gave him a quantity of tea, supposed to be about one pound, and about six to eight pounds of tobacco; for which articles, namely, the trousers, tea, and tobacco, the boy paid to the master $4. About two hours after this transaction a number of men came on board, headed by a person who was said to be a magistrate or a custom-house officer, and demanded the papers of the schooner, (the register, fishing license, and the log-book), which he retained; sent the master and the crew on shore at Whitehead, except the mate; the vessel was then seized, and has been brought to Halifax. It has since been ascertained that the schooner was seized by Mr. Matthew Forrester.

That is the first case. In the case of the Magnolia, the master of the Magnolia "admits that he purchased a barrel of herring for bait, but took no fish within 15 miles of the coast of Nova Scotia." So, as far back as in 1839 vessels were seized for going into the ports of the British provinces and buying bait. He bought a barrel of herring to fish with.

Mr. FRYE. Was he seized for buying bait?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Master admits that he purchased a barrel of herring for bait, but took no fish within 15 miles of the coast of Nova Scotia.

Remained, as before mentioned, at Tusket Island and returned to the fishing ground at not less than 15 miles from the coast, and there remained until the 25th day of May.

Mr. FRYE. Those other vessels were seized, were they not, for violating customs laws, for smuggling?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Mr. FRYE. For selling tea and tobacco contrary to law?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know whether that is the customs law or not. I suppose it was especially for smuggling. I suppose that is what it was.

Now we come to the case of the Independence, sent out from Vinalhaven, State of Maine, 31 tons.

Sailed on or about the 10th of April; commenced fishing, but never at a less distance than 15 miles from the coast of Nova Scotia, until the latter end of April last.

In want of water; went into the Tusket Island, and remained at anchor about twenty-four hours. At the expiration of that period put to sea, and returned to the fishing places in the said bay; but not fishing at a less distance from the coast than 15 miles.

Remained in the bay until the 25th day of May. The only compass on board the vessel having been broken, the master wished to reach Yarmouth to have his compass repaired, and to obtain a supply of water. Blowing a gale of wind, the weather thick and hazy, was compelled to take shelter in Tusket Islands for the night.

On the 26th of May, lying at anchor, the schooner was boarded and seized by Mr. Darby, commanding the schooner Victory, who demanded all the papers of the said schooner, which were delivered to him.

The vessel taken into Yarmouth; crew ordered to leave the vessel.

Protest made in the usual form.

The next case was that of the schooner Hart. She—sailed from Deer Island on a fishing voyage in the Bay of Fundy, and remained there at a distance not at any time less than 15 miles until the 13th May last.

* * * * * * *

That the said master went into Tusket Harbor to procure wood and water, and for no other purpose whatever.

That Benjamin Brown, a resident of Yarmouth, while lying in harbor, called to one of the crew of said vessel, requesting that the said master would assist him in clearing or picking his nets; and ——, of the boat Hart in consequence of such request, went on board of Brown's vessel (a British vessel) and assisted in clearing his nets; for which service Brown gave to the deponent Rich about two barrels of fresh herrings.

[The master and crew state that they had no need of bait, having abundance of clams on board which had been brought with them from Deer Island. This, however, not in the affidavit made at Yarmouth.]

That, with the exception of the two barrels of fish, neither the master of the said boat nor her crew have fished on any part of the coast of Nova Scotia within 15 or 16 miles.

That no article whatever has been sold from or out of the said vessels, but the necessary supply of wood and water were obtained and paid for in money.

That, on the 21st day of May, the boat was boarded and seized by Mr. Darby, of the government schooner Victory, and taken into Yarmouth, and all the papers of the said schooner Hart were taken from the said master and himself and crew were sent on shore, Mr. Darby detaining all the clothes and necessaries of the said master and crew except the clothes they had on at the time of seizure.

No. 5 was the case of the schooner Java. The master of the Java admitted that he had been fishing within the 3-mile limit, and they condemned him out of hand without the benefit of clergy or mainprise.

The next case is No. 6, the case of the Eliza, at Portland. Here are the affidavits of six men sworn to before Mr. Morrow, consul of the United States, on the 13th of June, 1839. They state:

That, on or about the 26th day of April last, these appearers sailed in and with the said schooner from Portland, on an intended fishing voyage on the coast of Nova Scotia and the Bay of St. Lawrence, having on board materials and stores fit and proper for a fishing voyage, and which voyage was expected to last about four months.

That the said schooner carried no articles whatever suitable for a trading voyage or for sale; nor had any one of these appearers any goods, wares, or merchandise wherewith to carry on any trade or traffic, but solely intended and fitted out for the fishery, with nets, hooks, and lines, salt, etc.

That from the day on which they sailed, they never caught or cured any fish whatever, within 10 or 12 miles of any part of the coast, and never made any harbor, except when unavoidably compelled to do so, namely: on or about the 5th of May, it blowing a heavy gale from the east, they were compelled to make a harbor in the Ragged Islands, where they remained two or three days, during all which period the weather continued so bad as to prevent their going to sea. On the 24th of May, or thereabouts, the schooner having carried away one of her larboard main chains, in consequence of a heavy swell while at anchor in 60 fathoms off Spry Harbor, they were compelled to run into Beaver Harbor as the nearest port, and got it repaired by a man whose name they were informed was —— Winsell.

That on the 8th of June now instant the said schooner put again into Beaver Harbor to get wood and water (their supply being much reduced and being inadequate for the said voyage), and on the 9th (being Sunday) the said schooner was seized by the provincial schooner Victory, Darby, master, and brought to Halifax, the master and the cook being the only persons allowed to stay in her.

And these appearers solemnly declare that they neither sold, bartered, nor parted with any article whatever out of the said schooner, or caught or procured or prepared, or intended to catch or procure any fish whatever, except at a distance of 10 to 12 miles from the coast of Nova Scotia, or purchased or endeavored to purchase any fish of any of the inhabitants or others on the British coasts, and that the whole sum of money in possession or control of this appearer, the master, did not exceed four to five dollars, or thereabouts, with which to buy wood and water in case of need.

That affidavit is sworn to on the 13th June, 1839, before Frederick Le Blanc, and certified to by John Morrow as a true copy, Morrow being consul there at the time.

On the 8th of August, 1839, Mr. Morrow makes a report of these cases to the Secretary of State, the Hon. John Forsyth. He says:

United States consul at Halifax to Mr. Forsyth.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Halifax, Nova Scotia, August 8, 1839.

SIR: Since I had the honor to address you, under date the 27th June (No. 77), several proceedings have been had with respect to the vessels therein named; some have been released on payment of expenses, and others have been condemned.

I beg leave, most respectfully, to recapitulate the fate of each vessel.

The schooner Eliza, of Portland, has been released on payment of expenses, amounting in all to £84 17*s.* 10*d.* (this currency), or $339.56; this, however contains my commission on cash advanced to release her and incidental charges connected with a bottomry.

Schooner Shetland, of Boston, released in a like manner; her expenses about $600; but the money was paid by a house of business here, and I do not know the exact amount.

Schooner Charles discharged without any expense.

That is a different schooner from the one of which I was speaking this morning, which was condemned.

Schooner Charles discharged without any expense.

Schooner Mayflower, of Boothbay, released; her expenses amounted to £75 6*s.* 4*d.*, which I paid. Incidental charges included in this sum.

The Eliza, Charles, and Mayflower have evidently been brought under the operation of a law which I can not but feel is exceedingly severe—perhaps I should say unjust. It was thought advisable, however, to pay the sums at which they were assessed, rather than have the vessels detained, and perhaps, subjected to further difficulty.

The Shetland stood in a different position, and escaped condemnation by the merest accident.

The Battelle and Hyder Ally have been condemned and sold.

I bought the former for the owner, who has come on to this place and claimed her. I charged him 5 per cent. commission, which he paid. He took a sea letter for Boston from this office, the schooner's papers being filed in the registry of the court of vice-admiralty.

The Magnolia, Independence, Java, and Hart were condemned in the court of vice-admiralty on the 5th instant, and an order has gone to Yarmouth for the sale to take place immediately.

The owner of the two former is here, and he will proceed to Yarmouth to purchase them. I have a power of attorney from the owner of the Hart to purchase for him; and I have given directions that the Java may also be bought on account of the owners, if it be possible by so doing, to save these poor men from ruin.

The Hyder Ally remains in my possession, and will, I think, be claimed in a few days, as the owner has written respecting her.

A new case has arisen. The schooner Amazon was seized by the collector of light duties at the Gut of Canso, and the master transmitted an affidavit to me relating the circumstances of the seizure.

I immediately applied to the advocate-general, who, after a few days, handed me an order for her relief addressed to the seizing officer, but left open so that I might send it to the person having the vessel in custody, it being reported that the collector of light duties had absconded.

The master of this vessel will have to pay the expenses attendant on his detention and custody, for which I have become answerable, and how I am to be reimbursed I do not know.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient, humble servant,

JOHN MORROW.

Hon. JOHN FORSYTH,
Secretary of State, Washington.

There was the fate of six vessels and others that had been seized under these accusations, these charges which I have just read, and which it will be seen cover almost every single ground of complaint found to this treaty, and every single ground of complaint found in respect of more modern cases of outrages that have been inflicted upon us by the British people. Our Government sat down and permitted these things to go on unrebuked and unnoticed, and they went on through all the different administrations, including that of General Grant, Mr. Hayes, and Mr. Arthur, and nobody raised a voice either to rebuke or to demand indemnity for any of these acts. But this consul's letter introduces a new topic here, a very interesting one, because it has been asseverated on the part of Senators here continually in the most emphatic, not to say dogmatic, way that no question had ever been made about the Gut of Canso, and therefore it was a work of supererogation on the part of Mr. Bayard to put into the treaty anything about our fishermen going through that. Senators had better inform themselves about the history of our country before they put in these statements. I have called your attention here to what Mr. Morrow had to say about that in that first case. Let us trace that a little farther.

James Primrose, the consul at Pictou, Nova Scotia, on July 15, 1839, addressed Hon. Sir Rupert D. George, provincial secretary, etc., at Halifax. He says:

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Pictou, Nova Scotia, July 15, 1839.

SIR: I most respectfully beg leave to bring under the notice of the government the existing practice of collecting light-dues at the Strait of Canso.

American vessels bound to Pictou have this season been frequently fired at and brought to at that place by an armed boat and boarded by an officer armed with a cutlass and a brace of pistols, who has enforced payment of light dues. As but few of these vessels were provided with funds, the masters have been subjected to great inconvenience by being compelled in many instances to part with portions of their cargoes or ship's stores, and to pursue other objectionable courses to enable them to meet the demand, which I respectfully submit might be collected here where the consignees reside with as much safety to the revenue, and, as you will perceive by the inclosed affidavit, with less danger to strangers, who are led to commit acts seriously affecting the safety of their vessels through the misrepresentation of an officer claiming to be clothed with authority.

Will you do me the favor of informing me whether the collectors of light dues at the Strait of Canso act under the authority of the government of this province in levying that rate there on American vessels not bound to any port or place within the same?

The imposition of any tax by the Province of Nova Scotia upon American vessels engaged in the prosecution of the fisheries, using that passage in transitu, would appear to deprive it of the character of constituting a portion of the high seas.

With the greatest respect, I have the honor to be, sir,
Your most obedient and humble servant,

JAMES PRIMROSE,
Consul United States of America.

To Hon. Sir RUPERT D. GEORGE,
Provincial Secretary, etc., Halifax.

Mr. GRAY. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. MORGAN. It is dated July 15, 1839, and it is supported by an affidavit of E. G. Allen, setting forth the facts.

Mr. FRYE. There is no claim that they had not the right to pass through—no claim that it was not an open place.

Mr. MORGAN. It was a claim that the Strait of Canso was not a part of the high seas.

Mr. FRYE. It was a claim that they had a right to collect light dues.

Mr. MORGAN. That depends entirely on the other fact whether it was a part of the high seas. Now, let us see what Sir Rupert D. George had to say about that. He says:

With respect to the concluding paragraph of your letter of the 15th of July—

Which I have just read—

I have it in command to remark that his excellency—

That is the governor-general—

can not admit the character given to the Gut of Canso as a part of the high seas, until recognized by some authoritative decision, as the correctness of its application to that narrow passage lying entirely between the lands of this province may be questioned, more especially as an open communication around the eastern end of the island of Cape Breton is to be found on the high seas to the Gulf of St. Lawrence or any other point to which the Strait of Canso can be made subservient.

I take this opportunity to state that the case of the American schooner Amazon, which was the subject of your letter of the 25th of August, remains under consideration, all the information with respect to it which is desired not having yet been obtained.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

RUPERT D. GEORGE.

JAMES PRIMROSE, Esq.,
American Consul.

Nathan Briggs, master of the American schooner Altamaha, and E. G. Allen, master of the American brig Orleans, made affidavits in regard to the conduct of these people in excluding them and firing upon them, and as to their demand for light money.

Mr. Briggs's affidavit is:

Nathan Briggs, master of the American schooner Alatamaha, of New Bedford, maketh oath and sayeth that on the 19th day of June last past, while said vessel was passing through the Gut of Canso, down to Pictou, for a cargo of coal, Duncan McMillan, collector of light dues, came on board and demanded to see the Alatamaha's papers, and required payment of light dues. Deponent said he had no money, but would give an order on Pictou. McMillan, looking at the clearance, said: "You have no means of paying me on board," and requested deponent to give him a barrel of flour for light dues. Deponent made answer that he could not break bulk without subjecting himself to a penalty; on which McMillan replied that there was no duty payable on any article delivered to him in payment of light dues. Deponent believing, from the circumstance of a British flag flying in McMillan's boat, that he was an officer of government, and had a right to make such demand, gave him a barrel of flour, and took a receipt therefor, of which the following is a copy.

And so on. It is useless to multiply instances about this matter. One case proves the whole question, proves the whole subject, but there are numerous cases. The case of the brig Emerald, of Salem, Mass., was another one.

Roderick McKenzie, master of the brig Emerald, of Salem, in the State of Massachusetts, in the United States of America, maketh oath and sayeth that on Sunday morning last, the 22d instant, while the said brig was riding at anchor, wind bound, at the Strait of Canso, on her passage from Boston to Pictou, she was boarded by Duncan McMillan, who demanded to see the ship's papers, which were shown to him by deponent. The said McMillan then demanded from deponent 4*d.* per ton registered as light dues; but deponent informed him that he had not the means of discharging the claim there, but would pay it at Pictou.

McMillan then requested deponent to give him an order on some person at Pictou, which deponent declined to do, saying there was no person there on whom he had any authority to draw. McMillan then left the vessel. About six hours afterwards, when the said vessel was under sail for Pictou, she was boarded by three armed boats containing about sixteen men and taken possession of by the said McMillan, but was released on deponent's signing a note of hand, payable to the said McMillan or his order, on demand, for the amount of the light duty.

RODERICK McKENZIE.

Mr. Primrose, on the 18th of November, 1839, addressed Hon. John Forsyth on this subject. He says:

United States consul at Pictou to Mr. Forsyth.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES.
Pictou, November 18, 1839.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 1st ultimo, and to transmit herewith a copy of a letter which I have just received from the secretary of this province on the subjects which I brought under your notice in my last communication to you, dated the 10th ultimo.

Vessels of the United States trading to this port have paid upwards of $2,800 for "light dues" during the present year. The aggregate of the tax is greatly increased from the circumstance of its being also collected each voyage from all American fishing vessels (and they are very numerous) using the passage of Canso Strait.

The claim set up by the Province of Nova Scotia of an exclusive right to the Strait of Canso, is deserving of consideration. If this claim be admitted, the provincial government may at any time impose such restrictions on its navigation as would amount to a prohibition of its use as a commodious access to the fishing grounds in the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

In my letter to you (No. 11), dated the 11th March last, I anticipated the difficulties which the fishermen have subsequently experienced upon the coasts of this province. There can be no doubt that some of them were fairly chargeable with infringement of the treaty; I think it equally certain that the excess of zeal displayed by some of the provincial officers in the exercise of their authority has in certain cases led to unwarranted interference with the rights of the American fishermen, and the liberty of their vessels. I think it is absolutely necessary for their protection that there should in future be at least one small vessel of war commissioned to cruise on the fishing grounds during the summer months, commanded by an active and experienced officer, qualified by prudence and firmness to caution the fishermen against all violation of the treaty, and to guard them vigilantly from every improper molestation.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

JAMES PRIMROSE, Consul.

Hon. JOHN FORSYTH,
Secretary of State, Washington.

Mr. Vail, in quite an extended review of the difficulties which had been experienced prior to August 14, 1839, addressed a letter to the President of the United States, he then being the acting Secretary of State, from which I will read an extract:

From these statements it will appear that the only cases of seizure of which anything is known at the Department, not being made on the coasts of Newfoundland or Labrador, occurred at places in which, under the convention of 1818, the United States had forever renounced the right of their vessels to take, dry, and cure fish; retaining only the privilege of entering them for the purposes of shelter, repairs, purchasing wood and obtaining water, and no other. In the absence of information of a character sufficiently precise to ascertain either, on the one side, the real motives which carried the American vessels into British harbors, or, on the other, the reasons which induced the seizure by British authorities, the Department is unable to state whether, in the cases under consideration, there has been any flagrant infraction of the existing treaty stipulations. The presumption is, that if, on the part of citizens of the United States, there has been a want of caution or care in the strict observance of those stipulations, there has been, on the other hand, an equal disregard of their spirit, and of the friendly relations which they were intended to promote and perpetuate, in the haste and indiscriminate rigor with which the British authorities have acted.

Under the supposition that many of the seizures had been made upon insufficient grounds, and in order, if possible, to preclude for the future the recurrence of such proceedings, the acting Secretary of State, in a note dated the 10th of July, called the attention of the British minister to the cases of seizure, which had come to the knowledge of the Department, and requested him to direct the attention of the provincial authorities to the ruinous consequences of the seizures to the owners of the vessels, whatever might be the issue of the legal proceedings instituted against them; and to exhort them to exercise great caution and forbearance in future in order that American citizens, not manifestly encroaching upon British rights, should not be subjected to interruption in the pursuit of their lawful avocations.

The President's directions that a vessel of war of suitable force should be held in readiness to proceed to the coasts of the British provinces having been communicated to the Secretary of the Navy, an answer has been received that the schooner Grampus, now lying at Norfolk, would be prepared to proceed to that quarter at a moment's notice; and that, should it be the desire of the President that a vessel of higher class should be employed on that duty, a sloop of war can be detailed from the station at Pensacola, so as to be ready to sail at the end of this month.

Respectfully submitted.

A. VAIL, Acting Secretary of State.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Then again addressing Commodore Ghauncey, he says:

Acting Secretary of State to Acting Secretary of the Navy.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, August 9, 1839.

SIR: Several seizures of fishing vessels belonging to citizens of the United States having been made by British cruisers in the harbors and along the coasts of Nova Scotia, the President has ordered an inquiry into the subject, and has directed me to inform your Department that, for the purpose of protecting the rights and interests of our citizens in that quarter, a vessel of war, of suitable force, will soon be required to cruise off the coasts referred to.

I am, etc.,

A. VAIL, Acting Secretary.

Commodore I. CHAUNCEY,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. Forsyth took the subject up and addressed a letter to Mr. Stevenson, then our minister to Great Britain, in which he says:

Several cases of seizures and detention have, as was apprehended, occurred since the date of my letter, but none of those reported to the Department have been presented in a form to fulfill the expectations entertained that the Government would be enabled to found upon it a specific complaint against the conduct of the local authorities whilst protesting against the injurious operation of provincial law upon American interests brought involuntarily and unjustly within its jurisdiction.

The first article of the convention of 1818, between the United States and Great Britain which contains the treaty stipulations relating to the subject, is so explicit in its terms that it seems there would be little room for misapprehending them, and indeed it does not appear that any conflicting questions of rights between the two Governments have arisen out of differences of opinion between them regarding the intent and meaning of this article. Yet in the actual application of the provisions of the treaty, committed on the part of Great Britain to the hands of subordinate agents subject to and controlled by local legislation, difficulties growing out of individual acts have sprung up from time to time, and of these perhaps the most grave in their character are the recent seizures of American vessels made, it is believed, under color of a provincial law entitled "William IV, chapter 8, 1836," enacted doubtless with a view rigorously to restrict, if not intended directly to aim a fatal blow at our fisheries on the coast of Nova Scotia.

From the information in the possession of the Department, it appears that the provincial authorities assumed a right to exclude American vessels from all their bays, even including those of Fundy and Chaleurs, and to prohibit their approach within 3 miles of a line drawn from headland to headland.

These authorities also claim a right to exclude our vessels from resorting to their ports unless in actual distress, and American vessels are accordingly warned to depart or ordered to get under way and leave a harbor whenever the provincial custom-house or British naval officer supposes, without a full examination of the circumstances under which they entered, that they have been there a reasonable time.

Then he proceeds to argue his view of the convention after having stated the British view in a very clear way It might be very well for Senators here who are hypercritical in certain matters to attempt to take the distinction made by Mr. Forsyth in this letter between controversies with officers of the provinces and the questions treated by the treaty of 1818, which bring up cases of difficulty between the Governments. If Senators were disposed to do me, humble and unpretending and unpretentious as I am, that justice that is due from one gentleman to another, in reading the remarks which I had the honor to make to this honorable body in 1886 and 1887, they would see that I take there exactly the same distinction that Mr. Forsyth took in that case, that in respect of the treaty of 1818, as between the two Governments, it did not appear that it was necessary to have it amended as to the fundamental principles embodied in the treaty at all.

But whatever amendment was necessary was to be obtained by negotiation, as I thought and felt and so expressed myself, not in respect to the fundamental or organic principles contained in that treaty about which the Governments disagreed, but in respect to the mere manner of its application to the local interests and by the local population, the Canadian Government being the party on one side and individual Americans being the parties on the other. I have stated that fact heretofore, and have said as much about it now as I care to say. Senators can, if they choose, misunderstand it or misrepresent it as they please. I believe I am rectus in curia on that question. I have nothing now to excuse or to apologize for in what I have said here except this, that when I spoke on this subject before, in 1886 and 1887, I was speaking under that sort of embarrassment and restraint that I hope every Senator will feel under when he has to speak in anticipation of questions that may arise between this Government and some other government, and when he may feel that even his humble attitude or humble voice may be misconstrued by some foreign government into incorrect interpretations of concessions made by men on this floor.

For, after all, I do not know that I feel more honor in having a seat on this floor in any capacity that I have at all, than I do in being placed by the Constitution of the United States as one of the advisers of the President of the United States in the conduct of negotiations between this country and foreign countries. If there is any duty more delicate or more responsible than that I have failed to see it. And it is one that I have felt ought not to be exposed to general public criticism, and one the exercise of which I have always thought that I, among my colleagues, should have unembarrassed liberty.

But so it is; we have not got it to-day. We do not dare to enjoy it or proclaim it. The Senators of the United States here know that there are very important facts that are concealed by their own action in this case that they do not dare to reveal to the British Government, and even while I am here attempting to defend this treaty, I have to do it, not in the light of the facts as the American people will read them, but in the light of the facts as we know them in the secret archives of this body, the doors of which as to them are closed now by a majority vote of this body. That is the secret of the situation. I proclaim it to the people of the United States, and I defy any Senator on this floor to dispute the proposition. I cast my challenge at your feet now and ask you to take it up.

I do not wonder, Mr. President, at that great and sagacious statesman, Mr. Seward, when he cast his eyes back over this rough history of our transactions with Great Britain, and the almost impossibility of arranging matters even by negotiation in consequence of the interposition, under the treaty of 1818, of the local authority in the Canadian provinces, I do not wonder, when he cast his eye back, that he looked with trepidation—yes, with alarm—upon the termination of the reciprocity treaty of 1854, and provided, or attempted to provide, by the tender of this protocol which I read in my remarks to-day, to provide a modus vivendi at least until we got into ground where negotiation might smooth the way and make the final relations of Great Britain and Canada and the United States those of peace and satisfaction, instead of discord and trial.

I recur again to that proposition, from which I can not get away, that in the very nature of the fishery interests which we have in those coasts, the right being a joint proprietary right in the fisheries there, whose wealth has called forth the most eloquent portions of the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts, who quoted from more ancient authors still, that this interest so valuable, so complicated, so interwoven in every respect with the relations existing between the people of Canada and the United States can not be regulated except by agreement; the power of the human intellect and the power of government is inadequate to the task of making smooth, complete, and satisfactory arrangements for the future enjoyment and disposition of a right so intricate and so intimate as this is, where the rights of every man may depend in a large degree upon the conduct, and even the forbearance, of his neighbor.

The American Senate, the American Congress, and the American President may worry with this question for another century and there will be no solution of it in which justice will prevail or in which peace can be secured other than by friendly arrangement with those persons mutually interested with us in this valuable right. Tenants in common, even of a tract of land where they enjoy per my et per tout, can not regulate their affairs, there being no umpire to control them beyond their will; they can not regulate their affairs by the law of retaliation. The lex talionis has no place in connection with the rights and privileges between men, neither has it between nations, and whoever resorts to it resorts to a cause of continual aggravation and friction instead of one of peace, satisfaction, and beneficent results.

After Mr. Seward had failed to have his modus vivendi adopted, to which the British Government, after all, made but a very slight objection, and indicated that they had a will in that direction which could be easily influenced, these troubles arose again, as they will always arise from the very nature of the case—not any more from Canadian cupidity than from American aggression.

It is the case of two men jointly interested in a gold mine, where they have to sink a shaft and work out the veins—or the unwashed gravel—where their interests are those of tenants in common, but where each is working with his own bucket and his own pick. When they get into the mine and realize the golden harvest of course friction arises between them, and it rises to the magnitude to which every quarrel will, where there is the least ground of complaint of one against the other, and the common treasure is sought by rivals who dig side by side.

So it is with the fisheries. The Senator from Massachusetts describes to us the shores as absolutely lined with vast supplies of human food that congregate on the coast of Canada at certain seasons of the year. Under such circumstances there must be one of two things.

There must be either a court to whom the difficulties must be referred, with the power of absolute decision, or there must be a consentive arrangement guarantied by the sovereignty of both Governments and which neither feels that it can in honor violate. There is no court between Great Britain and the United States that can settle controversies of this kind. Each is a sovereign in its own right, and its representations, no less than its assertions, are taken as the words of sovereignty, and they have to be either obeyed or accommodated by some additional arrangement.

Here we are, Mr. President; there Mr. Seward was, there was the field he had before him. Here these difficulties came, rising like evil weeds from a fertile soil, as they must come and rise, from the very nature of the circumstances, though no man can tell who sowed the seed there. He had these difficulties, and he afterward proposed a modus vivendi almost in the very terms that Mr. Bayard has proposed here.

Then our friends the Republicans, having thorough mastery of the whole field; having a majority that was absolutely irresistible; a majority whose exploits in legislation are almost unparalleled by the worst hours of despotism under the British crown—no House of Commons ever went to a greater extent than those legislators did or had the power to go—they had the whole thing in their own hands. What did they do? They negotiated the treaty of 1871, and as has been argued here diligently and adroitly by the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], the distinguished diplomatist of this country, they have employed the fishery quarrel as a lever with which to pry Great Britain from its foundation and compel it to yield a settlement of the Alabama claims. Ah! what love of fishermen was there; what glory in their achievements in the war of 1812; what fond looking forward to national pride and prowess was in that arrangement, when the rights of the poor fishermen were confessedly taken and made a fulcrum for the lever by which to pry the Alabama claims into position for the benefit of the insurance companies!

The Republican party was then in its earliest years, almost in its infancy. If there is ever a chance in the world to sacrifice a poor man and his rights for the benefit of some rich corporation they never miss the opportunity, and the treaty of 1871, as characterized here by the Senator from New York and as argued laboriously and diligently by him, was intended for that very purpose. They were willing to promise to the Canadians that which resulted afterward in five and a half million dollars damages assessed against us for the use of the inshore fisheries. The Senator from Maine says they were not worth anything. The testimony in this book, to which I shall have occasion to refer during the short debate that we shall have about this matter—the witnesses in this book—all show they were of no value. Our commissioners at Halifax argued, and proved as we contend, that they were of little or no value. They took the inshore fisheries and agreed to pay the difference between the value of them and the value of the fisheries along our coast, and when the commission came to price it, it was five and a half million of dollars which we paid in order to get the opportunity to use the fishery rights—the rights of our fishermen—for the purpose of putting the Alabama claims on a proper foundation for the benefit of the insurance companies! The British people had no more right, when that treaty was negotiated, to any fishing privileges upon the coast of the United States than I have the right to enter the house of the Senator from Delaware and take his goods, wares, and merchandise.

But in order to get that treaty of 1871 what did you give? That which did not exist before—full fishing privileges down 39 degrees of north latitude; free fish and fish oil of all descriptions, and $5,500,000. Now, for what? What sort of response was that to these cases that lay open on the record of your diplomatic department unrepealed, unrequited, unavenged, unapologized for?

The Senator from Delaware very well says that the treaty of 1871 gave them the right to go into Chesapeake Bay and Delaware Bay, unless the sovereignty of the States of Delaware and Maryland prevented Congress from doing that—which I am quite sure is the fact.

That was the treaty of 1871, and that was the Republican expedient for getting rid of the honor of the country. They had plenty of chances then to fight for the flag. They had plenty of chances to rebuke Great Britain for the insults that lay thick in our history, for taunts made at our flag. They had a chance to repair the damages and wrong done to these various fishermen. But, sir, there was not even so much as a presentation of the claim. You say Mr. Bayard made no settlement in this last treaty of the claims in favor of American fishermen which have occurred since 1875. What settlement did you make of all that long list of claims, nearly three hundred of them, that existed before 1871? Instead of insisting on the honor of your flag, and instead of having these claims attended to and paid, you never made a single whimper of dissatisfaction about it, but went on and gave Great Britain more than she had ever claimed before—in fisheries, free fish, and oil, and in money $5,500,000—to buy your peace! Yet you complain of us now for not aggravating and pushing this country suddenly into a war for all this long historical catalogue of supine neglect of the interests and welfare of the people of the United States.

You made the treaty of 1871. After awhile General Grant found out that that treaty was likely to be a bad thing, and he negotiated a treaty with Great Britain, to Article XIV of which I desire to call the especial attention of the Senate. It reads as follows:

ARTICLE XIV.

When the ratifications of this treaty shall have been exchanged, and the laws required to carry it into operation shall have been passed by the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain and by the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada on the one hand, and by the Congress of the United States on the other, then Articles XXII, XXIII, XXIV, and XXV of the treaty of May 8, 1871, between Great Britain and the United States shall become null and void.

What were those articles? Providing for the payment of cash indemnity for the difference in the value of the fisheries, inshore, of the United States and Canada. By that you would have saved the five and a half millions that you have squandered, either in your fright about British power or in your desire to make money for your big corporations and your rich ship-owners by getting hold of some compensation for the Alabama claims.

General Grant had the sagacity to see this. The Senate of the United States, then almost exclusively Republican, rejected it. They failed to take the advice of that wise and able man and statesman, who, though not born in an atmosphere of law, nevertheless grasped the great fundamental and organic principles of constitutional liberty, and also of law, like Napoleon grasped them, who held high rank among the jurists of France as he did among the soldiers of the world.

General Grant saw the evil day, and while he did not hide himself he undertook to ask you Republicans to do something for the relief of your country, but, instead of that, you took the other chute, the other tack, and, of your own voluntary accord, you put fish on the free-list—"fresh fish for immediate consumption."

Why did you do that? With all your love for the fisherman, with all your desire for his welfare, why did you take from him that which you now say was the only thing in the world that would do him any good—a tariff on fish? You took the duty off fresh fish and let it flood the country as much as the Canadians desired; made it all to be free that they or ourselves might bring. The Senator from Maine says that they did not know then that they were going to invent the freezing process. That is to say, that by Yankee ingenuity—for I expect it was by Yankee ingenuity—they found out that by getting the fish frozen up in those northern waters, upon the coasts of Nova Scotia and Labrador, they could pack them, salt them, or dry them, and send them off into the interior, from Maine and Massachusetts, and escape the payment of duty and get their fresh fish as many as they desired.

But, as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] yesterday suggested, it was found out that the people in the interior of the country were going to get some benefit from this and that it would not operate as a monopoly in favor of the men living right on the coast. At that moment you commenced an outcry against the work of your own hands, and have been quarreling ever since because you could not get a tariff on fresh fish. You will not get it back as long as you live. The people of the United States will not put it back. All this clamor and humbug that is being raised in the United States now is, by indirection or by threat of retaliation, to get a duty back on fresh fish coming into the United States.

Mr. BECK. If the Senator will allow me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. If the Senator will allow me I will make a suggestion to him. A tariff bill has been before the House of Representatives for six months, and no man from New England or elsewhere has ventured to ask a restoration of duty on fresh fish. I have examined the RECORD this morning as carefully as I can, and so far from a duty being imposed upon fresh fish, I am unable to find that anybody ventured to ask it. In this connection, if the Senator from Alabama will allow me, I would like to ask—because I have had some difficulty about it—this question: Since the law was passed last year, authorizing the President to interfere with our intercourse with Canada and Great Britain in certain contingencies, since we have made fresh fish free by the laws of the United States, and the House of Representatives, in the bill that it has passed and sent to us, has refused to impose any tax upon it or any inhibition against its introduction, I ask the Senator from Alabama whether he thinks the proper construction of that act which we passed giving the President authority to intervene, if he saw fit, with Canadian trade, and to prohibit it, if he saw fit, does or does not confine the President to his constitutional right to declare prohibition or non-intercourse generally? In other words, when the tariff laws of the United States themselves declare that fresh fish shall come in free of duty, and the Constitution vests in the House of Representatives the sole power to originate bills to impose or remove taxes, and neither the President nor the Senate can intervene, and when the House has considered that matter carefully, and no man, even from New England, has ventured to ask to have fresh fish taxed or prohibited, the question is whether either the Senate or the President can interfere to tax what the American Congress has declared shall be free?

Further, if the President intervenes at all he must intervene in some general way—stop the subsidy that Vermont is getting from a Canadian railroad—interfere with governmental affairs if he interfere at all, but not interfere with the tax laws of the United States when the House of Representatives, which has the authority, has already refused to do it. That is a proposition that I would like to hear the Senator on.

Mr. MORGAN. The President of the United States when he was addressed by Mr. Steele, the chairman of, I believe, the American Fisheries Association——

Mr. BECK. I have his letter here.

Mr. MORGAN. The President made a reply to that letter which has given a great deal of concern and disturbance to those very sagacious legislators—who have been putting up the smartest job that has ever been put up on the American people—there is no doubt about that; you can congratulate yourselves upon it——

Mr. HOAR. We congratulate you on your politeness.

Mr. MORGAN. Please excuse me now. I can not afford to stop every time you get excited.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOAR. Nobody has interfered with the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. In trying through the treaty-making power in that way to put a prohibition on the introduction of free fish into this country from Canadian waters, to get rid of the trouble which they had put into the statute-book by making fresh fish free. Now, Mr. Steele, in order to get the advantage of this wonderfully astute act of Congress, as it now turns out to be, or was intended to be, in its operations, addressed a letter to the President of the United States in which he insists that inasmuch as a row had been raised about fresh fish, and about that especially, that when the President should come to declare non-intercourse with Canada, he must limit his non-intercourse to fresh fish.

That shows what everybody was conscious of, that this is a mere artifice, a mere piece of finesse to get fish back, so that a few gentlemen who own vessels up there can have a monopoly of the fish food supply in the United States. It is a monopoly attended with many ramifying trusts, which have been built up on that coast, and which have been thoroughly exposed, with indisputable evidence, by the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] in his remarks the other day. I will ask the Secretary to be kind enough to read the reply of the President to that request, and we will then see the bearings of the whole subject.

The Secretary read as follows:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, D. C., April 7, 1887.

GENTLEMEN: I have received your letter lately addressed to me, and have given full consideration to the expression of the views and wishes therein contained in relation to the existing differences between the Government of Great Britain and the United States growing out of the refusal to award to our citizens engaged in fishing enterprises the privileges to which they are entitled either under treaty stipulations or the guaranties of international comity and neighborly concession. I sincerely trust the apprehension you express of unjust and unfriendly treatment of American fishermen lawfully found in Canadian waters will not be realized; but if such apprehension should prove to be well founded, I earnestly hope that no fault or inconsiderate action of any of our citizens will in the least weaken the just position of our Government, or deprive us of the universal sympathy and support to which we should be entitled.

The action of this Administration since June, 1885, when the fishery articles of the treaty of 1871 were terminated under the notification which had two years before been given by our Government, has been fully disclosed by the correspondence between the representatives and the appropriate departments of the respective Governments, with which I am apprised by your letter you are entirely familiar. An examination of this correspondence has doubtless satisfied you that in no case have the rights or privileges of American fishermen been overlooked or neglected, but that, on the contrary, they have been sedulously insisted upon and cared for by every means within the control of the executive branch of the Government.

The act of Congress approved March 3, 1887, authorizing a course of retaliation, through executive action, in the event of a continuance on the part of the British-American authorities of unfriendly conduct and treaty violations affecting American fishermen, has devolved upon the President of the United States exceedingly grave and solemn responsibilities, comprehending highly important consequences to our national character and dignity, and involving extremely valuable commercial intercourse between the British possessions in North America and the people of the United States.

I understand the main purpose of your letter is to suggest that, in case recourse to the retaliatory measures authorized by this act should be invited by unjust treatment of our fishermen in the future, the object of such retaliation might be fully accomplished by "prohibiting Canadian-caught fish from entry into the ports of the United States."

The existing controversy is one in which two nations are the parties concerned. The retaliation contemplated by the act of Congress is to be enforced, not to protect solely any particular interest, however meritorious or valuable, but to maintain the national honor, and thus protect all our people.

In this view the violation of American fishery rights and unjust or unfriendly acts towards a portion of our citizens engaged in this business is but the occasion for action, and constitutes a national affront which gives birth to or may justify retaliation. This measure once resorted to, its effectiveness and value may well depend upon the thoroughness and extent of its application; and in the performance of international duties, the enforcement of international rights, and the protection of our citizens, this Government and the people of the United States must act as a unit, all intent upon attaining the best result of retaliation upon the basis of a maintenance of national honor and duty.

The nation seeking by any means to maintain its honor, dignity, and integrity, is engaged in protecting the rights of the people; and if, in such efforts, particular interests are injured and special advantages forfeited, these things should be patriotically borne for the public good. An immense volume of population, manufactures, and agricultural productions, and the marine tonnage and railways to which these have given activity, all largely the result of intercourse between the United States and British America, and the natural growth of a full half century of good neighborhood and friendly communication, form an aggregate of material wealth and incidental relation of most impressive magnitude. I fully appreciate these things, and am not unmindful of the great number of our people who are concerned in such vast and diversified interests.

In the performance of the serious duty which Congress has imposed upon me, and in the exercise, upon just occasion, of the power conferred under the act referred to, I shall deem myself bound to inflict no unnecessary damage or injury upon any portion of our people; but I shall, nevertheless, be unflinchingly guided by a sense of what the self-respect and dignity of the nation demand. In the maintenance of these and in the support of the honor of the Government, beneath which every citizen may repose in safety, no sacrifice of personal or private interests shall be considered as against the general welfare.

Yours, very truly,

GROVER CLEVELAND.

GEORGE STEELE,
President American Fishery Union, and others, Gloucester, Mass.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, that is a broad, statesmanlike, and patriotic answer to Mr. Steele, who desired that retaliation should be limited only to the introduction of fish; and it is also in substance an answer to the question which was suggested by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

But I shall proceed further than that. I do not understand that the act of 1887 was intended to repeal all the tariff laws of the United States or to repeal them as to Canada or the British dominions in that direction. I gather from the general drift of our tariff legislation that prohibition is regarded even by the highest protectionists as being an unconstitutional resort; that except as to articles that are in themselves calculated to damage the country, such as immoral books or diseased or adulterated subjects of commerce, the doctrine of prohibition is not contained in our system; it has no place there; it has no recognition. .

The legislative tendency of the United States, which of course the President would be bound to respect in enforcing a proclamation of non-intercourse, is one that seeks to levy upon all articles that come in here some rate of duty, some higher and some lower, the purpose ultimately being to make the people of the United States as largely and as broadly as possible bear the burdens of the support of the Federal Government. The President would doubtless find himself constrained to have some respect for that legislative instruction or that legislative declaration. He would not think that he had the right of his own motion and contrary to the spirit of our statutes upon the subject of tariff legislation, to assume a responsibility and a burden which belongs by the Constitution to the House of Representatives to originate tariff laws and to reduce revenue by admitting articles free of duty. So, consulting the spirit of legislation, and particularly the very emphatic part of the Constitution which prescribes that the House of Representatives shall originate all measures of taxation, he would very naturally look to our tariff laws as furnishing a broad field for the operation of any proclamation of prohibition or exclusion to which he might see proper to resort.

There is another splendid example to which he could refer, and that is the recommendation of President Grant of the treaty which was negotiated in 1874 and rejected by the Senate, in which, as I have several times observed, there was a very broad reciprocity. Without reading that treaty I shall put it entire, with the permission of the Senate, in my remarks, so that the country can have the benefit of General Grant's message and of the treaty he negotiated and assented to upon the subject:

Message from the President of the United States, transmitting a draught of a treaty for the reciprocal regulations of the commerce and trade between the United States and Canada, with provisions for the enlargement of the Canadian canals, and for their use by the United States vessels on terms of equality with British vessels, together with a report from the Secretary of State.

JUNE 18, 1874.—Read; treaty read the first time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and, together with the message and accompanying document, ordered to be printed in confidence for the use of the Senate.

To the Senate of the United States:

The plenipotentiaries of Her Britannic Majesty at Washington have submitted to the Secretary of State, for my consideration, a draught of a treaty for the reciprocal regulation of the commerce and trade between the United States and Canada, with provisions for the enlargement of the Canadian canals, and for their use by United States vessels on terms of equality with British vessels. I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, with a copy of the draught thus proposed.

I am of the opinion that a proper treaty for such purposes would result beneficially for the United States. It would not only open or enlarge markets for our productions, but it would increase the facilities of transportation from the grain-growing States of the West to the seaboard.

The proposed draught has many features to commend it to our favorable consideration; but whether it makes all the concessions which could justly be required of Great Britain, or whether it calls for more concessions from the United States than we should yield, I am not prepared to say.

Among its provisions are articles proposing to dispense with the arbitration respecting fisheries, which was provided for by the treaty of Washington in the event of the conclusion and ratification of the treaty, and the passage of all the necessary legislation to enforce it.

These provisions, as well as other considerations, make it desirable that this subject should receive attention before the close of the present session. I therefore express an earnest wish that the Senate may be able to consider and determine, before the adjournment of Congress, whether it will give its constitutional concurrence to the conclusion of a treaty with Great Britain for the purposes already named, either in such form as is proposed by the British plenipotentiaries or in such other more acceptable form as the Senate may prefer.

U. S. GRANT.

WASHINGTON, June 18, 1874.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 17, 1874.

I have the honor to inclose a copy of the draught of a treaty for the reciprocal regulations of the commerce and trade between the United States and Canada, with provisions for the enlargement of the Canadian canals and for their use by United States vessels on terms of equality with British vessels, which the British plenipotentiaries have proposed to this Government.

HAMILTON FISH.

The PRESIDENT.

Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain and the United States of America, being desirous of improving the commerce and navigation between their respective territories and people, and more especially between Her Majesty's possessions in North America and the United States, in such manner as to render the same reciprocally beneficial, have respectively named plenipotentiaries to confer and agree thereupon, that is to say:

* * * * * * *

who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

It is agreed by the high contracting parties that, in addition to the liberty secured to the United States fishermen by the convention between the United States and Great Britain, signed at London on the 20th day of October, 1818, of taking, curing, and drying fish on certain coasts of the British North American colonies therein defined, the inhabitants of the United States shall have, in common with the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, the liberty, for the term of years mentioned in Article XIII of this treaty, to take fish of every kind, except shellfish, on the sea coasts and shores, and in the bays, harbors, and creeks of the Provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island, and of the several islands thereunto adjacent, without being restricted to any distance from the shore, with permission to land upon the said coasts and shores and islands, and also upon the Magdalen Islands, for the purpose of drying their nets and curing their fish, provided that, in so doing, they do not interfere with the rights of private property or with British fishermen in the peaceable use of any part of said coasts in their occupancy for the same purpose.

It is understood that the above-mentioned liberty applies solely to the sea fishery; and that the salmon and shad fisheries, and all other fisheries in rivers and mouths of rivers, are hereby reserved exclusively for British fishermen.

ARTICLE II.

It is agreed by the high contracting parties that British subjects shall have, in common with the citizens of the United States the liberty, for the term of years mentioned in Article XIII of this treaty, to take fish of every kind, except shellfish, on the eastern sea coasts and shores of the United States north of the thirty-ninth parallel of north latitude, and on the shores of the several islands thereunto adjacent, and in the bays, harbors, and creeks of the said sea coasts and shores of the United States and of the said islands, without being restricted to any distance from the shore, with permission to land upon the said coasts of the United States and of the islands aforesaid, for the purpose of drying their nets and curing their fish; provided that in so doing they do not interfere with the rights of private property or with the fishermen of the United States in the peaceable use of any part of the said coasts in their occupancy for the same purpose.

It is understood that the above-mentioned liberty applies solely to the sea-fishery, and that salmon and shad fisheries, and all other fisheries in rivers and mouths of rivers, are hereby reserved exclusively for fishermen of the United States.

ARTICLE III.

It is agreed that the places designated by the commissioners appointed under the first article of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain concluded at Washington on the 5th day of June, 1854, upon the coasts of Her Britannic Majesty's dominions and the United States, as places reserved from the common right of fishing under that treaty, shall be regarded as in like manner reserved from the common right of fishing under the preceding articles. In case any question should arise between the Governments of the United States and of Her Britannic Majesty as to the common right of fishing in places not thus designated as reserved, it is agreed that a commission shall be appointed to designate such places, and shall be constituted in the same manner, and have the same powers, duties, and authority as the commission appointed under the said first article of the treaty of the 5th of June, 1854.

ARTICLE IV.

It is agreed that the articles enumerated in the Schedules A, B, and C hereunto annexed, being the growth, produce, or manufacture of the Dominion of Canada or of the United States, shall, on their importation from the one country into the other, from the 1st day of July, 1875, to the 30th day of June, 1876 (both included), pay only two-thirds of the duties payable at the date of this treaty on the importations into such country of such articles respectively; and from the 1st day of July, 1876, to the 30th day of June, 1877 (both included), shall pay only one-third of such duties; and on and after the 1st day of July, 1877, for the period of years mentioned in Article XIII of this treaty, shall be admitted free free of duty into each country respectively.

For the term mentioned in Article XIII no other or higher duty shall be imposed in the United States upon other articles not enumerated in said schedules, the growth, produce, or manufacture of Canada, or in Canada upon such other articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, than are, respectively, imposed upon like articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of Great Britain, or of any other country.

Schedule A.

Consisting of the following natural products:

Animals of all kinds.
Ashes, pot, pearl, and soda.
Bark.
Bark extract, for tanning purposes.
Bath-bricks.
Breadstuffs of all kinds.
Bricks for building, and fire-bricks.
Broom-corn.
Burr or grind stones, hewed, wrought, or unwrought.
Butter.
Cheese.
Coal and coke.
Cotton-wool.
Cotton-waste.
Dye-stuffs.
Earths, clays, ochers, sand, ground or unground.
Eggs.
Fish of all kinds.
Fish, products of, and of all other creatures living in the water, except fish preserved in oil.
Fire-wood.
Flax, unmanufactured.
Flour and meals of all kinds.
Fruits, green or dried.
Furs, undressed.
Grain of all kinds.
Gypsum, ground, unground, or calcined.
Hay.
Hemp, unmanufactured.
Hides.
Horns.
Lard.
Lime.
Malt.
Manures.
Marble, stone, slate, or granite, wrought or unwrought.
Meats, fresh, smoked, or salted.
Ores of all kinds of metals.
Pelts.
Pease, whole or split.
Petroleum-oil, crude, refined, or benzole.
Pitch.
Plants.
Poultry and birds of all kinds.
Rags of all kinds.
Rice.
Salt.
Seeds.
Shrubs.
Skins.

Iron nails, spikes, bolts, tacks, brads, or sprigs.
Iron castings.
India-rubber belting and tubing.
Locomotives for railways, or parts thereof.
Lead, sheet or pig.
Leather, sole or upper.
Leather, harness and saddlery of.
Mill, or factory, or steam-boat fixed engines and machines, or parts thereof.
Manufactures of marble, stone, slate, or granite.
Manufactures of wood solely or wood nailed, bound, hinged, or locked with metal materials.
Mangles, washing-machines, wringing-machines, and drying-machines, or parts thereof.
Printing-paper for newspapers.
Paper-making machines, or parts thereof.
Printing-type, presses, and folders, paper-cutters, ruling-machines, page-numbering machines, and stereotyping and electrotyping apparatus, or parts thereof.
Refrigerators, or parts thereof.
Railroad-cars, carriages, and trucks, or parts thereof.
Satinets of wool and cotton.
Steam-engines, or parts thereof.
Steel, wrought or cast, and steel plates and rails.
Tin tubes and piping.
Tweeds of wool solely.
Water-wheel machines and apparatus, and parts thereof.

ARTICLE V.

It is agreed that the Canadian canals on the main route from Lake Erie to Montreal shall be enlarged forthwith at the expense of the Dominion of Canada, so as to admit the passage of vessels drawing 12 feet of water, and the locks on the said canals shall be made of not less than 270 feet in length, 45 feet width, and not less than 12 feet depth on the miter-sill; and that the channel of the St. Lawrence River shall be deepened in the several reaches between the canals, whenever the same may be necessary, so as to allow the free passage of vessels drawing 12 feet of water. And the work engaged to be done in this article shall be completed by the 1st day of January, 1880.

ARTICLE VI.

It is agreed that the Government of Canada shall construct, on or before the 1st day of January, 1880, a canal to connect the St. Lawrence River at some convenient point, at or near Caughnawaga, with Lake Champlain. The dimensions of said canal shall be such as to admit the passage of vessels drawing 12 feet of water; and the lock shall be of no less dimensions than those named in the preceding article. And the United States engage to urge upon the government of the State of New York to cause the existing canal from Whitehall, on Lake Champlain, to Albany to be enlarged, and, if necessary, extended, or another canal or canals to be constructed of equal capacity with the proposed Caughnawaga Canal, as hereinbefore specified, and the navigation of the Hudson River to be improved, so as to admit the passage from Lake Champlain to the lower waters of the Hudson River of vessels drawing 12 feet of water.

ARTICLE VII.

Citizens of the United States may, during the term of years mentioned in Article VIII of this treaty, carry in their vessels cargo and passengers from one Canadian port to another on the Great Lakes or river St. Lawrence. Reciprocally, inhabitants of Canada, subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, may, during the like period, carry in their vessels cargo and passengers from one port of the United States on the Great Lakes or river St. Lawrence to another on the said lakes or river. Citizens of the United States in their vessels, and inhabitants of Canada, subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, in their vessels, may, during the like term, carry cargo and passengers from any port of the United States or of Canada on the Red River, or the waters connecting therewith, to any other port on the said river, or waters connecting therewith.

ARTICLE VIII.

It is agreed that, for the term of years mentioned in Article XIII of this treaty, the citizens of the United States shall enjoy the use of the Welland, the St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion of Canada (including the proposed Caughnawaga Canal), on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion of Canada; and that, without interfering with the right of the Government of Canada to impose such tolls on the aforesaid Canadian canals respectively as it may think fit, the tolls shall be levied in relation to the number of the locks in each canal, without any drawback or discrimination, whatever the destination of the vessel, or whether one or more canal or canals, or part of a canal, be passed.

And it is also agreed that for the like term of years the inhabitants of Canada shall enjoy the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States; and that the navigation of Lake Champlain and of Lake Michigan shall be free and open for the purposes of commerce to the inhabitants of Canada, subject to any laws or regulations of the United States or of the States bordering thereon, respectively, not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation.

And the United States further engage to urge upon the governments of the States of New York and of Michigan to secure to the inhabitants of Canada the use of the Erie, the Whitehall, the Sault Sainte Marie Canals, and of any enlarged or extended or new canal or other improvement connecting Lake Champlain with the lower waters of the Hudson River which may be made, as contemplated in Article VI, on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

And it is mutually agreed that full power shall be given and allowed to transship cargo from vessels into canal-boats, and from canal-boats into vessels, at either terminus of every canal.

And, further, that if the use of the Erie and Whitehall or other canal connecting Lake Champlain with the lower waters of the Hudson River, and of Sault Sainte Marie Canal, be not granted to the inhabitants of Canada on terms of equality with the citizens of the United States, as contemplated in this article, then the use of the proposed Caughnawaga Canal by citizens of the United States, as above contemplated, shall be suspended and cease until the use of the said canals in the United States shall be secured to the inhabitants of Canada, as above contemplated.

ARTICLE IX.

For the term of years mentioned in Article XIII of this treaty, vessels of all kinds built in the United States may be purchased by inhabitants of Canada subjects of Great Britain, and registered in Canada as Canadian vessels; and, reciprocally, vessels of all kinds built in Canada may be purchased by citizens of the United States, and registered in the United States as United States vessels.

ARTICLE X.

A joint commission shall be established and maintained at joint expense during the operation of this treaty for advising the erection and proper regulation of all light-houses on the great lakes, common to both countries, necessary to the security of the shipping thereon.

ARTICLE XI.

A joint commission shall also be established at joint expense, and maintained during the continuance of the treaty, to promote the propagation of fish in the inland waters common to both countries, and to enforce the law enacted for the protection of the fish and fishing-grounds.

ARTICLE XII.

It is further agreed that the provisions and stipulations of this treaty shall extend to the colony of Newfoundland so far as they are applicable. But if the Imperial Parliament, the Legislature of Newfoundland, or the Congress of the United States shall not embrace the colony of Newfoundland in their laws enacted for carrying the foregoing articles into effect, then this article shall be of no effect; but the omission to make provision by law to give it effect by either of the legislative bodies aforesaid shall not in any way impair any other articles of this treaty.

ARTICLE XIII.

This treaty shall take effect as soon as the laws required to carry it into operation shall have been passed by the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain and by the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada on the one hand and by the Congress of the United States on the other. If such legislative assent shall not have been given within — months from the date hereof, then this treaty shall be null and void. But such legislative assent having been given, this treaty shall remain in force for the period of twenty-one years from the date at which it shall come into operation, and further until the expiration of three years after either of the high contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same, each of the high contracting parties being at liberty to give such notice to the other at the end of said period of twenty-one years, or at any time afterward.

ARTICLE XIV.

When the ratifications of this treaty shall have been exchanged, and the laws required to carry it into operation shall have been passed by the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain and by the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada on the one hand and by the Congress of the United States on the other, then Articles XXII, XXIII, XXIV, and XXV of the treaty of May 8, 1871, between Great Britain and the United States shall become null and void.

ARTICLE XV.

This treaty shall be duly ratified by Her Britannic Majesty and by the President of the United States, and the ratifications shall be exchanged either at Washington or at London within — months from the date hereof, or earlier, if possible.

General Grant saw a cure for the evils and difficulties between us and Canada in this very broad reciprocity. As a matter of course when his own party desert his faith and retire from the recommendations he made to them in his wisdom, and take a different tack entirely and resort to the compulsion that is to be found in proclamations of non-intercourse, the President of the United States now in office, I am very glad to know, would be in a large degree influenced by the extent and breadth of that reciprocity when he came to deny to the people of Canada the benefit of our market. He would say to them, "You have violated our national rights in violating the rights of fishermen; you have insulted our national flag; if you insulted it upon the deck or upon the spars of a fishing-ship you have inflicted injury upon the whole body of the American people; if you have denied justice and right to a single fisherman it becomes at once the quarrel of the whole people of the United States, and the people of all the different sections and climates in this country interested in all the various industries ought to be willing patriotically, and are willing, to come forward and make whatever of sacrifice is necessary in order to correct this evil which the Congress of the United States has said must be corrected now by retaliation." Sir, the letter of the President to Mr. Steele covers the whole ground.

Mr. GRAY. Would it interrupt the Senator from Alabama if in the line of remark which he is now making I called his attention and the attention of the Senate to the fact that in 1853, during the debates which were then provoked in the Senate of the United States by the seizures of American vessels and the troubles to and harassments of American fishermen that preceded the reciprocity treaty of 1854, Senator Davis, of Massachusetts, a man of eminence and character in the councils of the nation, a trusted son of his State and especially devoted to the advocacy and championship of the fishery interest of his State, thought that the wisest thing he could do to compose the difficulties which were then rife would be to introduce and secure the passage of a bill, which, if the Senator from Alabama will indulge me, I shall read, as it is a short one. This is the bill which Senator Davis, of Massachusetts, introduced, and the passage of which he advocated:

A bill to regulate the rights of fishing and the rights of disposing of the proceeds of the fisheries in and between the British North American provinces and the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the President of the United States shall receive satisfactory evidence that the fishermen and fishing vessels of the United States are admitted to the common rights and privileges of British subjects resident in the British North American provinces of Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward's Island, and Newfoundland, to fish in the waters thereof, and adjacent thereto, together with the right of curing [and] upon the water and the land, preparing for the market, and selling therein, the proceeds of such fisheries [both upon the water and the land], then he shall issue his proclamation authorizing the fishermen resident in said North American provinces and fishing vessels of said provinces to enjoy like privileges in the waters of the United States, together with the privilege of entering the ports of entry in the United States and making sale of fish and the proceeds of [the fisheries] fishing upon the payment of the same duties which are required by law of the fishing vessels and their cargoes belonging to the United States: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall affect private rights of fishing, or give any right to occupy private property except upon agreement.

I think a recurrence to this proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts at that day gives some point to the contention made by the Senator from Alabama, that this excitement over the matter of free fish, over the mere offer contained in the fifteenth article of this treaty on the part of Great Britain and Canada that they will grant specific privileges to American fishermen whenever the Congress of the United States shall see fit to take the duty off Canadian fish, which has been exhibited on the part of Senators who have discussed this feature of the treaty, seems a little out of place, seems to need explanation, when we find that not only General Grant, when he was President, was quite willing that Canadian fish should come in free upon certain terms and conditions, but that a Senator from Massachusetts, coming from a State in which these fishing interests are so large, and presumably faithful to that interest as one of the interests of his constituents, should also have proposed by the bill which I have just read to have made fish free, and to have given to Canadian fishermen the right to fish in all the waters of the United States without any reservation, except that they should not interfere with private property.

So it would seem that when it suits the convenience of gentlemen who are so nearly allied to these fishing interests, and who have such intimate relations to them, to talk about free fish and propose the remission of our duties there is no special excitement and no harm done; but when this Administration, taking a different view of its duties from any preceding administration, more strict in its construction of executive power, has said to the Canadian and British negotiators: "We have no right to discuss with you even the matter of free fish, because it is a matter of the revenue of the United States and belongs to the legislative department of this Government, but if you choose you may make your offer to the American people and the Congress of the United States; the people will deal with it as they see that their interests require it should be dealt with"—I say when this merely is done, it is surprising and intolerable that the Executive should be denounced in unmeasured terms when we have before us in what the Senator from Alabama has read in the proposed treaty by General Grant, the actual negotiation of the treaty of 1871, and this bill proposed by a Massachusetts Senator in 1853, the fact clearly portrayed here to the Senate that free fish after all is not the bugbear which some Senators would have us believe that it is, or the threatened injury to our interests which they pretend that it may be.

Mr. MORGAN. I have now followed Mr. Seward and General Grant through their endeavors to assuage and modify the situation as it was created by the treaty of 1854 and by the treaty of 1871 and by the intermediate relapses we had to suffer in going back upon the hard lines of the treaty of 1818; and I think I have shown a sufficient precedent to justify the present Administration, if it wanted any precedent for its action, in a feeling of reciprocal agreement between our country and Great Britain for the composure and ultimate settlement of the vexatious questions which have arisen under the treaty of 1818. I now approach that branch of the subject where it devolved upon the Democratic party of the United States, with its President, to handle these questions, and I feel assured that I shall be able to show, not by argumentation but by facts, that this Administration has done very much better in the arrangement of our treaty relations with Great Britain than has been attempted even by any preceding administration.

But that branch of the subject I shall defer until we get into the discussion of the treaty itself. What I propose to deal with is the three protocols, the first one offered by Mr. Seward to the British Government, the second offered by Mr. West in behalf of the British Government to our Government, and the third one offered in the present treaty of 1888 by the British plenipotentiaries to the Government of the United States.

A great deal has been said of a very abusive character in regard to the negotiation of this protocol between Mr. Bayard and Mr. West in 1885. It has been asserted, very boldly indeed, that there was no justification for it in fact, and that the Constitution did not bear Mr. Bayard out in any offer to arrange a modus vivendi with Mr. West for the purpose of closing up the fishing season of 1885.

It has often occurred to my mind as a curious question why it was that the time at which we gave notice of the termination of the treaty of 1871 should have been fixed so as to fall immediately within the fishing season of 1885. Was that a blunder, or was there some design in it? Take it either way it would be very unfortunate, but I shall treat it simply as a blunder. I shall treat it as an occurrence which, in our hot haste to get rid of the treaty of 1871, for which there was then great pressure, and to reach a state of affairs where we could resume the effort to impose a duty upon fresh fish, we unfortunately put the termination of that treaty just in the midst of the fishing season. Whether that was a blunder or not, it put the present Administration in a very narrow strait. It found the fishing season closed at a time when Congress was not in session, and could not be unless an extra session of Congress had been called; it was after the 4th of March and before the first Monday in December.

The President of the United States had no one to appeal to or to advise with in order to gather what was the American opinion or the American wish in respect of this matter. Left entirely alone by what appears to have been a prearrangement so that the fishing season would be broken in half—one half of it controlled by the treaty of 1871 and the other half controlled by the treaty of 1818—he was obliged to resort to the best means of finishing out that season. Was he to assemble Congress in extraordinary session in order to get its approbation to a modus vivendi which would enable him to close that fishing season without detriment and without disaster to our fishermen, or was he to assume that he should have in the minds and the hearts of those whom he was trying to benefit some little degree of indulgence and allowance for a patriotic effort to preserve their rights and to keep the peace of the country? Mr. Seward had the opportunity and availed himself of it—being then the representative of an administration in power at the time that the treaty of 1854 was expiring—to anticipate what the result would be and to propose to the British Government a modus vivendi which they might accept at the termination of that treaty.

Mr. Cleveland had no such opportunity as that. The Republican party had charge of the Government up to the 4th of March, 1885, and they broke the subject in two, as I have observed, leaving one-half the period of fishing for that season controlled by one treaty and the other half controlled by a treaty that was as much a stranger to it as the Koran is to the New Testament.

Mr. Bayard thereupon, really not of his own motion, but in reply to a suggestion made by Sir Lionel Sackville West, took into consideration the propriety of entering upon a modus vivendi. Mr. West, in a memorandum dated March 12, 1885, said:

1.—Mr. West's memorandum of March 12, 1885.

[Memorandum.—Confidential.]

The fishery clauses of the treaty of Washington of 1871 will expire on the 1st of July next. It has been represented by the Canadian Government that much inconvenience is likely to arise in consequence, unless some agreement can be made for an extension of the period.

When the time comes (1st of July next) American ships will be actually engaged in fishing within the territorial waters of the Dominion. These vessels will have been fitted out for the season's fishing and have made all their usual arrangements for following it up until its termination in the autumn. If, under these circumstances, the provincial or municipal authorities in Canada were to insist upon their strict rights, and to compel such vessels, under pain of seizure, to desist from fishing, considerable hardship would be occasioned to the owners, and a feeling of bitterness engendered on both sides, which it is clearly the interest of both Governments to avert.

It seems, therefore, desirable, in order to avoid such possible complications, that both Governments should come to an agreement under which the clauses might be in effect extended until the 1st of January, 1886.

If this were done, the existing state of things would come to an end at a date between the fishery season of 1885 and that of 1886, and an abrupt transition at a moment when fishery operations were being carried on would be thus avoided.

[Memorandum of April 22, 1885.—Personal.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 22, 1885.

DEAR MR. WEST: I have on several occasions lately, in conversation, acquainted you with my interest in the fisheries memorandum which accompanied your personal letter of March 12.

Several informal talks I have had with Sir Ambrose Shea have enabled me to formulate the views of this Government upon the proposition made in behalf of the Dominion and the Province of Newfoundland, and I take pleasure in handing you herewith a memorandum embodying the results. If this suits, I shall be happy to confirm the arrangement by an exchange of notes at your early convenience.

I am, my dear Mr. West, very sincerely yours,

T. F. BAYARD.

The Hon. L. S. SACKVILLE WEST, etc.

MEMORANDUM.

The legislation passed by the Congress of the United States, act of March 1, 1873, for the execution of the fishery articles of the treaty of Washington, has been repealed by the joint resolution of March 3, 1883, the repeal to take effect July 1, 1885. From that date the effects of the fisheries articles of the treaty of Washington absolutely determine, so far as their execution within the jurisdiction of the United States is concerned, and without new legislation by Congress modifying or postponing that repeal the Executive is not constitutionally competent to extend the reciprocal fisheries provisions of the treaty beyond the 1st of July next, the date fixed by the action of Congress.

Mr. West's memorandum of March 12, 1885, suggests the mutual practical convenience that would accrue from allowing the fishing ventures commenced prior to July 1, 1885, to continue until the end of the season for fishing of that year, thus preventing their abrupt termination in the midst of fishing operations on the 1st of July.

It has been, moreover, suggested on the part of the Province of Newfoundland and of the Dominion of Canada, that in view of the mutual benefit and convenience of the present local traffic, consisting of the purchase of ice, bait, wood, and general ship supplies by the citizens of the United States engaged in fishing from the inhabitants of the British American fishing coast, the usual operations of the fishing season of 1885 should be continued by the fishing vessels belonging to citizens of the United States until the end of the season of that year, and that the local authorities of Newfoundland and of the Dominion of Canada, in a spirit of amity and good neighborhood, should abstain from molesting such fishermen or impeding their progress or their local traffic with the inhabitants incidental to fishing during the remainder of the season of 1885, and all this with the understanding that the President of the United States would bring the whole question of the fisheries before Congress at its next session in December, and recommend the appointment of a commission in which the Governments of the United States and of Great Britain should be respectively represented, which commission should be charged with the consideration and settlement, upon a just, equitable, and honorable basis, of the entire question of the fishing rights of the two governments and their respective citizens on the coasts of the United States and British North America.

The President of the United States would be prepared to recommend the adoption of such action by Congress with the understanding that in view and in consideration of such promised recommendation there would be no enforcement of restrictive and penal laws and regulations by the authorities of the Dominion of Canada or of the Province of Newfoundland, against the fishermen of the United States resorting to British-American waters between the 1st of July next and the close of the present year's fishing season; the mutual object and intent being to avoid any annoyance to the individuals engaged in this business and traffic, and the irritation or ill-feeling that might be engendered by a harsh or vexatious enforcement of stringent local regulations on the fishing coast pending an effort to have a just and amicable arrangement of an important and somewhat delicate question between the two nations.

Public knowledge of this understanding and arrangement can be given by an exchange of notes between Mr. West and myself, which can be given to the press.

3.—Mr. West's memoranda of June 13, 1885.

[Memoranda.]

It is proposed to state in notes according temporary arrangements respecting fisheries than an agreement has been arrived at under circumstances affording prospect of negotiation for development and extension of trade between the United States and British North America.

The government of Newfoundland do not make refunding of duties a condition of their acceptance of the proposed agreement, but they rely on it having due consideration before the international commission which may be appointed.

4.—Mr. Bayard to Mr. West, June 19, 1885.

[Confidential.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 19, 1885.

MY DEAR MR. WEST: I assume that the two confidential memoranda you handed to me on the 13th instant embrace the acceptance by the Dominion and the British American coast provinces of the general features of my memorandum of April 21, concerning a temporary arrangement respecting the fisheries, with the understanding expressed on their side that the "agreement has been arrived at under circumstances affording prospect of negotiation for development and extension of trade between the United States and British North America."

General Grant thought that was right, and put it in his treaty and sent it to the Senate—an extension of trade between the two countries. Nothing was said by Mr. Bayard about reciprocity, but an extension of trade.

To such a contingent understanding I can have no objection. Indeed, I regard it as covered by the statement in my memorandum of May 21, that the arrangement therein contemplated would be reached "with the understanding that the President of the United States would bring the whole question of the fisheries before Congress at its next session in December, and recommend the appointment of a commission in which the Governments of the United States and of Great Britain should be respectively represented, which commission should be charged with the consideration and settlement, upon a just, equitable, and honorable basis, of the entire question of the fishing rights of the two Governments and their respective citizens on the coasts of the United States and British North America."

Mr. Arthur, the immediate predecessor of Mr. Cleveland, sent his message to the Congress of the United States on the 4th of December, 1883, in which he recommended as follows:

I suggest that Congress create a commission to consider the general question of our rights in the fisheries and the means of opening to our citizens, under just and enduring conditions, the richly-stocked fishing waters and sealing grounds of British North America.

There Mr. Bayard followed what he conceived to be the Republican lead on this subject, and there was no question of party division even suggested by any disagreement of views between Mr. Arthur's administration as advanced in his message, that I have just read from, and the proposed arrangement of the modus vivendi to which Mr. Bayard refers in his letter, I am reading now, to Mr. West. I continue the reading of the letter:

The equities of the question being before such a mixed commission would doubtless have the fullest latitude of expression and treatment on both sides; and the purpose in view being the maintenance of good neighborhood and intercourse between the two countries, the recommendation of any measures which the commission might deem necessary to attain those ends would seem to fall within its province, and such recommendations could not fail to receive attentive consideration.

I am not, therefore, prepared to state limits to the proposals to be brought forward in the suggested commission on behalf of either party.

I believe this statement will be satisfactory to you, and I should be pleased to be informed at the earliest day practicable of your acceptance of the understanding on behalf of British North America; and by this simple exchange of notes and memoranda the agreement will be completed in season to enable the President to make the result publicly known to the citizens engaged in the fishing on the British-American Atlantic coast.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your obedient servant,

T. F. BAYARD.

Hon. L. S. SACKVILLE WEST.

The agreement consisted of that and several other notes. It was not an agreement drawn up and signed by the respective parties otherwise than by the concurrence of opinion and consent as manifested in the various notes through which they expressed their views upon the question. That was the celebrated protocol. Now, Senators have been very emphatic, and I think very wild, too, in their statements about this matter not being desired by the fishermen. Suppose we were to assume that the fishermen themselves did not desire it, nevertheless there were other immense interests in the country which were not justly to be put into a condition of peril by any disagreement between the two governments and by such collisions as would naturally occur in the change from the treaty of 1871 to the treaty of 1818 right in the midst of the fishing season and when the vessels were there loading with fish. But it is a great mistake, a very serious mistake, for gentlemen to contend that Mr. Bayard was without authority, and even without importunity, upon this question.

Immediately after Mr. Cleveland came into office these troubles were anticipated to ensue after July 1, 1885, the date of the termination of the treaty, and that they would ensue in consequence of the termination of the treaty. The American Fishery Union, of which Mr. George Steele is president, the same gentleman to whom the President made that reply which was read to the Senate a few moments ago, made an urgent invocation to the President, stating that the interests of the whole people were in his hands, asking his attention to the anticipated difficulties, and trusting to his wisdom for protection. I will read from his memorial.

After addressing the President of the United States and signing himself as chairman, and being associated with Sylvanus Smith and William H. Jordan, of Gloucester; James Gifford, Owen B. Whitten, and George Trefethen, of Portland, and F. H. Smith, of North Haven, directors of the American Fishery Union, Mr. Steele said this to the President——

Mr. FRYE. What is the date?

Mr. MORGAN. May 12, 1885, just before the termination in July of the fisheries treaty of 1871.

It would be unnecessary to trace to you, sir, the history of these controversies since 1838; they are recorded in the archives of the State Department. Four times have fleets been sent by the United States to the 3-mile waters to protect our fishermen from aggression; two temporary treaties have been made and expired, and still the contracting powers are not agreed on the true intent and construction of the treaty.

Not agreed!

Fishermen have been seized, tried, and their vessels forfeited in local provincial courts; indemnities have been claimed by us for violations of the treaty; cruisers have been fitted out by provincial authorities, as they say, to enforce on our flag their construction of the treaty; but, as we say, to drive our fishermen from the treaty waters and harass them until the United States is bulldozed into giving the provincials a free market for their fish as the condition for peace upon the high seas.

The record of the Halifax Commission, in three volumes, is half filled with lists of these aggressions; hardly a man who has over a dozen years' experience in the fishery but has been a sufferer at one or another time by them. The provincial papers have reiterated in dispatches from Ottawa that that government propose to arm cruisers and enforce by seizure on the seas their past construction of the treaty of 1818 upon our Government and those fishing under its flag. The fishermen are willing to conform to the construction which their own Government puts upon the treaty, but they owe no duty to the British Government or its provinces, except when actually in her ports. British laws are not sovereign over the flag of the United States, nor over its free citizens who fish and navigate under its protection. We could amply protect ourselves against the meditated infraction of national rights by these provincial cruisers should the Government authorize us to arm in the just defense of our property and flag, but the interests of the whole people are in your hands, and respect for your high office leads us to invoke your attention to the anticipated difficulties, trusting in your wisdom for our protection.

Then the writer proceeds to a very elaborate argument of the assertion on the part of the Government of Great Britain and her provinces and her courts, discussing many questions, and concludes that part of the presentation of the history of the British contention with the following words:

Headlands.—They claimed that the United States renounced the right "to fish" within 3 miles of a line drawn from headland to headland, including great chambers of the high seas more than 6 miles across from headland to headland, and of any limitless extent from the line to the shores; the United States have discussed this claim to the Bay of Fundy. It may as well be set up by Great Britain for the whole Gulf of St. Lawrence, or for a line from Nova Scotia to the Bahamas, as for Gaspé, Chaleur, or Fundy; "bays," in the treaty, are such land-locked bays as will afford shelter, etc.

We are told that, by the treaty of 1839 with France, Great Britain agreed that the territorial claim was only to bays 6 miles across.

I suppose that perhaps somebody, some innocent man, some ignorant man, certainly no great and learned Senator will be willing to accept that statement of the chairman of the American Fishery Union as a correct statement of what it was understood that the British Government at that time claimed in regard to the headlands.

Proceeding further, he says:

Candor will admit that the "restrictions" are to prevent their "taking, curing, and drying fish" in port; that the abuse of privileges is the throwing ballast overboard, or otherwise violating harbor regulations applied to all vessels. We claim that we are entitled to judge of the condition and needs of our own vessels, and that the treaty entitles us to the same measure of hospitality which is extended to British fishermen or merchantmen or any foreign vessels trading there. The treaty puts no restrictions on the right of shelter, repair, wood, and water, so long as the fishermen apply their shelter in port to "no other purpose." See the case of the White Fawn. Shelter is a broad term. Fogs actual and fogs apprehended, as well as gales of wind; actual threatening weather; either wind, rain, fog, or snow; or heavy sea running, or strong currents, or head winds, or tides—if we seek shelter from any of these, are we not entitled by the treaty to it? Yet it has been denied us.

The statute of 1819 defines three offenses. Section 2 declares it unlawful for a person in any foreign ship "(1) to fish for, (2) to take, (3) dry, or cure any fish within 3 marine miles of," etc.; and proceeds to penalize "if any such foreign vessel, or any person on board thereof (1) shall be found fishing, (2) or to have been fishing, (3) or preparing to fish within such distance of such bays, harbors, or creeks, the vessel and cargo shall be seized and forfeited, except vessels entitled by treaty to the privilege."

The encroachment of this statute is evident. In 1783 Great Britain admitted our equal right to fish on her shores "and all other places in the sea," but the right to land was defined; in 1818 we acquired of her the use of certain shores—to dry and cure—which we had previously relinquished, and on a condition renounced the liberty to take fish within certain limits. No implication of exclusive right in any of the "places of the sea" can be drawn from this in favor of either party; on the contrary, the right of each party is admitted; nor of any sovereignty or jurisdiction conveyed by one to the other over the vessels and crews of the other.

Did the United States renounce in 1818 the right of "preparing, within the 3 miles, to fish" elsewhere? Did we renounce the right of freely navigating the waters in the limit? We did not. Did Great Britain ever, previous to or in that treaty, claim that the right to navigate within 3 miles of the shores was her exclusive property, and an intrusion of a foreign vessel on such waters, without her particular license, was a cause of forfeiture?

Did she not admit in that treaty that our fishermen should enter, lay in, and depart from her ports, bays, and creeks situated within the 3 miles, for shelter, etc.?

We submit, then, that fishing and other vessels of the United States are as absolutely, entirely, and exclusively within the jurisdiction and protection of the United States when within such 3 miles of the shore as when in mid-ocean, or in the harbor of Gloucester, or of New York. We demand, therefore, that Great Britain be warned that this Government will not submit to any attempt on her part, after July 1, to extend or assume a territorial or any other jurisdiction over the vessels of the United States navigating or harboring in the open seas, under the flag of the United States whether within or without 3 miles of the shore. And we request of you, as the custodian of the honor and dignity of the flag in the foreign relations of this free, sovereign, and independent people of the United States, to protect that flag from the humiliation of being arrested on the high seas in time of peace, by foreign officers; its vessels searched, seized, tried, and condemned; the cargo, product of the labor of the crew, and the outfits spoliated from their rightful owners, the fishermen and the outfitters; the voyage broken up and the means of living taken from the crew; the treaties of the United States construed and limited by county magistrates of British provinces or vice-admiralty courts of inferior jurisdiction.

All that was advice and admonition and supplication to the President of the United States, who was then but a few weeks in office. What is it, when you look at the causes, which gave a ground for this remonstrance? It is the most stern accusation, the broadest impeachment of the precedent Republican administrations, which had the control of this Government since 1861, that could possibly be framed.

He proceeds to argue with great ability upon many questions connected with this subject. He speaks of one case, the A. J. Franklin, and says:

In one case, the A. J. Franklin, the seizure was the 15th October, 1870, in the Gut of Canso, on the charge of having been fishing on the 11th at Broad Cove. The facts recited by the judge are that she was brought to by two guns from a cruiser, more than 2½ miles from land on the 11th. Her skipper denied he had been fishing, and appealed to two adjacent vessels for corroboration. The cruiser satisfied herself, and released the fisherman, who continued on her business; she afterwards came into the Gut of Canso where, on information procured from some "Lunenberg men" that she had been trying for mackerel the 11th, the Franklin was seized, and, although no mackerel were claimed to have been caught, condemned. The Franklin's witness denied that she had either fished, or prepared to fish within the limits, between the 11th and 15th, and said that they had sailed that morning (11th) from Port Hood toward Broad Cove, and were overhauled on their way. Whether these circumstances of arrest arose from design or an accident, what chance was left the Franklin owners to defend their property? After it had purposely been admitted all right whilst witnesses were available for her, but when she had separated from the fleet and the means had ceased to be available, then she was seized and reaccused.

That was in 1870. Where is the honor of your flag, where is the redress of the American citizen, where is the restoration to him of his property rights either under statute or under treaty? From 1870 to 1885 this matter went along, and in the first Democratic Administration that made its appearance in the country after twenty-five years' absence from control of the councils of the country, this citizen of the United States heading this most important interest presented this demand on that Democratic President, and its head had no Congress here to assist him in prosecuting this purpose or in providing anything for the protection of our people. No preliminary arrangement had been made. These wrongs and grievances had all stood there for years and years together; they were not matters to be apprehended or expected, but things that had actually occurred, and yet the great Republican party with all its power had not even hinted at a provision of law by which these evils might be corrected in the past or prevented in the future.

He goes on to speak further of the action of the British Parliament and the provincial legislatures, and says:

Their aggressive course towards our flag has evidently been inspired by a desire to harass and bulldoze this Government into admitting the fish caught by the provincials into this market free of duty; and we have every reasonable expectation it will be repeated for the same object unless a firm stand is made against the repetition.

Provincials will not enter into the fishery business unless they can find an advantageous market for the fish they catch. When they are certified by the firm position of the Administration and of Congress that the market of the United States is irrevocably barred by such revenue duties as will not permit them any superiority or advantage over the American fishermen therein, then the inducements which for thirty years have stimulated them to worry our people will pass away, and they will be very ready to sell bait to us, and Great Britain may perhaps name a reasonable license to vessels for the privilege of the inshore fishery for mackerel.

These are suggestions brought to the attention of the present Executive.

Mr. FRYE. Is that George Steele?

Mr. MORGAN. George Steele.

Mr. FRYE. I thought the Senator was reading from the same authority.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, this is all from Mr. Steele.

He then goes on to comment upon the fisheries and their importance in time of war for national defense, and comments upon the taxes upon fishing vessels, etc., upon the intrepidity and heroism of our fishermen upon the seas in times of war, and then on page 19 he adds:

We believe that a detachment of the naval force sent to those waters will afford needful protection for this season to our mackerel fleet. The Ottawa legislature, on the 10th of April, rejected a proposal of Mr. Davis to treat. The press of Canada have several times given notice that cruisers were being prepared, and in Newfoundland the arrival of a royal vessel to guard the fisheries has been announced within a week; it behooves us, whose property is at risk to be watchful in its defense and to advise the Government seasonably of the need of vigilance. This has been done informally as well as formally.

The chairman of our committee, in reply to his formal letter, has been courteously informed by the honorable Secretary of State that he was hopeful that results would be achieved which would enable our fishermen to complete the season of 1885 without molestation. This reached us when this memorial had been thus far prepared.

Now, we shall find out whether the Secretary of State had the encouragement of the fishermen to do this specific thing or not.

We greatly appreciate the desire of the President and the Secretary to give full and earnest consideration of the interests this association represents, and can not demonstate our reliance on these expressions of your favor more directly than to suggest that the success of British negotiators has always rested on the adroitness with which the nature and extent of their proposals for new contracts have been concealed from the American fishermen who are to be affected by the measure proposed, and who can expose the insidious tendencies enveloped therein.

We desire to put you on your guard, and repeat, it is a bitter experience of the past, and not any want of confidence in or distrust of yourself or the State Department, which leads us to implore that no negotiations involving the duties on the entry of foreign fish in these ports shall be entertained by this Government without first giving us ample notice to explain fully the effect on our interests the question involves. Whether we look at our own industry as it is, or consider the interest of our flag, we say there is no price that Great Britain can pay, nor interest which she can give in the fisheries which can compensate for the introduction of British-caught fish free of duty into our markets.

There is another terrible arraignment of the Republican party on this question. Without reading more from this very unfortunate and I must say able document, it is very clear that if its authors represented the fishermen of New England at that time, as they assumed that they did, they had some very serious grievances against past administrations of the Government.

Now I will ask the Secretary to read two letters from Mr. George Steele, chairman of the American Fishery Union, dated April 28, one of them, and the other May 10, 1885.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

GLOUCESTER MUTUAL FISHING INSURANCE COMPANY,
Gloucester, Mass., April 28, 1885.

SIR: The American Atlantic fishery interests organized last December under the name of the American Fishery Union.

It has been lately brought to the notice of the Union that the British provincial authorities are meditating predatory attack on our fishing vessels engaging after July 1 in fishing at the eastward, with the object of obstructing their lawful pursuits by seizing with armed cruisers our vessels on the high seas and forfeiting them, also intimidating and abridging them of their lawful right. The thirty thousand fishermen and their vessels under the flag of the United States in those waters are entitled to the protection of the United States in these pursuits, which this Government has not requested by treaty.

The officers of the Fishery Union desire to present the interests of their pursuits in this emergency to the attention of yourself personally or the President.

Fearing we might present ourselves at an inconvenient time, permit me to request that you will cause me to be informed by telegraph or mail whether your convenience will be better served by naming a particular date for an interview.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
GEORGE STEELE, Chairman.

Hon. THOMAS F. BAYARD,
Secretary of State.

GLOUCESTER, MASS., May 10, 1885.

DEAR SIR: Your esteemed favor of the 2d instant is at hand and I have carefully noted same.

I notice what you say in reference to negotiations in progress, and while feeling grateful for the interest shown by you in thus promptly considering the matter, and confident that you will be actuated by the most kindly feelings towards the fishing interests of the United States in your negotiations, I am much afraid, and in this I am only influenced by several very bitter experiences in the past, that your Department in negotiatons with Great Britain on the subject of the fisheries will be placed at a great disadvantage unless we are allowed to clearly state our position and desires as the Canadian Government has always shown the greatest interest in its fisheries and are thoroughly conversant with its needs.

In my letter of the 28th ultimo I intended to ask for protection against unjust seizure only. In the clause you did not understand, "are entitled to the protection of the United States in these pursuits which this Government has not requested by treaty," the word "requested" by an error in copying was substituted for "renounced."

We are fully aware of the fact that there are some rights enjoyed by us under the treaty of Washington that we must now relinquish, and we are prepared to abide by the treaty of 1818 and suffer all the inconvenience that may arise from the change, but we were much afraid of a repetition of the condition of affairs existing previous to the Washington treaty—

Those good old days of Grant, of which Mr. HOAR was so proud—when Canadian cutters were fitted out with the express purpose of making a disturbance and forcing our Government into reciprocity, and were allowed to seize our fishing vessels at their pleasure, try them in their courts, with no one to answer to except the owners, who well knew how useless it was for them to make any defense, however illegal the seizure may have been, without the support of their Government.

We are much pleased with your assurance that this unfriendly policy of the Canadian Government is not likely to be repeated, as the articles we had seen in the Canadian press were not reassuring.

We must earnestly hope, however, that you will not feel it necessary to recommend a continuance of the present policy of admitting Canadian fish free of duty in order that we may not be harassed while prosecuting our business in a manner clearly within our rights as allowed by the treaty of 1818, for it is the unanimous opinion of the fishing interests that the Government could do nothing to recompense us for so serious a blow.

We mention this because we apprehend the Canadians are approaching you with propositions for a reciprocity treaty. We do not desire "free fish" to be an element of such reciprocity. We shall present both to you and the President detailed reasons of its inexpediency in regard to American consumers and national interests as well as the ruin it would heap on our fishermen.

I have the honor to be, your most obedient servant,
GEORGE STEELE,
President American Fishery Union.

Hon. THOMAS F. BAYARD,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, Mr. President, I suppose that we shall have a little let up on the assertion that no fisherman desired that the present Administration should do anything at all in regard to the fishery rights terminated or to be terminated on the 1st of July, 1885, by the close of the treaty of Washington. Senators who represent, or who profess to represent, that particular interest upon this floor, have more than intimated, yes, they have asserted, that it was the duty of the fishermen in that region to provide themselves for a change of these treaties, that they had no business going up into those waters for the purpose of pursuing their rights under the fisheries treaty of 1871, which they knew would be terminated in July. I thought when that argument was made that it was a pretty harsh one, and I thought that it was a benign thing and a just thing for our Government when it had any opportunity at all to prevent the blow from falling on these men to do so, because the fisherman must pursue the fish at the season when they are running and capable of being caught.

He can not divide the season to suit himself, and having gone out upon his venture, if he has not been successful enough to load before the 1st day of July, then of course he must take the risk and disadvantage of loading after that time, and to find the whole treaty system of the United States then changed after he has been on the banks fishing for cod or halibut or other ground fish, or pursuing the mackerel along the surface of the waters, is something against which he can scarcely be expected to provide. But this harsh-handed treatment, which applies itself to the fisherman as it does to everybody else, demands a subserviency and subordination to the will of the rulers of the fish market, was found here in this Senate declaiming against the President of the United States because he saw proper to arrange with Mr. West that which Mr. Seward had so earnestly sought at the hands of the British Government at the termination of the treaty of 1854. Here they commenced as early as April 28, 1885, the President having been inaugurated on the 4th day of March, to ask for protection, for forecast, for provisions of arrangement at the hands of the President of the United States by which these severe blows might be obviated and avoided. Then after that comes another man, who followed that on January 22, 1886. This seems to be signed by a firm.

BOSTON, MASS., January 22, 1886.

SIR: I think you, and the President should be commended for recommending a commission on the fishery question. The talk about the mackerel fishing industry being injured during the spawning season is all folly, as the catch of 1884 was the largest ever known, so large that there are several thousand barrels left over for want of a market. Boston is in favor of a treaty with the Provinces. A duty on fish is a protection that does not protect, but instead it curtails our markets for fish, and since the treaty expired the trade of Boston have lost over $700,000 worth of trade with the Dominion of Canada and more than $300,000 with the West Indies and South America, as the fish are shipped here in bond and thus come in competition with our fishermen. We are supposed to be a manufacturing country, and why should the laborer be obliged to pay 80 per cent. more for his fish than usual. It is simply a protection for a few to the detriment of many, and the $3 duty on a barrel of salmon and $2 on a barrel of mackerel or herrings is blood money taken from the pockets of the poor people.

Yours, truly,
K. & S. A. FREEMAN.

Hon. THOMAS F. BAYARD, Washington, D. C.

I do not know who they are, but the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], following in the wake of various other Senators who have spoken upon this subject to the Senate, asserted most boldly that the fishermen and men interested in fishing in the northeast did not want any modus vivendi, they did not ask any protection, they did not ask any arrangement with Great Britain, they were willing to take the risk, and that the Secretary of State and the President of the United States were acting of their own motion and in favor of British interests and Canadian interests, volunteering their services to assist Canadian influence and Canadian enterprise and interest, and not acting under the solicitations of the fishermen and men concerned in fishing in the northeast when this modus vivendi was proposed and agreed to. Now, that is overturned.

I promised the Senator from New York that I would show him the importunities of private men, and I have more yet to show on that subject and also of the movements of general societies, organizations in their public capacity and in their public meetings soliciting the President of the United States early in his administration and within one or two months after he was sworn into office to take this subject in hand and proceed with it so as to save the blow that otherwise would fall upon the country savagely and fiercely and destructively in the transition from the treaty of 1871, with its liberal reciprocity upon fish and the like, to the treaty of 1818.

Mr. President, about the time of the reception of these letters, the British minister, seeing that disturbance was likely to occur between our country and Great Britain, applied to the Administration for the purpose of having some arrangement made by which we could ease off from one system to the other without two great a break in our affairs; but prior to that Mr. West had addressed Mr. Frelinghuysen during the preceding Administration a letter upon the same subject. Mr. Frelinghuysen did not deign, I believe, to make any reply to it at all; perhaps he did not care to forestall the action of the incoming administration.

Mr. Frelinghuysen was a very careful man, a wise man, and a thoroughly honorable man. I do not believe we have had a higher character in this country for many, many years than Mr. Frelinghuysen. So he left, not the responsibility merely, but he left the policy to be arranged by the incoming administration without committing himself one way or the other—for President Arthur had committed himself thoroughly in favor of a broad general arrangement in the message from which I have just read—to be agreed upon and arranged by a mixed commission authorized and organized under an act of Congress.

So that administration, fully committed to its policy on that subject, left it to the succeeding administration to say what they would do in arranging the particular method by which we could go through this very serious transition from the treaty of 1871 to the treaty of 1818.

I shall not have time this evening, Mr. President, to close my remarks on that branch of the case and on the next, which I intend to discuss before the Senate, as to the effect of the modus vivendi in this present treaty, and it is in reference to the modus vivendi, the protocol in this present treaty, that I have made my motion to postpone the consideration of the treaty until December, and I have made it in the very best of faith; and I will repeat a remark that I have made perhaps on more than one occasion here, that if I were opposed to every word and line of this treaty I should still insist upon its going over until December, for the sake of the composure of this country, and for the sake also of the Senate as a body of negotiators.

Mr. SAWYER. If the Senator from Alabama will give way, I will move that we now proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall do so with great cheerfulness, because I have been in the habit of making very short speeches in the Senate, and to-day I have been making one of some length.

Mr. SAWYER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4659) for the relief of George M. Ochiltree, and agreed to the same.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1321) for the erection of a marine hospital at Evansville, Ind.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. 9418) to incorporate the Washington and Western Maryland Railroad Company; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

MARY CURTIN—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 2653, entitled "An act granting a pension to Mary Curtin."

The husband of this beneficiary was mustered into the military service October 8, 1862, was wounded in the right arm, and was discharged September 3, 1863.

He was pensioned for his wound to the time of his death, September 17, 1880.

The physician attending him in his last illness testified that the deceased was in the last stages of consumption when pneumonia intervened and caused his death.

I do not understand that this physician gives the least support to the theory that the wound for which this soldier was pensioned was in the slightest degree connected with his death, and there seems to be nothing in the case to justify the conclusion that such was the fact.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 14, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall this bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. TURPIE. I move that the bill, with the accompanying message, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

WIDOW OF JOHN LEARY—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 1076, entitled "An act granting a pension to the widow of John Leary, deceased."

This bill does not give the name of the intended beneficiary, but merely directs that the name of the widow of John Leary, late first sergeant in Battery F, Third Artillery, United States Army, be placed upon the pension-roll, and that she be paid the sum of $20 per month.

John Leary first enlisted in the regular Army July 26, 1854, and re-enlisted in August, 1859. He was slightly wounded July 1, 1862, and appears to have been discharged March 25, 1863, on account of syphilitic iritis. In April, 1863, he entered the general service and acted as a clerk in the Adjutant-General's Office until April 1, 1864, when he was discharged.

Neither he nor his widow ever filed a claim in the Pension Bureau, but an application on behalf of his minor children was filed in 1882.

The soldier died on the 8th of December, 1872, of pneumonia, and his widow remarried in 1876.

The application on behalf of the children was denied on the ground that the death of the soldier was not due to any cause arising from his military service. The youngest child will reach the age of sixteen in September, 1888.

It is stated in the report of the Senate committee to whom this bill was referred that the second husband, to whom this widow was married in 1876, is now dead, and it is proposed to pension her as the widow of John Leary, her first husband, at the rate of $20 per month.

In the unusual cases when a widow has been pensioned on account of the death of her first husband, notwithstanding her remarriage, which forfeited her claim under the general law, it has been well established that she was again a widow by the death of her second husband, that beyond all controversy the death of the first husband was due to his military service, and such advanced age or disability has been shown on the part of the widow as prevented self-support.

In this case the name of the widow is not in the bill; there is hardly room for the pretense that her first husband's death was due to his military service, her age is given as over forty years, and $20 a month is allowed her—being considerably more than is generally allowed in cases where a widow's right is clear, with no complications of second marriage, and her necessities great.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 14, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill pass, notwithstanding the objections of the President of the United States?

Mr. TURPIE. I move that the bill, with the accompanying message, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

BENJAMIN A. BURTRAM—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 1762, entitled "An act granting a pension to Benjamin A. Burtram."

The beneficiary named in this bill was mustered into the military service November 26, 1861; he was reported present until February 28, 1862, and was discharged for disability July 26, 1862.

The medical certificate of the disability of this soldier was made by the senior surgeon of a hospital in Louisville, Ky., and stated that the soldier had been disabled for sixty days; that his lungs were affected with tubercular deposits in both, and that there was some irregularity in the action of the heart; that he was of consumptive family, his mother, brother, and two sisters having died of that disease according to his and his father's account.

It is of course supposed that this certificate was based upon an examination of the patient, though both he and his father seem to have supplemented such an examination with statements establishing a condition and history which operated to bring about a discharge.

I do not find, however, either as the result of examinations or statements, any other trouble or disability alleged than those mentioned above.

But in 1879, seventeen years after the soldier's discharge, and during the period when arrearages of pensions were allowed on such applications, he filed a claim for pension in which he alleged that about December 1, 1861, while unloading gun-boxes he incurred a rupture, and that in January, 1862, he was taken with violent pains in left arm and side, causing permanent disability.

It will be observed that the time of the incurrence of these disabilities is fixed as quite early in the very short military service of this soldier; and it certainly seems that, though short, his term of service was sufficiently long to develop such disabilities as he claims to have incurred to such an extent that they neither would have escaped in the succeeding July the examination of the surgeon nor the mention of the soldier.

A medical examination, which followed the application for pension in 1879, disclosed a large scrotal hernia, but no discoverable trouble of the left arm and side.

A special examination of the case was made, and a large amount of testimony taken. Without giving it in any detail as it is reported to me, I fail to find in it reasonably satisfactory proof that the disabilities upon which he now bases his claim for a pension were incurred in the military service.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 14, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall this bill pass, notwithstanding the objections of the President of the United States?

Mr. SAWYER. I move that the bill and message be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES MAP—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I return herewith a joint resolution which originated in the Senate, and is numbered 17, providing for the printing of additional copies of the United States map of the edition of 1886, prepared by the Commissioner of Public Lands.

This resolution directs that 7,500 of these maps shall be printed at a rate not exceeding $1.35 each; that 2,000 of said maps shall be for the use of the Senate, 4,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, 500 for the Commissioner of the Land Office, and that 1,000 be mounted and sold at the price of $1.50 each. The sum of $10,125 is appropriated to pay the expense of the publication of said maps.

The propriety and expediency of this appropriation, to be applied so largely by the two branches of Congress, should be left to legislative discretion.

I believe, however, that through inadvertence the duplication of the edition of these maps issued in 1886 has been directed by this joint resolution instead of the edition of 1887.

The map of 1886 was published at a cost of $1.25 per copy.

The map of 1887 will very soon be issued at a cost of $1 per copy, and the publishers have offered to print an enlarged edition at the rate of 95 cents for each map. This map will be later, more correct, more valuable in every way, and cheaper than that issued the previous year.

Upon these facts I return the joint resolution without approval, in the belief that the Congress will prefer to correct the same by directing the publication of the latest, best, and cheapest map, and reducing the amount appropriated therefor.

GROVER CLEVELAND,

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 14, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall this joint resolution pass, notwithstanding the objections of the President of the United States?

Mr. CULLOM. I move that it be referred, with the message, to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 10050) to amend section 216 of the Revised Statutes with reference to the District of Columbia and the bill (H. R. 9418) to incorporate the Washington and Western Maryland Railroad Company were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

GEORGE M. OCHILTREE.

Mr. SAWYER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there not another bill from the House of Representatives? If so, I ask the Senator from Wisconsin to withdraw his motion in order to allow that bill to be laid before the Senate. It will only take a minute.

Mr. SAWYER. I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives receding from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4659) for the relief of George M. Ochiltree, and agreeing to the same.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is a report of the conference committee on the part of the Senate on the bill for the relief of George M. Ochiltree, which is in the hands of the Secretary, and I ask that it be now laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4659) for the relief of George M. Ochiltree having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House agree to the amendment of the Senate to the said bill.

JOS. R. HAWLEY,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
CHAS. E. HOOKER,
JNO. H. GEAR,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The two Houses having agreed, no further action is necessary.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SAWYER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, August 15, 1888, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, August 14, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, was received, announcing to the House of Representatives that the following bills were presented to the President July 31, 1888, and not having been returned to the House of Congress in which they originated, within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, they have become laws without his signature:

An act (H. R. 9859) making appropriation for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 160) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Sailer;

An act (H. R. 5490) granting a pension to Mrs. Catherine Sinnott; and

An act (H. R. 409) for the relief of Thomas W. Lord.

The message further announced that the President had on August 13, 1888, approved bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 9056) to protect purchasers of lands lying in the vicinity of Denver, Colo., heretofore withdrawn by the executive department of the Government as lying within the limits of certain railroad grants, and afterwards held to lie without such limits;

An act (H. R. 10604) to authorize the Winona and Southwestern Railway Company to build a bridge across the Mississippi River at Winona, Minn.;

An act (H. R. 7398) to subdivide the eastern judicial district of Louisiana, and to fix the time and place for holding terms of courts therein;

An act (H. R. 8783) to authorize the Kentucky Rock Gas Company to lay conduit pipes across the Ohio and Salt Rivers;

An act (H. R. 1560) to extend the provisions of "An act to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces," and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 9977) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to extend a side track into square No. 1025, in the city of Washington; and

An act (H. R. 8525) to remove the political disabilities of Elliott Johnston.

MARINE HOSPITAL, EVANSVILLE, IND.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 1321) for the erection of a marine hospital at Evansville, Ind., with a Senate amendment.

Mr. HOVEY. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendment be concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, line 18, before the word "of" where it first occurs, insert "the administration."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? The Chair hears none, and the Senate amendment is concurred in.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were severally read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (S. 6922) for the relief of George W. Graham—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (S. 1688) to regulate commerce carried on by telegraph—to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (S. 1950) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Indians of Fort Berthold agency, Dakota—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (S. 2065) for the relief of Jacob Kerns—to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (S. 2163) for the relief of Alfred J. Worcester—to the Committee on War Claims.

The bill (S. 2560) for the improvement and the encouragement of the cultivation of flax and hemp—to the Committee on Agriculture.

The bill (S. 2998) for the relief of Lieut. Col. Charles G. Sawtelle, deputy quartermaster-general, United States Army—to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (S. 3015) for the relief of S. M. Shaffer—to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (S. 3139) removing the charge of desertion from the record of William H. Fenton—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (S. 3191) to amend section 4 of the act of March 3, 1887, and an amendment of section 2 of the act of March 3, 1877—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

IRON MOUNTAIN RAILROAD.

Mr. MCRAE, by unanimous consent, introduced (by request) the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby requested to transmit to this Congress all the papers and records in the case of St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railroad vs. William H. Cayce, in contest concerning 120 acres of land in Miller County, Arkansas, to the end that the action taken by the Forty-fifth Congress, June, 1878, be called up and be reviewed by this Congress, wherein said land was declared to be public land of the United States and subject to pre-emption entry, and that pending said review by Congress the Secretary of the Interior be requested to take no further action in the case of said lands.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. E. P. ALLEN, until Thursday, on account of important business.

To Mr. MOFFITT, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. PENINGTON, for one day, on account of important business.

To Mr. HOWARD, for ten days, on account of sickness in his family.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of Committees for reports.

GEORGE M. OCHILTREE.

Mr. GEAR. I ask leave to make a report from the committee of conference.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House (4659) for the relief of George M. Ochiltree having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House agree to the amendment of the Senate to said bill.

S. S. YODER,
JOHN H. GEAR,
CHARLES E. HOOKER,
Managers on the part of the House.

JOS. R. HAWLEY,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The following is the statement of the House conferees:

The bill under consideration passed the House, amending the record of George M. Ochiltree so as to place him on the rolls of the War Department with the pay "of a major of cavalry" as compensation for two months' services as a provost-marshal in Missouri in 1862. This would have entitled him to something over $2,000. The Senate amended the House bill by allowing the said G. M. Ochiltree $1,066.45 in full compensation for his service as provost-marshal.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. GEAR moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS ST. JOHN'S RIVER.

Mr. CRISP, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 10588) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the St. John's River, in the State of Florida; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS TENNESSEE AND CUMBERLAND RIVERS.

Mr. CRISP also, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 10023) to authorize the Cairo and Tennessee River Railroad Company to construct bridges across the Tennessee and Cumberland Rivers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 9137) granting a pension to Eli H. Kiser;

A bill (H. R. 8092) to increase the pension of Lodiska J. Hays;

A bill (H. R. 3843) granting a pension to Virgil A. Jones;

A bill (H. R. 7169) granting arrears of pension to Joseph R. Dods;

A bill (H. R. 211) granting an increase of pension to Nicholas W. New;

A bill (H. R. 6767) to restore J. Rock Robinson to the pension-roll;

A bill (H. R. 6211) to increase the pension to Henry C. Jay;

A bill (H. R. 189) granting a pension to August C. T. Gogall; and

A bill (H. R. 209) granting a pension to Levi H. Naron.

WILLIAM B. COBB.

Mr. BARRY, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 10847) granting an increase of pension to William B. Cobb; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH G. SWANK.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 3196) for the relief of Joseph G. Swank; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ESTATE OF J. J. PULLIAM.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 10949) for the relief of the estate of J. J. Pulliam, deceased; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN ELLISON.

Mr. BROWER, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 8093) for the benefit of John Ellison; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

P. H. BRIDGEWATER.

Mr. BROWER also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 3708) for the relief of P. H. Bridgewater; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD OR DRUGS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. ATKINSON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 249) to prevent the manufacture or sale of adulterated food or drugs in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. LANHAM, the Committee on Claims was discharged from further consideration of the bill (S. 1813) for the relief of Susan B. Hopkins; and it was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 2524) for the relief of Clement A. Lounsberry;

A bill (H. R. 5494) for the relief of John T. Robeson;

A bill (H. R. 3329) to regulate the subdivision of land within the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 5539) for the relief of John J. Coughlin;

A bill (H. R. 2592) for the relief of Andrew Gleeson;

A bill (H. R. 2611) for the relief of Joseph W. McClurg;

A bill (H. R. 3859) for the relief of the Sone and Fleming Manufacturing Company, Limited, of the city of New York;

A bill (H. R. 5222) for the relief of A. M. Anderson and others;

A bill (H. R. 6491) for the relief of Lowman & Co.; and

A bill (H. R. 8956) for the relief of S. B. West, administrator of Thomas Becton, deceased.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS].

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will withdraw that demand for a moment, in order that I may ask consideration of a bill for the relief of a very worthy class of Government employés. It is a bill granting leave of absence with pay to employés in the customs service. It does not take a dollar out of the Treasury.

Mr. SAYERS. I will state to my friend from Maryland that I feel bound to push on with the pending bill.

The SPEAKER. What motion does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] make?

Mr. SAYERS. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has completed the regular order so far.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The regular order, I believe, now is the morning hour for the consideration of bills.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I hope that will not be dispensed with, because there are about twenty committees that have not been called.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has not been dispensed with; but a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of appropriation or revenue bills takes precedence over it under the rules. If that motion is not made, however, the Chair will proceed with the morning hour.

Mr. SAYERS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering a general appropriation bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In the Committee of the Whole on the Calendar there are two general appropriation bills——

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not decide any questions in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am asking the Chair, if he will allow me——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. On the Calendar of bills in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union there is a general deficiency appropriation bill and a general fortification bill. The first in order on the Calendar is the general deficiency bill. I ask the Chair if the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which of these two bills will come up for consideration?

The SPEAKER. The Speaker of the House does not decide questions of order pending or likely to arise in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. That is a question for the gentleman who presides as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But, Mr. Speaker, is not that a question which is regulated by the rules of the House?

The SPEAKER. But it is not a question for the Speaker of the House to decide. The Speaker of the House decides no question pending in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I will ask my friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], if we resolve ourselves into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, which of these two appropriation bills does he propose to call up?

Mr. SAYERS. I will tell my friend from Illinois that he will know when we go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I wish to say to the gentleman from Texas that we will be a long time getting into the committee. [Renewed laughter.]

CHEROKEE INDIAN NEGROES.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I send to the Clerk's desk a copy of this morning's Post and ask to have it read. It is connected with a bill which I introduced into this House.

Several MEMBERS. Is it in order?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read it, and the Chair will then decide.

The Clerk read as follows:

EX-MINISTER TURNER'S BARGAIN—HE ARRANGED A CONFERENCE AND DEMOCRATS WERE TO VOTE FOR HIS BILL.

The bill to give the negro section of the Cherokee Indians the compensation of which they were deprived when the pure Cherokees were compensated to the extent of a quarter of a million dollars five or six years ago for lands taken from them by the United States Government was called up in the House yesterday.

Since the pure Indians cut the negro-Indians of the reservation out of their share of the former appropriation, the negro-Indians have been urging Congress to pass another bill appropriating $75,000 for themselves. J. Milton Turner, ex-minister to Liberia, is understood to be their agent at Washington, and it is said that he is to get 25 per cent. for his labors if the bill passes. It is also said that the part he took in organizing and managing the colored Democratic convention at Indianapolis was his part of a bargain under which the Democrats were to pass the bill. An effort was made to pass it yesterday, but Mr. OWEN, of Indiana, being in possession of these alleged facts, obstructed the way. When the Democrats learned the reason for his objection they gave way, and the bill had to be laid aside.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I am the author of the bill referred to in that article. I have introduced that bill into this Congress.

Mr. NELSON. That is no question of privilege.
